This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION,

COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM JULY 29, 1895, TO JULY 27, 1896.

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, HUGH J. E. FRASER,
GEORGE L. MACFARLANE, AND JOHN BOYD, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

FOURTH SERIES—VOL. XXIII.

EDINBURGH:
T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.
LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.
M.DCCC.XCVI.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB & CO., THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279732

STAMFORD LIBRARY

JUDGES

OF THE

COURT OF SESSION

DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON.
Lord ADAM.
Lord M'LAREN.
Lord KINNEAR.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD.
Lord YOUNG.
Lord RUTHERFURD CLARK.*
Lord TRAYNER.
The Lord MONCREIFF.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

The Lord MONCREIFF.†
Lord KYLLACHY.
Lord KINCAIRNEY.
Lord STORMONTH-DARLING.
Lord LOW.
Lord PEARSON.

---

* Lord Rutherfurd Clark resigned office at the end of the Winter Session, and was succeeded in the Second Division by Lord Moncreiff.

† Lord Moncreiff was succeeded in the Outer-House by Lord Pearson.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. J. P. B. ROBERTSON.

Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

The other Judges of the Court of Session.

Lord Advocate, { The Right Hon. Sir CHARLES PEARSON, Knt., succeeded by the Right Hon. A. GRAHAM MURRAY.

Dean of Faculty, ALEXANDER ASHER, Esq.

Solicitor-General, { A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Esq., succeeded by CHARLES SCOTT DICKSON, Esq.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PEERS

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, LORD HALSBURY.

Lords WATSON, HERSCHELL, ASHBOURNE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, and DAVEY.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN VOLUME XXIII.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,— Lands Valuation Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,—
Court of Justiciary, see p. xiii.,—House of Lords, see p. xiv.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
A v. B,	588
Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners v. Granite Steamship Co., Limited,	918
Aberdeen Tramways Co., Ogston v.	340
Adam's Trustees v. Carrick,	828
Adam, Sons, & Co., Limited, and Liquidator, Macquisten v.	910
Albany Steam Shipping Co., Petitioners,	272
Albin & Son, Glasgow District Subway Co. v.	81
Alexander v. Alexander,	724
Alston v. Alston,	16
Alston v. Ross,	273
Andersen, Fischer & Co. v.	395
Anderson, Cumming's Trustees v.	94
Anderson (Jonathan) Trust, Governors of, Petitioners,	592
Anderson's Executrix (Jamieson) v. Walker,	547
Anderson and Urie, Urie's Trustees v.	865
Antrobus, Petitioner,	1032
Arbroath and St Vigeans, Parish Council of, Seaton v.	763
Arbuthnot and Others (Macdonald's Trustees) v. Bain's Trustees,	913
Arethusa Ship Co., Limited, Galbraith & Moorhead v.	1011
Argyll, Duke of, and Others, Petitioners,	991
Assets Co., Limited, v. Lamb & Gibson,	569
Bain, Barr v.	1090
Bain, Clark & Macdonald v.	102
Bain v. Mackenzie,	528
Bain's Trustees, Macdonald's Trustees v.	913
Baird's Trustees, Lovie v.	1
Ballingall & Son, Tierney v.	512
Bannerman v. Bannerman's Trustee,	959
Barber, Campbell v.	90
Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board,	221
Barony Parish Council, Rutherglen Parish Council v.	1018
Barr v. Bain,	1090
Barrowman, Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v.	136
Bartsch v. Poole & Co.,	328
Beatson, Magistrates of Edinburgh v.	44
Belhaven, Lord, v. Lady Belhaven,	423
Bell, M'Lachlan v.	126
Bell's Trust, Governors of, Petitioners,	780
Bell's Trustees v. Copeland & Co.,	650
Binnie and Others, Renfrew County Council v.	166
Blackburn, Buchanan (Blackburn's Trustees) v.	698
Brown v. Furnival & Co.,	492
Brown v. Halbert,	733
Brown v. Magistrates of Leith,	654

	Page
Brownlie & Watson, Morier v.	67
Brunsgaard, Kjosterud, & Co., Craig v.	500
Buchanan (Blackburn's Trustees) v. Blackburn,	698
Buchanan & Co. v. Macdonald,	264
Buckhaven Police Commissioners, Kirkcaldy District Committee v.	107
Burnet, Dolan v.	550
Burns v. Diamond,	507
Burrell & Son and Paton, Simpson v.	590
Byres' Trustees (Logan and Others) v. Gemmell,	332
Cabrach, School Board of, v. Macdonald,	541
Caledonian Banking Co., Mowat v.	270
Caledonian Railway Co., Davidson's Trustees v.	45
Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited, Cullens v.	209
Cameron v. Glenmorangie Distillery Co.,	1092
Campbell v. Barber,	90
Campbell v. Morris,	118
Campbell and Others (Hope's Trustees), Hope v.	513
Campbell & Sons, Selkirk (Stevenson's Trustee) v.	711
Campbell's Trustees, M'Nab v.	1098
Carrick, Adam's Trustees v.	828
Carron Co. v. Mercer Henderson's Trustees,	1042
Carruthers, Whittle v.	775
Carruthers' Executor (Wright), Dinwoodie's Executrix v.	234
Carson v. Watson's Trustees,	636
Ceres School Board v. Macfarlane,	279
Chancellor's Trustees (Young and Another) v. Sharples' Trustees (Orde-Powlett and Another),	435
Church of Scotland Endowment Trustees, Millar v.	557
City Property Investment Trust Corporation v. Thorburn,	400
Clark, Gibson v.	294, 389
Clarke v. Scott,	442
Clark & Macdonald v. Bain,	102
Clough, Mudie v.	1074
Clydesdale Bank, Limited, Paton v.	38
Colonial Real Property Co., Limited, Petitioners,	547
Cook v. Sinclair & Co.,	925
Copeland & Co., Bell's Trustees v.	650
Cormack, Rooney v.	11
Cowan, Ferrier v.	703
Cowan, Milligan v.	731
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited,	209
Cumming's Trustees v. Anderson,	94
Cutler, Gill v.	371
Craig v. Brunsgaard, Kjosterud, & Co.,	500
Crawford's Trustees v. Lennox,	747
Cruickshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited,	147
Cruickshanks, Martin and Stark v.	874
Davidson's Trustee v. Simmons,	1117
Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.,	45
Dawson, Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist v.	496
Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson,	1006
Diamond, Burns v.	507
Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruther's Executor (Wright),	234
Dolan v. Burnet,	550
Dougall's Trustees, Tayport Land Co., Limited, v.	287
Douglas & Co. v. Milne,	163
Downie's Curator Bonis v. Macfarlane's Trustees,	80

	Page
Dunfermline District Committee of Fife County Council, Henderson v.	727
Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy,	621
Edinburgh Life Assurance Co., Welch's Executors v.	772
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, v. Beatson,	44
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, v. Magistrates of Leith,	383
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, Lord Saltoun v.	956
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann,	1056
Edinburgh, Presbytery of, Mackie v.	668
Elliot, Shepherd v.	695
Fair v. Macaulay's Executors,	598
Farnham v. New Bank Coal Co., Limited,	722
Ferrier v. Cowan,	703
Fife v. Orr,	8
Fischer & Co. v. Andersen,	395
Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire,	98
Fletcher, Stirling v.	120
Fraser v. Malloch,	619
Fraser's Trustee v. Fraser,	978
Fullarton's Trustees v. James,	105
Furnival & Co., Brown v.	492
Galashiels, Burgh of, v. County Council of Selkirk,	818
Galbraith, Walker v.	347
Galbraith & Moorhead v. Arethusa Ship Co., Limited,	1011
Galloway, Gibson's Trustees v.	414
Garland's Trustees v. Macaulay's Executors,	598
Gemmell, Byres' Trustees (Logan and Others) v.	332
Gibson v. Clark,	294, 389
Gibson's Trustees v. Galloway,	414
Gill v. Cutler,	371
Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith,	129
Gladstone v. M'Callum,	783
Glasgow, City of, Friendly Society, Linton v.	51
Glasgow City Parish Council v. Rutherglen and Barony Parish Councils,	1018
Glasgow District Subway Company v. Albin & Son,	81
Glasgow General Education Endowment Boards, Morier v.	67
Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood,	195
Glasgow, Magistrates of, Grahame v.	358
Glasgow, Master of Works, Raeside v.	1119
Glasgow Police Commissioners v. M'Omish & Arthur	896
Glasgow School Board, Barony Parish Council v.	221
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., M'Aulay v.	845
Glenmorangie Distillery Co., Cameron v.	1092
Goldie v. School Board of Torthorwald,	261
Goold and Others (Nelson's Trustees) v. Tod,	1000
Gordon, Hood v.	4, 171, 675
Gordon, Young v.	419
Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow,	358
Graham v. Magistrates of Perth,	602
Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel,	84
Granite Steamship Co., Limited, Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners v.	918
Grant, Henderson v.	659
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank,	199
Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Stuart v.	1005
Greenock, Magistrates of, Thomson v.	405
Greenock Police Board v. Shaw Stewart,	776
Halbert, Brown v.	733

	Page
Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane,	276
Hardy, Mounsey (Dunn's Trustee) v.	621
Henderson's Trustees, Carron Co. v.	1042
Henderson's Trustees v. Dunfermline District Committee of Fife County Council,	727
Henderson v. Grant,	659
Henderson v. Russell,	25
Highgate & Co. v. Magistrates of Paisley,	992
Hilson v. Scott,	241
Hood v. Gordon,	4, 171, 675
Hope v. Hope's Trustees (Campbell and Others),	513
Howden (Simson's Judicial Factor) v. Simson,	113
Hoy v. Magistrates of Portobello,	1039
Huntly, Marquis of, v. Nicol,	610
Hutton, North British Railway Co. v.	522
Hutton, Sutherland v.	718
Inland Revenue, Ballingall & Son v.	512
Inland Revenue, Munro and Others (M'Kimmie's Trustees) v.	232
Inland Revenue, Religious Tract and Book Society v.	390
Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution,	322
Inland Revenue, Wilson & Son v.	18
Ivory v. Macrae,	155
James, Fullarton's Trustees v.	105
Jamieson (Anderson's Executrix) v. Walker,	547
Johnstone, Murray v.	981
Johnstone's Trustees v. Johnstone,	538
Kennedy's Trustees v. Sharpe,	146
Kennedy and Others (Stewart's Trustees) v. Stewart,	416
Ker's Trustees v. Ker,	317
Kidd's Trustees, Paterson v.	737
Kilmarnock, Parish Council of, v. Viscountess Ossington,	833
Kincaid v. Quarrier,	676
Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven,	107
Laing Brothers & Co.'s Trustee v. Low,	1105
Lamb & Gibson, Assets Co., Limited, v.	569
Lanarkshire, District Committee of Middle Ward of, Fleming v.	98
Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., North British Railway Co. v.	76
Lanarkshire, County Council of, Wordie's Trustees v.	168
Largue, Macpherson v.	785
Lawrie, Moncrieff v.	577
Leith, Magistrates of, Brown v.	654
Leith, Magistrates of, Magistrates of Edinburgh v.	383
Lennox, Crawford's Trustees v.	747
Lidgerwood, Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v.	195
Linton v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society,	51
Logan and Others (Byres' Trustees) v. Gemmell,	332
Logan's Trustees v. Logan,	848
Long, Powell v.	534, 955
Lovie v. Baird's Trustees,	1
Low, Mess (Laing Brothers & Co.'s Trustee) v.	1105
Luke v. Wallace,	634
M'Ara, Morrison v.	564
Macaulay's Executors, Fair v.	598
Macaulay's Executors, Garland's Trustees v.	598

	Page
M'Aulay v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.,	845
M'Callum, Gladstone v.	783
Macdonald's Trustees v. Bain's Trustees,	913
Macdonald, Buchanan & Co. v.	264
Macdonald v. Macdougall,	941
Macdonald, School Board of Cabrach v.	541
Macdonald v. Udston Coal Co.,	504
Macdonald v. Welsh,	995
Macdougall, Macdonald v.	941
Macfarlane, Ceres School Board v.	279
Macfarlane's Trustees, Murray (Downie's Curator Bonis) v.	80
M'Gavigan, Taylor's Trustees v.	738, 945
Mackay's Trustees, Wilson & Sons v.	13
Mackenzie, Bain v.	528
Mackenzie and Others (Cumming's Trustees) v. Anderson,	94
Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh,	668
Mackie v. Strachan, Kinmond, & Co.,	1030
M'Killop v. North British Railway Co.,	768
M'Kimmie's Trustees (Munro and Others) v. Inland Revenue,	232
M'Lachlan v. Bell,	126
M'Lachlan v. s.s. "Peveril" Co., Limited,	753
M'Mullen v. Newhouse Coal Co.,	759
M'Nab v. Campbell's Trustees,	1098
M'Omish & Arthur, Glasgow Police Commissioners v.	896
Macpherson v. Largue,	785
Macquisten v. Adam, Sons, & Co., Limited, and Liquidator,	910
Macrae, Ivory v.	155
Malloch, Fraser v.	619
Mann, Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v.	1056
Marquis v. Prentice,	595
Marshall, Todd v.	36
Martin and Stark v. Cruickshanks,	874
Mess v. Low,	1105
Metcalfe v. University of St Andrews,	559
Millar v. Church of Scotland Endowment Trustees,	557
Milligan v. Cowan,	731
Milne, Douglas & Co. v.	163
Moncrieff v. Lawrie,	577
Monteith, Girvin, Roper, & Co. v.	129
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson,	67
Morris, Campbell v.	118
Morrison v. M'Ara,	564
Moubray's Trustees v. Moubray,	809
Mounsey v. Hardy,	621
Mowat v. Caledonian Banking Co.,	270
Mudie v. Clough,	1074
Muir & Co., Liquidator of, v. Orr,	8
Mungall, Waldie v.	792
Munro and Others v. Inland Revenue,	232
Murdison v. Scottish Football Union,	449
Murray v. Johnstone,	981
Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees,	80
Nelson's Trustees v. Tod,	1000
Neville v. Shepherd,	351
New Bank Coal Co., Limited, Farnham v.	722
Newhouse Coal Co., M'Mullen v.	759
Nicol, Marquis of Huntly v.	610
North British Railway Co. v. Hutton,	522

Page

North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., - - - - - 76
North British Railway Co., M'Killop v. - - - 768
North British Railway Co., Western District Committee of County Council of Stirling v. - - - - 929
Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited, Cruickshank v. - 147

Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., - - - - 340
Oliver, Skerret v. - - - - - 468
Orde-Powlett and Another (Sharples' Trustees), Chancellor's Trustees v. - - - - - - 435
Orphan Homes of Scotland, Trustees for, County Council of Renfrew v. - - - - - - 166
Orr, Fife v. - - - - - - - 8
Ossington, Viscountess, Parish Council of Kilmarnock v. - 853

Paisley, Magistrates of, Highgate & Co. v. - - - 992
Paterson v. Kidd's Trustees, - - - - 737
Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, - - - 38
Paton and Burrell & Son, Simpson v. - - - 590
Perth, Magistrates of, Graham v. - - - - 602
Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, - - - 885
"Peveril" Co., Limited, M'Lachlan v. - - - 753
Pillans, Russell, Hope, & Co. v. - - - - 256
Poole & Co., Bartsch v. - - - - - 328
Portobello, Magistrates of, Hoy v. - - - - 1039
Powell v. Long, - - - - 534, 955
Prentice, Marquis v. - - - - - 595

Quarrier, Kincaid v. - - - - - 676

Raeburn & Verel, Graham & Co. v. - - - - 84
Raeside v. White (Master of Works for City of Glasgow), - 1119
Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees, - - - 636
Religious Tract and Book Society v. Inland Revenue, - - 390
Renfrew, County Council of, v. Trustees for Orphan Homes of Scotland, - - - - - 166
Roberts & Co. v. Yule, - - - - - 855
Robertson, Petitioner, - - - - - 526
Rooney v. Cormack, - - - - - 11
Ross, Alston v. - - - - - 273
Ross, Perth General Station Committee v. - - - 885
Ross v. Ross, - - - - - 802, 1024
Royal Bank, Gibson and Others (Gray's Trustees) v. - - 199
Royal Bank, Smith and Others (Gray's Trustees) v. - - 199
Russell, Henderson v. - - - - - 25
Russell and Others (Ker's Trustees) v. Ker, - - - 317
Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans, - - - - 256
Rutherglen Parish Council v. Barony Parish Council, - - 1018

St Andrews University, Metcalfe v. - - - 559
Saltoun, Lord, v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, - - - 956
Scott, Clarke v. - - - - - 442
Scott, Hilson v. - - - - - 241
Scott v. Thurso River Harbour Trustees, - - - 268
Scott and Others (Adam's Trustees) v. Carrick, - - 828
Scott's Trustees v. Scott, - - - - - 52
Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Petitioners, - - - 586
Scottish Employers' Liability, &c., Assurance Co., Petitioners, - 1016
Scottish Football Union, Murdison v. - - - 449
Scottish Provident Institution, Inland Revenue v. - - 322

Page

Seaton v. Parish Council of Arbroath and St Vigeans, - - 763
Selkirk v. Campbell & Sons, - - - - 711
Selkirk, County Council of, Burgh of Galashiels v. - - 818
Sharpe, Kennedy's Trustees v. - - - - 146
Sharples' Trustees (Orde-Powlett and Another), Chancellor's Trustees v. - - - - - - 435
Shaw Stewart, Greenock Police Board v. - - - 776
Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees, - - - - 228
Shepherd v. Elliot, - - - - - 695
Shepherd, Neville v. - - - - - 351
Shirrefs v. Shirrefs, - - - - - 807
Simmons, Stewart (Davidson's Trustee) v. - - - 1117
Simpson v. Burrell & Son and Paton, - - - 590
Simson, Howden v. - - - - - 113
Sinclair & Co., Cook v. - - - - - 925
Skerret v. Oliver, - - - - - 468
Smith v. Soeder, - - - - - - 60
Smith and Others (Logan's Trustees) v. Logan, - - 848
Soeder, Smith v. - - - - - - 60
Somerville v. Thomson, - - - - - 576
Stair, Earl of, and Others, Petitioners, - - - 1070
Standard Shipowners' Mutual Association v. Taylor, - - 870
Steamship "Bonnington" Co., Graham & Co. v. - - 84
Steamship "Peveril" Co., Limited, M'Lachlan v. - - 753
Steel Company of Scotland, Stevenson v. - - - 1079
Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist v. Dawson, - - - 496
Stevenson and Others v. Steel Company of Scotland, - - 1079
Stevenson's Trustee v. Campbell & Sons, - - - 711
Stewart (Davidson's Trustee) v. Simmons, - - - 1117
Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, - - - - 93
Stewart's Trustees (Kennedy and Others) v. Stewart, - - 416
Stewart's Trustee v. Stewart's Executrix, - - - 739
Stirling v. Fletcher, - - - - - 120
Stirling County Council, Western District Committee of, v. North British Railway Co., - - - - - 929
Strachan, Kinmond, & Co., Mackie v. - - - 1030
Stuart and Others v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., - 1005
Sutherland v. Hutton, - - - - - 718
Sutherland v. Urquhart, - - - - - 284

Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gavigan, - - - 738, 945
Taylor, The Standard Shipowners' Mutual Association v. - 870
Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees, - - 287
Thomson v. Magistrates of Greenock, - - - 405
Thomson, Somerville v. - - - - - 576
Thorburn, City Property Investment Trust Corporation, Limited, v. 400
Thurso River Harbour Trustees, Scott v. - - - 268
Tierney v. Ballingall & Son, - - - - 512
Tod, Goold and Others (Nelson's Trustees) v. - - - 1000
Todd v. Marshall, - - - - - 36
Torthorwald, School Board of, Goldie v. - - - 261
Turnbull & Co., Wilson v. - - - - 714

Udston Coal Co., Macdonald v. - - - - 504
United Presbyterian Church, Skerret v. - - - 468
Urie's Trustees v. Urie, - - - - - 865
Urquhart, Sutherland v. - - - - - 284

Waldie v. Mungall, - - - - - 792
Walker v. Galbraith, - - - - - 347

Page

Walker, Jamieson (Anderson's Executrix) v. - - - 547
Wallace, Luke v. - - - - - 634
Wallace's Executors v. Wallace, - - - - 142
Watson's Trustees, Carson (Reid's Trustee) v. - - - 636
Watson (Fraser's Trustee) v. Fraser, - - - 978
Watson v. Watson, - - - - - 219
Watt, Petitioner, - - - - - 33
Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman, - - 136
Weir and Others (Urie's Trustees) v. Anderson and Urie, - 865
Welch's Executors v. Edinburgh Life Assurance Co., - - 772
Welsh, Macdonald v. - - - - - 995
White, Raeside v. - - - - - 1119
White's Trustees v. White, - - - - 836
Whittle v. Carruthers, - - - - - 775
Whyte v. Whyte, - - - - - 320
Wilson & Son v. Inland Revenue, - - - - 18
Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees, - - - 13
Wilson v. Turnbull & Co., - - - - 714
Wordie's Trustees v. County Council of Lanarkshire, - - 168
Wright (Carruthers' Executor), Dinwoodie's Executrix v. - 234
Young v. Gordon, - - - - - 419
Young and Another (Chancellor's Trustees) v. Sharples' Trustees, - 435
Yule, Roberts & Co. v. . - - - - 855

REGISTRATION APPEAL CASES.

Campbell v. Morris, - - - - - 118
Fletcher, Stirling v. - - - - - 120
Morris, Campbell v. - - - - - 118
Stirling v. Fletcher, - - - - - 120

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL CASES.

Burntisland Oil Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Fife, - - 683
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, - - 691
Crawford v. Assessor for Haddington, - - - 685
Edinburgh, Assessor for, St Cuthbert's Co-operative Association v. - 681
Fife, Assessor for, Burntisland Oil Co., Limited, v. - - 683
Furnace Gases Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, - 689
Haddington, Assessor for, Crawford v. - - - 685
Lanarkshire, Assessor for, Caledonian Railway Co. v. - - 691
Lanarkshire, Assessor for, Furnace Gases Co., Limited, v. - 689
Mitchell & Sons, Assessor for Portobello v. - - - 686
Portobello, Assessor for, v. Mitchell & Sons, - - - 686
St Cuthbert's Co-operative Association v. Assessor for Edinburgh, - 681

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

	Page
Abercrombie, H. M. Advocate v.	80
Aberdeenshire, Procurator-Fiscal of, v. Rust and Mackenzie,	56
Advocate, H. M., v. Abercrombie,	80
Advocate, H. M., Kennedy v.	28
Advocate, H. M., Teesdale v.	73
Anderson, Laird v.	14
Auld, Gachie v.	87
Bonnar v. Walker,	39
Bremridge v. Hume,	9
Bremridge v. Turnbull,	12
Buchan, Cameron v.	46
Buchanan v. Wilson,	86
Caithness, Procurator-Fiscal of, Green v.	50
Cameron v. Buchan,	46
Campbell, Macarthur v.	81
Carlin v. Malloch,	43
Davidson, Dingwall v.	31
Dingwall v. Davidson,	31
Disselduff, Galbraith v.	4
Fairfoul v. Somerville,	6
Gachie v. Auld,	87
Galbraith v. Disselduff,	4
Green v. Leith,	50
Hume, Bremridge v.	9
Jameson, M'Vean v.	25
Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate,	28
Laird v. Anderson,	14
Leith, Green v.	50
Loudon, Oliver v.	34
MacArthur v. Campbell,	81
M'Dougall, Mackenzie v.	3
Mackenzie v. M'Dougall,	3
Mackenzie, Wilson v.	56
M'Vean v. Jameson,	25
Malloch, Carlin v.	43
Moffat v. Shaw,	18
Millar, Whitchurch v.	1
Neilson, Smith v.	77
Oliver v. Loudon,	34
Proctor, Simpson v.	22
Rust, Wilson v.	56
Shaw, Moffat v.	18
Simpson v. Proctor,	22
Smith v. Neilson,	77
Somerville, Fairfoul v.	6

Page

Teesdale v. H. M. Advocate, - - - - 73
Turnbull, Bremridge v. - - - - - 12

Walker, Bonnar v. - - - - - 39
Whitchurch v. Millar, - - - - - 1
Wilson, Buchanan v. - - - - - 86
Wilson v. Mackenzie, - - - - - 56
Wilson v. Rust, - - - - - 56

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Assets Co., Blair v. - - - - - 36

Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited, Smith & Co. v. - 1
Blair v. Assets Co., Limited, - - - - 36

Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co. v. Marshall, - - 55
Carruthers v. Carruthers, - - - - 55
Clydesdale Bank v. Paton, - - - - 22
Cox, Metcalfe v. - - - - - 60
Cromarty, Countess of, Mackenzie v. - - - 32

Devonshire, Duke of, Mackenzie v. - - - - 32

Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Highland Railway Co. v. - 80

Haviland, Johnstone v. - - - - - 6
Highland Railway Co. v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., - 80

Johnstone v. Haviland, - - - - - 6

Little v. Stevenson & Co., - - - - 12

Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire and Others (Duke of Sutherland's Trustees), - - - - - 32
Marshall, Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co. v. - - 55
Metcalfe v. Cox, - - - - - 60

Ogston v. Stewart, - - - - - 16

Paton, Clydesdale Bank v. - - - - 22
Ross v. Ross, - - - - - - 67

St Andrews University v. Cox (University College, Dundee), - 60
Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited, - 1
Stevenson & Co., Little v. - - - - 12
Stewart, Ogston v. - - - - - 16
Strachey's Trustees, Johnstone v. - - - - 6
Sutherland, Duke of, Trustees of, Mackenzie v. - - 32

ERRATA.

P. 17, line 1 from foot, for "(H. L.) 90" read "(H. L.) 40."
P. 556, line 22, for "announce" read "pronounce."
P. 581, footnote, line 26, for "Addison" read "Anson."
P. 738, line 14 from foot, for "M'GAIRGAN" read "M'GAVIGAN."
P. 885, line 20 of rubric, for "pursuer" read "defender."
Justiciary, p. 17, line 26, for "refute" read "repeal."

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1895-96.

HENRY SMITH & COMPANY (Defenders), Appellants.—Cohen, Q.C.—Aitken.

BEDOUIN STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY (Pursuers), Respondents.—Bigham, Q.C.—Boyd—Alexr. Robertson.

No. 1.

Nov. 26, 1895.
Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited.

Ship—Bill of Lading—Short Delivery—Proof—Onus.—In an action by a shipowner for payment of freight the defenders claimed to retain the value of twelve bales of jute short delivered of the quantity specified in the bills of lading. The pursuer in reply stated that he had delivered the whole quantity received on board the vessel, and denied further liability.

A proof shewed that the cargo of jute had been put on board the vessel from boats in the River Hooghly; that the bales were checked by tallymen engaged by the shipowner as they were put on board; that on each boat-load being discharged the chief officer compared the tally-book with the shipper's boat note, and granted a mate's receipt; that the bills of lading were made up from the mate's receipts. These documents were produced along with the bills of lading. The shipowner led evidence tending to shew that the bales of jute, which were each 400 lbs. in weight, could not have been removed from the ship after being put on board.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that having regard to the way in which the delivery of the goods had been checked by the ship's officers, and the receipt acknowledged in the bill of lading, the evidence led by the shipowner was not sufficient to shew that the twelve bales had not been put on board the vessel, and that he was responsible for the quantity specified in the bills of lading.

(IN the Court of Session, Feb. 5, 1895, 22 R. 350.)

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Watson. Lord Shand. Lord Davey.

In March 1894 the Bedouin Steam Navigation Company, Limited, of Liverpool, owners of the steamship "Emir," brought an action against Henry Smith & Company, jute spinners, Dundee, for payment of £35, 7s. 2d., as the balance of freight alleged to be due to them for the conveyance by the "Emir" of 500 bales of jute from Calcutta to Dundee.

In defence Smith & Company stated that two parcels of jute of 500 bales each (the markings of which they set forth and which closely resembled each other) were shipped on board the "Emir," at Calcutta, by Ernsthausen & Company, and by the Arracan Company, Limited, respectively; that the master of the "Emir" granted bills of lading for each of these lots of 500 bales; that the defenders as onerous indorsees and holders of the bills of lading took delivery of the jute at Dundee, but that the pursuers failed to deliver twelve bales of the total 1000; and that the value of these twelve bales was £35, 7s. 2d.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having failed to deliver to the defenders the whole of the jute contained in the said bills of lading, and the defenders being entitled to set off the value of the short delivery against the claim for freight, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (3) The pursuers having failed to deliver the whole bales received on board by them, and for which the said bills of lading were granted, the defenders are entitled to deduct the value of the bales short delivered from the freight.

No. 1.

Nov. 26, 1895. Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited.

The pursuers, in reply, alleged that they had delivered the whole quantity of jute put on board the vessel.

A proof was allowed.

It appeared that the total cargo of the "Emir" was 25,483 bales of jute, according to the bills of lading, and the total short delivery was 79 bales. The bales averaged about five to the ton. The evidence of the ship's officer who superintended the loading of the vessel is given in the Court of Session report, 22 R. 351, foot-note.

The pursuers' evidence went to shew that it was highly improbable that bales could have been removed from the vessel during the loading or afterwards.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders.

The Second Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and gave decree for the pursuers.

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case it appears to me that the question which your Lordships are called upon to determine is a pure question of fact. I think there are no circumstances in this case which would justify one in laying down any general proposition from which the conclusion can be deduced. The conclusion which we ought to arrive at is one that arises from the facts in proof in this case; and I myself rather protest, when one is dealing with questions of fact, against laying down any rules that are not applicable to the particular case as it comes before us. Each case in turn differs in its circumstances, and there is no doubt that from time to time in the course of a cause the burden of proof may shift from one side to the other many times.

In this case, undoubtedly, there was evidence that these goods which are now in dispute had been shipped on board this vessel. When I say there was evidence, I am not certain that one gets to any more definite idea of what the proposition is by calling it prima facie evidence, or by calling it by any other name which appears to diminish the value and the cogency of the evidence itself. Prima facie evidence may be very weak, or prima facie evidence in the ordinary sense of the words may be very strong. I think it is a proposition which is attributed to Lord Wensleydale, although I have not been able to verify it, that a man cutting a tree in a field was prima facie evidence that he was seised in the fee-simple of the land. That puts, I suppose, in the strongest point of view, what may be said to be the logical conclusion from the circumstances which are presented in evidence, and in the extreme case that Lord Wensleydale gave I suppose it would be very easy to displace that prima facie evidence, if it is prima facie evidence, by other circumstances shewing that it was not in the exercise of his own right that he was cutting down the tree, but in the exercise of somebody else's right. In the particular case with which your Lordships have to deal there is a receipt—I am using now popular words, because I do not think the particular form in which this question arises ought to weigh much upon one's attention; it is a receipt for goods—that is what it amounts to—given by the person who was authorised to give the receipt for the goods for the express purpose of making evidence against the person who received them. Whether it is a receipt for goods, or whether it is a receipt for money, or whether it is a receipt for anything else, I suppose no one can doubt that, without explanation and without shewing that there was some mistake made in the receipt, or that the receipt was given under a mistake, or that it was induced by fraud, the conclusion to which any tribunal having that question before it must necessarily come is that unless displaced by evidence, unless some such topic as that is suggested, the ordinary result follows that the thing which was done as an acknowledgment of the receipt must have its due effect given to it. In truth, if that were not so, it would be impossible to conduct business at all. It is true that in the case of this class of mercantile documents, which has a force and effect of its own and involves the rights of other people, it is more important to assert what I have been suggesting than in the case of other documents; but in truth it is, when you come back to it, a mere question of fact, Were those goods received on board or not? To my mind, no evidence has been given by the other side—no evidence at all—leading to any such conclusion as should upset the value, or the force, or the effect of the document so given. In saying that, I do not deny that everybody on board—I am overstating the case on that side, because some of them were not called—may have given evidence perfectly bona fide in the belief that their vigilance was not eluded. But what then? It is not the first time in my experience that I have heard a whole body of evidence given from which, if you believed it, the logical conclusion would be that the goods were not lost at all, and yet they were lost, and this fact must be accounted for.

No. 1.

Nov. 26, 1895.
Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited.

Now, my Lords, it appears to me that this being the merest question of fact, there is no evidence to displace the evidence of the document to which I have referred—the bill of lading. In speaking of the document I have used, as I said, popular terms, because I quite agree that one must trace up the bill of lading to its source—the mate's receipt and the tallymen's books; but all these things ultimately concur in producing the document which is the subject-matter of the controversy. It appears to me beyond all reasonable doubt that there is evidence of a cogent character, not displaced by any other evidence, not shaken in its effect or value by what has taken place before the Courts below. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the only logical course which your Lordships can pursue is to give effect to the evidence that has been given, and refuse to act on mere conjecture or guesswork as to how these goods may have been lost if in truth they got on board. To my mind, the cardinal fact is that the person properly appointed for the purpose of checking the receipt of the goods has given a receipt in which he has acknowledged, on behalf of the person by whom he was employed, that those goods were received. If that fact is once established, it becomes the duty of those who attempt to get rid of the effect of that fact to give some evidence from which your Lordships should infer that the goods never were on board at all. Under those circumstances, no such evidence having been given, I move your Lordships that this judgment be reversed, and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary be restored.

No. 1.

Nov. 26, 1895. Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited.

LORD WATSON.—The rule of law applicable to this case appears to me to be settled beyond dispute. The master of a ship has no authority to grant bills of lading for goods which were not put on board his vessel; but, when he signs a bill acknowledging the receipt of a specific quantity of goods, the shipowner is bound to deliver the full amount specified, unless he can shew that the whole or some part of it was in fact not shipped. If the owner is able to satisfy that onus, by proving a short shipment, he is, to that extent, relieved from the obligation which would otherwise attach to him under the bill of lading, even in a question with an onerous holder.

The facts of the present case which are not in controversy are that the master of the steamship "Emir," owned by the respondents, received in the River Hooghly, for conveyance to the port of Dundee, two parcels of jute, and signed two bills of lading, each for 500 bales, which were purchased by the appellants. The bales in each parcel were marked in the same way. The respondents have made delivery of 988 bales, and they allege and have led evidence with the view of proving that the remaining twelve bales were not shipped. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Kyllachy) found that they had failed to substantiate their allegation, but his decision was reversed by the learned Judges of the Second Division, who held it to be established that the twelve bales in question had not been put on board the "Emir." In these circumstances, although the issue raised is purely one of fact, your Lordships must determine which of these conflicting decisions ought to be sustained.

When evidence has been adduced for the purpose of instructing short shipment, I do not think it is of any advantage to examine critically the principle upon which his master's acknowledgment is held to bind the shipmaster when it is not contradicted by proof. Whether, when it is uncontradicted, the acknowledgment ought to be regarded as affording prima facie evidence, or as giving rise to a presumption that the goods were actually shipped, or in any other light, is not to my mind of materiality in the circumstances of this case. After inquiry such acknowledgment simply becomes part of the proof; its value must be tested with reference to the rest of the evidence; and the fact of shipment or non-shipment must be determined according to the import of the evidence taken as a whole. The importance of the bill of lading, as an adminicle of proof, is generally due to the fact that the statement of quantity which it contains, although not within the personal knowledge of the master, is made by him on the faith of information derived from his mate, and from servants of the ship who are employed for the express purpose of noting and checking the amount of cargo actually put on board. If there be no direct proof that, on the occasion when the disputed cargo was noted by the tallyman as having been shipped, there was a departure from or violation of the usual system of check followed by the ship, that circumstance is calculated to enhance the weight of the master's acknowledgment, because it tends to the reasonable inference (not necessarily conclusive) that the information conveyed to the master was correct.

I have fully considered the whole evidence in this case, both oral and documentary, with the result that I prefer the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary to that of the Second Division. After the observations made by the Lord Chancellor I do not think it necessary to enter into a detailed criticism of the proof. There is no evidence tending to shew directly that, at the time when the two parcels of jute were loaded, there was an error committed to the extent of twelve bales in the quantities noted, whether in consequence of fraud or of any other cause. That being so, the respondents' case must fail unless the other circumstances disclosed by the evidence are sufficient to warrant the inference that such error was actually committed. In my opinion they are not sufficient for that purpose, and I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The matter in controversy is one simply of fact to be determined on the evidence; and the question to be decided is, whether the respondents have proved that there was a short shipment of twelve bales of jute—that is, of twelve bales less than the captain, by the terms of the bill of lading, acknowledged to have been received. The onus is clearly on the respondents to prove the alleged short shipment, not only because of the bill of lading, but because it has been proved that the quantity of bales there acknowledged was fixed after the number and marks on the bales shipped had been carefully checked by tallymen employed by the shipowners under the superintendence of the chief mate, and after the mate had himself granted receipts to the lightermen representing the shippers corresponding as to quantities with the tallymen's notes. These detailed notes—the mate's receipts and the bills of lading—all evidence of acts by servants of the shipowners, form a strong and consistent body of proof that the shipment acknowledged under the captain's hand was actually made, and impose a heavy onus on the shipowner who alleges that nevertheless there was a deficiency, through non-shipment, in the quantity of goods shipped. What is the extent of this onus? Proof must be met by counter proof, and that counter proof will be insufficient if it be not strong enough to displace the consistent and clear evidence of the acts of the shipowners' own servants or employees. It will not be sufficient to shew that fraud may have been committed, or to suggest that the tallymen may have made errors or mistakes, in order to meet a case of positive proof on the other side. It must be shewn that there was in point of fact a short shipment—that is, the evidence must be sufficient to lead to the inference not merely that the goods may possibly not have been shipped, but that in point of fact they were not shipped. Any proposition short of this would appear to me to give less effect to the evidence of the shippers than that evidence ought to have, and unwarrantably to diminish the onus which that evidence has thrown on the shipowner.

Tried by this standard, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was right and ought not to have been disturbed. It is said that there is a body of proof, not as to fraud or error to the extent of twelve bales in regard to the particular quantities shipped and checked in detail, but generally that the whole quantities of jute (whatever these were) shipped on board at Calcutta were carried to Dundee and delivered there. For my part, I cannot at all place such reliance on general evidence of this class as on proof of detailed and careful checking of goods as they came on board followed by the mate's receipts and the bills of lading. To do so would very much destroy the value of bills of lading even where, as here, these are supported by proof that the materials on which the bills of lading proceeded were obtained after much care and pains taken to ensure correctness of quantities; whereas if the shipowner be held to be bound or affected by the acts of his own servants, this will only tend to make them all the more careful in the discharge of their duties, and especially careful to avoid giving bills of lading for goods not actually delivered to their custody.

No. 1.

Nov. 26, 1895. Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited.

It may be quite true that the fair inference from the whole evidence here is that there was no opportunity for the abstraction of bales at the ports at which the vessel called on her homeward voyage or on her arrival at Dundee, and that such cargo as was once put into the hold remained there till the end of the voyage. But proof of all this is not sufficient for the shipowners' case. The evidence does not make it quite clear that bales to the number of twelve may not have been removed from the ship's deck after being placed there and taken away by the lighters, particularly during work carried on in the evenings after dark. The use of the steam winch and tackle would not have been necessary for this purpose. It is said this suggestion is a speculative one only; and if the onus lay on the shippers the observation would be a very weighty one. No one can say that there is proof that such abstraction did take place. But it is for the shipowners to displace the shippers' evidence furnished by the acts of their own servants. It appears to me they do not do so by proof which does not exclude the possibility that the bales in question might have been abstracted from the ship's deck, or which does not make this so highly improbable that such a suggestion must be entirely thrown aside; for if this might have taken place they have failed to discharge the onus which lies on them of adducing such evidence as is sufficient to satisfy the Court that there was actual short shipment.

On these grounds, I concur in thinking that the judgment complained of should be reversed, and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary restored.

Lord Davey.—I concur with your Lordships that the bill of lading founded on the other documents which have been brought before us was prima facie evidence in favour of the appellants, which threw upon the respondents the onus of displacing it by evidence that the full quantity of the goods was not in fact shipped; and, without saying that there was no evidence, I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the burden has not been discharged by the respondents.

Judgment appealed from reversed, judgment of the Lord Ordinary restored, respondents to pay costs of the action in the Court of Session and of the appeal.

Downing, Holman, & Co.—Boyd, Jameson, & Kelly, W.S.—W. A. Crump & Son—Lindsay & Wallace, W.S.

No. 2.

Feb. 17, 1896. Johnstone v. Haviland.

Henrietta Maria Johnstone and Others (Johnstone's Testamentary Trustees) (Defenders), Appellants.—Johnston—C. K. Mackenzie.
John Haviland and Others (Strachey's Marriage-Contract Trustees) (Pursuers), Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Dickinson—Sym.

Succession—Marriage-contract Provision—Legacy—Satisfaction—Debitor non præsumitur donare—Proof—Extrinsic Evidence.—In an antenuptial

No. 2.

Feb. 17, 1896.
Johnstone v. Haviland.

marriage-settlement between S. and C., his intended wife, J., a stranger, covenanted to pay, at his death, to the marriage-contract trustees £4000 free of duty, with interest at 4 per cent from that date till payment, to be held for C. and her husband, or survivor, in liferent, and their children in fee, and failing children, to be held for J. absolutely. By the marriage-contract C. was bound to assign acquirenda to her marriage-contract trustees to be held in trust for behoof of herself and her children, and failing children, her executors. By his trust-disposition and settlement J. directed his trustees to pay "a legacy" of £4000 to C., providing that she should be allowed 5 per cent interest so long as she should allow it to remain "as part of the share of the Indigo Concern." Held (1) (aff. judgment of Second Division) that this legacy was not in satisfaction of the marriage-contract provision, and that J.'s trustees were bound to pay both sums; and (2) that J.'s trustees were not entitled to lead evidence to shew that J. used the word "legacy" as meaning "provision."

(In the Court of Session, Feb. 22, 1895, 22 R. 397.)

Mr Johnstone's trustees appealed.

The appellants asked for a remit to allow evidence to be led to shew that Mr Johnstone believed that in making the legacy he was implementing his obligation in the marriage-contract.[1]

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschel.
Lord Macnaghten.
Lord Morris.
Lord Shand.

Lord Chancellor.—In this case the question is susceptible of a very short solution. Had the English rule of law prevailed, I am not quite certain that we should not have been involved in this case in a good many difficulties; what the ultimate decision might have been it is immaterial to inquire. The English law, of course, is now established, as Lord Wensleydale said in Kippen v. Darley,[2]—"The rule is now by a long course of decisions firmly and fully established, and cannot be disputed." He adds, what I entirely concur with, "and any comment upon it would now be worse than useless." But after the decision of Kippen v. Darley[2] it is no longer competent to your Lordships to assume that the rule of law—the presumption arising from what are called double portions—is applicable to the law of Scotland. That was a decision upon that very question in this House, and we are therefore remitted to the simple question as it arises under Scottish jurisprudence.

Now, although the two sets of provisions are very different, both in their application and in the decisions upon them, there is one observation which was made by Sir John Leach with reference to the English rule which is, to my mind, applicable to the Scottish rule. Sir John Leach said in Weall v. Rice[3],—"It is not possible to define what are to be considered as slight differences between two provisions." "Slight differences," he adds—and one cannot help observing that after the learned Judge had said it is not possible to define, he begins with something like a definition—"are such as, in the opinion of the Judge, leave the two provisions substantially of the same nature; and every Judge must decide that question"—of what are slight differences—"for himself." My Lords, I believe that to be perfectly true as applicable to the construction of the instrument now under your Lordships' consideration, and although I propose to mention one or two

[1] Ex parte Pye, 2 Wh. and T., 5th edn. 377, 6th edn. 401; Booker v. Allen, 2 Russ. & My. 270.

[2] 3 Macq. 258, 30 Scot. Jur. 567.

[3] 2 Russ. & My. at p. 268.

No. 2.

Feb. 17, 1896.
Johnstone v. Haviland.

differences between the two provisions, I protest against anybody hereafter arguing from the particular provisions to which I refer that I am laying down, or affecting to lay down, any general proposition which governs other instruments. I am speaking of this instrument with all its circumstances, with all its conditions, and the language which I find therein. There is no greater source of error than, where you have been dealing with one instrument, and dealing with it upon what are general principles of construction, and pointing to the particular provisions of it as exhibiting the necessity of applying those general principles of construction, to apply any observations made with regard to the particular language used, or the particular circumstances in which the language is used, as amounting to a general canon of construction which is applicable to all other instruments whatsoever, though the language may be different, though the collocation may be different, and though the circumstances with which the instrument is dealing may be entirely different. I am therefore only endeavouring to construe this particular instrument; and when I look at the two instruments in this case, it appears to me that they differ in very material particulars. There is in the one instrument the language of gift. There is in the other instrument the language of obligation. And I find that where the two things are dealt with they are dealt with differently. In the first deed the obligation is an obligation to the trustees; whereas in the second deed the gift is a gift to the lady herself. And although it may be perfectly true that the gift to the trustees was for the benefit of the lady herself, I am endeavouring to find out from the language of the instrument itself what was in the mind of the testator at the time when he wrote those words; and I cannot doubt that the person who writes these words has in his mind the fact that the provision he has already made for the trustees is a different thing from giving to the lady herself. And although it will, indeed, by a circuitous process, perhaps, come round to the trustees, yet it is not the same thing. Therefore, when I am asked to say whether these two are to be read as one, and the one is to be in substitution for the other, I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that the person who wrote these words was under the impression that he was doing what he said he was doing—making a gift, and not implementing the obligation into which he had already entered.

For these reasons—and they are very short and simple ones—it appears to me that we must affirm the judgment of the Court below; and I confess it seems to me that it would be very difficult, getting rid as I say of the confusion that has arisen in some of the English cases from a different rule of law, to suggest that anybody can read these two documents and suppose that the one was intended to be in substitution for the other. That seems to me to be enough to say on the principal argument addressed to us, long as that argument lasted.

With regard to the question of interest, I entirely decline to deal with that. I neither understand that any such question was properly raised in the Court below, nor that there are any materials upon which your Lordships could properly entertain the question again. The fact that interest of some sort or other was admitted to be due, or was not contested to be due, is conclusive against the point as to there being any right to recover it; and if it comes to be a mere question of the amount of interest which ought to be allowed, I have neither the materials nor does there appear to be any ground for altering what the Court has already done.

For these reasons I submit to your Lordships that the proper judgment is, that the interlocutor should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that there is according to the law of Scotland no presumption which necessarily governs the decision of the present case. The Court have to consider together the obligatory provision made in favour of Mrs Strachey by her marriage-contract, and the voluntary provision which is made in her favour by the will of the late Mr Johnstone; and to determine whether the testator meant to substitute the second of these provisions for the first of them. I think the only materials to which we can legitimately refer in deciding that question are, first, the terms of the marriage-contract, and in the second place, the terms of the settlement, which must be read in the light of a known maxim of Scottish law, Debitor non presumitur donare. But that maxim will only prevail in cases where, according to the opinion of the Court upon the terms of the documents, the construction of the will favours the substitution of a new and substantially similar provision for the onerous provision which had been previously made in the marriage-contract.

With regard to this case, having indicated the view which ought to be taken in considering it, I have only to add that I agree in the conclusion which has been expressed by the Lord Chancellor. Prima facie there is the gift as a legacy. I do not say that is sufficient by itself, but in this case it is coupled with such differences in the character of the two provisions that the one cannot in my estimation be held to be in substitution for the other.

With regard to the tender of evidence made by the pursuer at the Bar, whatever authority there may be for the admission of such evidence in the law of England, it is contrary to the rules of the law of Scotland. The other points pleaded by the learned counsel were very technical, and are open to this objection, that they are not pleaded on the record, and were not considered by the Court below.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. I think the maxim which has been so often referred to is a maxim which embodies common sense; it is only this, that a debtor is not presumed to make a gift. That is, of course, very far from implying that he may not perfectly well make a gift. I take it to mean this, and this only, that where a debtor makes a disposition of his property in favour of his creditor under circumstances such that a gift would be presumed in the case of a person who was not his creditor, it will not be presumed in the case of a person who is; it will then be regarded as a discharge of his obligation. But if there are circumstances which indicate that he did not intend it to be a mere discharge of his obligation, but intended to benefit the creditor and so make that person an object of his bounty, then it is just as effectual as though no such relationship existed between them. It comes then to be a question of fact to be determined in each case, whether there is enough to shew that he did not intend the disposition to be in satisfaction of his obligation, but did intend it to be a gift.

No. 2.
Feb. 17, 1896.
Johnstone v. Haviland.

I agree with my noble and learned friends who have preceded me that there is ample to shew this in the present case. I am not going over the circumstances again beyond stating that my mind is influenced not by one thing alone but by a combination of things—by the fact that it is described as a "legacy," by the circumstance that it is given to the lady and not to the trustees to whom the obligation was; and if it be said in answer that the testator would know that giving it to her was the same thing as giving it to the trustees because of the covenant she had come under, then I say, in reply to that, you must again take into account the fact that he gives it coupled with a benefit or privilege which she could not enjoy if those trusts were carried out. Taking all those considerations together, I am satisfied that it was intended to be a gift, and not in satisfaction of an obligation.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think effect could be given to the argument on behalf of the appellants without overruling, directly or indirectly, the judgment of this House in Kippen v. Darley.[1] Once it has been established that the rule against double portions does not obtain in Scotland, it appears to me there is no substantial ground on which it can be contended that the obligation of the marriage settlement has been extinguished by the will.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of the same opinion. I think there can be no doubt that, according to the law of Scotland in a case of this class, the maxim Debitor non præsumitur donare has a direct application in the first instance. The testator had three years before he made his will come under an obligation to pay a sum of £4000 to marriage-contract trustees for behoof of Mrs Strachey and any children of the marriage. When we find that three years afterwards when he made his will he gives the lady the same sum, I think the presumption is against donation. Accordingly, if there had been here a mere direction to the trustees to pay the money to the marriage-contract trustees or even to herself, and nothing beyond that, or if the words used were not to be held by implication to go further, the maxim would have received effect. But, my Lords, the language of the will, I think, shews that he did not intend merely to discharge a debt, but to confer an additional benefit. Your Lordships have referred to most of the circumstances which lead to this inference, and I shall not enlarge upon them, but they are mainly these:—In the first place, there is the use of the word "legacy." As to that I agree with what was said by Lord Moncreiff in the Balfour case,[2] which has been referred to, that though that is not necessarily conclusive, it must be held to be of great weight in a case of this kind. It rather implies gift than payment of debt. But in addition to this we have, as has been pointed out, the circumstance that the two sums are payable to different persons, namely, the provision to the trustees of the marriage-contract, and the legacy to Mrs Strachey herself. Then what seems to me to be much more material is the further fact, that in giving this legacy there are two benefits or advantages given to Mrs

[1] 3 Macq. 203, 30 Scot. Jur. 563.
[2] Balfour v. Balfour's Trustees, March 10, 1842, 4 D. 1044.

No. 2.

Feb. 17, 1896.
Johnstone v. Haviland.

Strachey which she never could have had under the marriage-contract. The first of these is that the legacy when given by her to the marriage-contract trustees under her obligation to transfer acquirenda to them is to be held on a different destination from that of the marriage-contract provision. The ultimate destination under the marriage-contract in case of the failure of issue is that the sum provided is to revert to Mr Johnstone's heirs; while the destination under the will would, failing children, leave the legacy at the disposal of Mrs Strachey herself. In addition to that, as has been pointed out, the testator has expressly altered the rate of interest in the two cases. Under the marriage-contract 4 per cent is fixed as the limit, while under the will Mrs Strachey has a right to have 5 per cent by leaving the money bequeathed to her in the indigo business. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that it is a matter of direct inference that the testator intended to confer, and has given, an additional benefit by his will.

It has been said that there are other provisions in the same clause which tend to shew that the testator was only providing for the fulfilment of his obligation under the marriage-contract. In the same clause which provides for the legacy to Mrs Strachey there is a direction to pay an annuity of £300 to a lady to whom he was under an obligation by a bond of annuity for that amount. The appellants' counsel maintains that in the case of this annuity there is clearly no duplication, but a provision only for fulfilment of the testator's obligation, and for the purpose of the argument this may be assumed to be so. There are obviously considerations which support the view that the legacy to Mrs Strachey is an additional benefit which do not apply in the case of the annuity in the use of the word "legacy," and the other circumstances to which I have specially referred. But whatever may be said of the direction as to the annuity, there is in the same clause also a provision in favour of the testator's widow, which, like the legacy to Mrs Strachey, gives her additional benefits beyond those for which he was under obligation to grant. I have only to add that I think there has been no sufficient ground shewn for disturbing the judgment of the Court with regard to the rate of interest.

I entirely concur with what has been said by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson that such evidence as was proposed to be led could not be admitted under the law of evidence in Scotland. It is said that the evidence is not proposed for the purpose of shewing the intention of the testator—we are to gather that from the deed—but for the purpose of shewing that he used the word "legacy" in a sense that was not its ordinary sense, and I think that evidence for such a purpose,—that is for the purpose of substituting the word "provision" for the word "legacy" used by the testator,—is clearly inadmissible.

On these grounds I am of opinion with your Lordships that the judgment appealed against should be affirmed.

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that the interlocutor of 22d February 1895 complained of be affirmed: Further ordered, that the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal.

PRESTON, STOW, & PRESTON—J. C. & A. STEUART—JANSON, COBB, PEARSON, & CO.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.

No. 3.

JAMES WILLIAM LITTLE (Pursuer), Appellant.—Joseph Walton, Q.C.—Leck.

Mar. 19, 1896. Little v. Stevenson & Co.

STEVENSON & COMPANY (Defenders), Respondents.—Bigham, Q.C.—Boyd—J. J. Cook.

Ship—Charter-party—Delay in providing cargo—Appeal—Findings in fact.—A charter-party provided that the s.s. "River Ettrick" should proceed to Bo'ness and receive a cargo, to be brought alongside within sixty running hours, and that demurrage should be paid at a specified rate, "lay-days to count from the time the master has got ship reported berthed and ready to receive or deliver cargo, and given notice of the same in writing to charterers or their agents during business hours."

On 17th October the shipowner wrote to the charterers that the "River Ettrick" had left for Bo'ness, and asked them to supply a cargo for the 19th. The "River Ettrick" arrived in Bo'ness Roads on the 19th, but in consequence of the crowded state of the dock she was not allowed to enter. On the 21st October a loading berth became vacant, as cargoes were not ready for certain vessels which had arrived before the "River Ettrick." If a cargo had been ready for the "River Ettrick," she would have been allowed to enter the dock and would have got this berth, but as no cargo was ready she was not allowed to enter the dock. She was docked on the 26th, berthed for loading on the 27th, and sailed on the 28th October.

The shipowners sued the charterers for demurrage or damages, alleging that a delay of ninety-four hours had been caused by the fault of the defenders, in not having a cargo ready on 21st October.

The Second Division assoilzied the defenders, finding "that the vessel arrived in Bo'ness Roads on 19th October, but was not able, and was not allowed, to enter the dock on account of the crowded state of the dock until the 26th October. . . . that the 'River Ettrick' did not arrive at her charter port of shipment, and that the lay-days did not begin to run until the said 26th October, when the 'River Ettrick' got into dock," and that the defenders were not liable in demurrage. There was no finding in fact that there was a berth vacant on 21st October, and that the vessel would have been allowed to enter the dock on that day if a cargo had been ready, but it was mentioned in the opinion of the Court in delivering judgment.

In an appeal brought by the pursuer he contended that as the Court had not in their findings given all the facts proved material to his claim for damages, there should be a remit to have the defect supplied.

Held, without determining whether the findings in fact excluded a remit, that there was no rule of law requiring a shipper in every port and in all circumstances to have a cargo ready to meet the unexpected contingency of a berth being open to a vessel out of its regular turn, and therefore that the fact founded on was not material, and judgment affirmed.

Per Lord Herschell,—"I think it would be extremely desirable that in the case of these appeals from the Sheriff Court all the facts material to the contentions of either of the parties, even though not material to the point on which the judgment proceeds, should be found in the interlocutor."

(IN the Court of Session, June 26, 1895, 22 R. 796.)

The pursuer appealed.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Ld. Herschell. Lord Macnaghten. Lord Morris.

The pursuer contended that his claim was not for demurrage, but for damages caused by the defenders failing to provide a cargo on 21st October. If a cargo had then been ready the vessel would have been admitted into the dock and obtained a berth. This fact was not found in the interlocutor appealed against, but it was stated in the opinion of the Court delivered by Lord Trayner. When the Court of Session had not exhausted the issue raised upon record by findings of fact upon points which were material to the case, a remit should be made to have findings upon these points.*

The respondents in reply contended that the finding in the interlocutor that the vessel was unable and was not allowed to enter the dock "on account of the crowded state of the dock until 26th October" excluded the fact founded on by the appellant, and the House could not go beyond the finding.†

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I confess that I myself am under a very strong impression that it is not open to the appellant here to raise the argument which has principally occupied your Lordships' attention. I think the language of 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, is very material indeed, which is—(His Lordship quoted the section).†

I confess I cannot read those words as allowing the possibility of placing in the interlocutor as found a new set of facts which may make the language ambiguous. As they stand they are supposed to be exhaustively disposing

* The interlocutor was in these terms:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Recall also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 1st August 1894: Find that by charter-party, dated 5th October 1893, the defenders chartered from the pursuer the steamship 'River Ettrick' to carry a cargo of coal from Bo'ness to King's Lynn: Find that the coals were to be brought alongside in forty-eight, or, as was afterwards arranged, sixty running hours, and if longer detained, demurrage to be paid at 12s. 6d. per hour, unless detention arose from certain specified causes: Find that it was further provided that lay-days were to count from the time the master had got the ship reported berthed and ready to receive or deliver cargo, and given notice of the same in writing to the charterers or their agents during business hours, say between 9 A.M. and 5 P.M.: Find that the vessel arrived in Bo'ness roads on the 19th day of October, but was not able and was not allowed to enter said dock on account of the crowded state of the dock until the 26th of October, which day she was docked at 2.30 P.M.: Find that the loading of the vessel was completed on 28th October at 4 P.M.: Find that the 'River Ettrick' did not arrive at her charter port of shipment, and that the lay-days did not begin to run, until the said 26th day of October, when the 'River Ettrick' got into the dock: Find further that no notice was given in terms of the said charter-party to the defenders that the vessel was reported berthed and ready to receive cargo: Find that the defenders are not liable to the pursuer in any sum in name of demurrage: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find them entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court."

† 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40,—"That when in causes commenced in any of the Courts of the Sheriffs or of the magistrates of burghs or other inferior Courts matter of fact shall be disputed and a proof shall be allowed and taken according to the present practice, the Court of Session shall, in reviewing the judgment proceeding on such proof, distinctly specify in their interlocutor the several facts material to the case which they find to be established by the proof, and express how far their judgment proceeds on the matter of fact so found or on matter of law, and the several points of law which they mean to decide; and the judgment on the cause thus pronounced shall be subject to appeal to the House of Lords in so far only as the same depends on or is affected by matter of law, but shall, in so far as relates to the facts, be held to have the force and effect of a special verdict of a jury, finally and conclusively fixing the several facts specified in the interlocutor."

No. 3.
Mar. 19, 1896.
Little v. Stevenson & Co.

of the facts. It appears to me that the interlocutor is absolutely inconsistent with the argument as presented to your Lordships on behalf of the appellant. It may not, however, be necessary to determine that question, because I am not certain that we are all agreed upon this subject, but on the argument presented before us I cannot understand there being any doubt at all.

This action is not raised upon any specific provision in the charter-party at all. The contract relations between the persons who entered into that contract do not specifically apply to the case now suggested to be open to the appellant to argue. What is suggested is this—not that the provision in respect of demurrage ever in fact arose, because it certainly did not arise, but that inasmuch as there was a default on the part of the shippers to provide coal, which default by a series of causes prevented the vessel obtaining her berth, therefore the default was in the shippers, and accordingly the shipowners have made good this claim.

Now, when one comes to examine the series of propositions which establish that cause of action it comes to this—it is true that the provision for demurrage in the charter-party itself never arose. The ship got to Bo'ness on the 19th in the roads. As a matter of fact she never got into the dock, and never got into a berth ready for loading, until October 26. But the harbourmaster gave evidence that if there had been a cargo ready she might have got in sooner. A vessel had forfeited her right to continue at her berth according to the harbourmaster's views because she had not completed her loading, and therefore he sent her away from the berth at which she was lying. If all this had been known to the parties, and if the harbourmaster had in his discretion allowed the "River Ettrick" to come, as I understand he says he would have allowed her to come in, then this vessel might have got in on the 21st.

That is the proposition of fact. The proposition of law is that a merchant must be always ready with his cargo at all times and in all places and under all circumstances to take advantage of any such contingency if it should arise. There is not a fragment of authority for any such proposition. And I can imagine it would be a most serious thing if such a proposition were supposed to be laid down to regulate the mercantile community, because it might very seriously imperil the conduct of merchants in their business if it were to be supposed that all those twenty or thirty ships (for it is said there were twenty or thirty ships there) were guilty of a breach of an implied duty (the charter-party being in the ordinary form) in not having all their cargoes ready. I think I am entitled to say that no such case has ever been suggested in the Courts. I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Herschell.—I am of the same opinion. The question which the appellant seeks to raise at the bar is not raised by any finding of fact in the interlocutor. The utmost that could be done under any circumstances would be to remit the case with the view of having the facts which raised the point, if they were facts that had been really found in the appellant's favour in the Court below, inserted in the interlocutor. If the findings in the interlocutor are at variance with and contradict the facts which it is sought to have found, then, of course, there would be no ground for sending the case back. This House would be bound by the findings in the interlocutor. I cannot help saying this, that being very desirous of not in any way departing from the spirit of the statute which prevents appeals to this House except upon facts found in the interlocutor, I think it would be extremely desirable that in the case of these appeals from the Sheriff Court all the facts material to the contentions of either of the parties, even though not material to the point on which the judgment proceeds, should be found in the interlocutor.

No. 3.

Mar. 19, 1896.
Little v. Stevenson & Co.

Now, in this case, the facts raising one point of law, which was discussed and debated, and upon which a decision was pronounced in the Court of Session, are not found in the interlocutor at all. Whatever may be the true construction of the later words, and even if, looking at them alone, they are inconsistent with those facts, it is obvious, and no one can read the judgment without seeing, that they were not intended to be inconsistent with them; and that in truth the facts relating to this point are not found at all. It is true that the Court below decided the question against the appellant on another and a different ground altogether; but it seems to me that that was no reason for abstaining from finding in the interlocutor those facts upon which not only a point of law depended, but a point of law which was decided in favour of the appellant. I think they should have been stated, because although, for reasons which I will give in a moment, I do not think they would have been sufficient, differing as I do from what was said by Lord Trayner, to entitle the appellant to judgment, yet at the same time it was a matter for discussion here, and a different view might have been taken of the point on appeal.

It is not necessary to say whether the finding as worded in the latter part of the interlocutor is inconsistent with those facts or not, because I am of opinion that, even supposing all the facts upon which the learned counsel for the appellant rely were stated, there would be no case made out for disturbing the judgment of the Court below. The case suggested on behalf of the appellant is this: By the charter-party the ship was to proceed to Bo'ness, and she was to load at a berth to be selected by the charterer, and the lay-days were to count from the time when she was berthed and notice was given to the charterer. Undoubtedly that would impose by implication upon the charterer the duty of doing any act that was necessary on his part, according to the custom of the port, to enable her to get a berth. He could not defend himself from a complaint of the shipowner that his vessel had been delayed by saying that she was not in a berth, when she was not there because the charterer himself had failed in his duty to do some act on his part to enable her to get there. The appellant's case, therefore, is put in this way. It is said, although she did not get into a berth until October 26th, she might have got into a berth on the 21st if the respondents had done an act which they failed to do, namely, had a cargo ready there. That arises in this way: in ordinary turn she could not have been berthed until the 26th, but, owing to a vessel which was in berth not having her cargo there, the harbourmaster would have put the "River Ettrick" into that berth if her cargo had been ready to be immediately put on board. The question is whether on these mere facts there was an obligation on the part of the charterer to have the cargo on the quay so that the vessel might have been berthed on the 21st. It is alleged that the obligation existed in point of law, that at all ports, under all circumstances, however unreasonable it might be to anticipate such a contingency, however deficient the quay might be in the means necessary for storing, or protecting, or preserving cargo, whatever difficulties there might be in short, that was an obligation always resting upon the shipper.

No. 3.

Mar. 19, 1896.
Little v. Stevenson & Co.

No authority has been cited for that proposition, and I am of opinion that such a construction of the shipper's obligation would be altogether unreasonable. I do not for a moment deny that he is bound to do whatever is reasonable on his part, with the view of getting the ship berthed at the earliest period that is reasonably possible; and it may be that in certain circumstances, owing to the custom of the port, owing to contingencies of this kind being very common, owing to the provision that is made to facilitate cargo remaining there for a few days, and a variety of other circumstances, it would be the duty of the shipper to be prepared by having his cargo there to enable the vessel to obtain an earlier berthing than would otherwise have been obtained. All that, I say, may be the case; but no such facts are found in the present case; and the appeal can only be decided in favour of the appellant by holding that at all ports and under all circumstances, however remote and improbable might be the contingency, the duty lay upon the charterer to have cargo there. That is a proposition to which I am unable to give my assent. For these reasons I agree in thinking that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LOWLESS & CO.—WILSON & SON—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.

No. 4.

Mar. 26, 1896.
Ogston v. Stewart.

ALEXANDER M. OGSTON (Pursuer), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Haldane, Q.C.—Abel.
DAVID STEWART AND ANOTHER (Stewart's Trustees) (Defenders), Respondents.—D.-F. Asher, Q.C.—D. Dundas.

Fishings—Salmon-fishings—Glebe—Designation—Kirk Lands—Prescription.—The estates of Ardoe and Banchory, on the south bank of the River Dee, marched inland, but at the river side were separated by the glebe of Banchory-Devenick, which extended along the river for 350 yards. No right of salmon-fishing attached to the glebe.

In 1892 the proprietor of Ardoe, the western property, raised an action against the proprietor of Banchory for declarator that under his title to the lands and salmon-fishings of Ardoe he had an exclusive right to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of that part of the glebe which extended along the river from the eastern march of Ardoe to a point 130 yards eastwards where the drain from the manse offices entered the river, alleging that this part of the glebe had been designated from Ardoe.

The defender, who was proprietor of the barony of Banchory and of the Kirkton of Banchory, alleged that the whole glebe had been designated from Kirkton.

The titles to Ardoe included a right to the salmon-fishings which had been recognised by the Crown. They shewed that the lands had belonged to the abbot and convent of Arbroath, and had been feued by them.

No. 4.

Mar. 26, 1896.
Ogston v. Stewart.

The lands forming the barony of Banchory had also been feued by the abbot and convent of Arbroath. Kirkton belonged to the see of Old Machar until 1571, when it was feued by the Bishop. In 1618 it was acquired by the proprietor of the barony.

It appeared that the glebe was designated by the Presbytery in 1602, but there was no evidence to shew from what lands it had been designated, or that Kirkton had a riparian boundary. At that date the Act 1593, c. 165, was in force, which provided that in cases where there was no glebe, or a glebe of less than four acres, the designation of a glebe should be made "of the parson, vicar, abbot, or prior lands, and failing thereof, out of the bishop's lands, friar's lands, or any other kirk land lying within the bounds of the said parish."

The proof shewed that the right of fishing in dispute was of little value, and could only be exercised by rod and line, and that the pursuer had possessed in this way for more than the prescriptive period. A lease of the salmon-fishings of Banchory had been granted in 1850, subject to conditions of let which stated that "the western boundary is at the manse offices." The tenant under this lease, and renewals thereof for thirty-seven years, stated as a witness that he had never tried to fish further west than the manse offices.

The First Division held that the pursuer had failed to prove that any part of the glebe had been taken from Ardoe, and sustained a plea by the defender that "the pursuer has no title or right to the salmon-fishings in question."

In an appeal, held (rev. the judgment) (1) that in the absence of direct evidence as to the lands from which the glebe had been designated in 1602, it was to be inferred that the glebe had been taken from the abbot's lands of Banchory and Ardoe, and not from the bishop's lands of Kirkton; (2) that the pursuer's possession was sufficient, and that the possession by both parties shewed that the drain was the boundary between the salmon-fishings of the barony of Banchory and Ardoe; and (3) that the pursuer had, in a question with the defender, right to the fishings in dispute.

Prescription—Salmon-fishings.—A right of salmon-fishing is an estate in land in the sense of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and the possession of salmon-fishings for twenty years is prescriptive possession.

(In the Court of Session, Nov. 28, 1893, 21 R. 282.)

The pursuer appealed.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.
Lord Davey.

Lord Watson.—The appellant is proprietor of the lands of Ardoe, whilst the respondent is proprietor of the lands of Banchory and others, both estates being in the parish of Banchory-Devenick and county of Kincardine, and bounded on the north by the River Dee. The parochial glebe of Banchory-Devenick, which also has the river for its northern boundary, is situated between these properties, marching at the river-side with Ardoe on the west and with Banchory on the east. In this action the appellant concludes for declarator that he has the exclusive right of fishing for salmon ex adverso of the westmost portion of the glebe lands between the march with Ardoe and a drain which leads from the manse offices to the river. The claim thus asserted relates to a stretch of water about 135 yards in length, which, according to the evidence, is incapable of being profitably fished with the net, and is of little value for angling purposes.

It is not matter of dispute in this case that the salmon-fishings of the glebe lands, to the east of these 135 yards, belong to and have been possessed from time immemorial by the respondent and his predecessors in title, along with the fishings to the east of the glebe. Each of the parties avers that the fishings in dispute are within the ambit of his title from the Crown; and also that he has had continuous and exclusive possession during and beyond the period of prescription, which, in the case of rights such as that of salmon-fishing, has been reduced from forty to twenty years by sec. 34 of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act of 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94). On record, the respondent maintains alternatively that he has a joint right to the fishings with the appellant. Accordingly, the only issue raised by the pleadings is whether the fishings in dispute belong to the appellant or to the respondent, or to both of them. Upon that footing a proof was allowed, and was led before the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff), who gave judgment for the appellant.

No. 4.

Mar. 26, 1896.
Ogston v. Stewart.

When the case was heard before the First Division the respondent was allowed to add a plea to the effect that the appellant "has no title or right to the salmon-fishings in question," which was sustained by the Court upon the ground that the appellant had not established such an amount of possession as would be sufficient, in a question with the Crown, either to sustain a prescriptive right, or to shew that the fishings were within his title. The learned Judges therefore recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, assoilzied the respondent, and found the appellant liable in expenses. In the view which they took, it appears to me that the course which their Lordships ought to have followed was, not to grant absolvitor, but to direct intimation to be made to the Crown authorities, so as to give them an opportunity of appearing in this process, or of bringing a separate action, the present suit being stayed in order to await the result of these proceedings. It might have been more satisfactory if that course had been adopted; but, after hearing the argument upon this appeal, I can find no reason why your Lordships should not dispose of it upon its merits, and put an end to this litigation. The question presented for decision upon the record and evidence is substantially one of boundary between two neighbouring proprietors; and, in my opinion, there are no elements in the proof which naturally or necessarily suggest that the Crown has a prima facie claim to the fishings in question. If the Crown should have a well-founded claim, it cannot be prejudiced by a decision between the parties to this appeal.

Before referring to the evidence I shall notice the titles under which the parties respectively contend that they have an express grant of the fishings in question from the Crown.

The estate of Ardoe, as now vested in the appellant, was originally the property of the Church. It belonged to the abbot and convent of Arbroath, by whom it was disponed in feu to laymen, about the end of the fifteenth century, in two separate parcels, described as the "Sunny" and "Shadowy" halves. In both cases the disposition was with the salmon-fishings in the Dee adjacent to the half conveyed; and that right has all along been recognised by the Crown, and continued in the subsequent progress of the appellant's titles.

The respondent's estate of Banchory is made up of two parcels, which have been held by the same proprietor since the year 1618, but anciently belonged to two different ecclesiastical bodies. The lands and barony of Banchory, with their salmon-fishings in the river of Dee, were, in the thirteenth century, feued out by the abbot and convent of Arbroath to the Justiciar of Scotland, and have since been held by laymen. The Kirkton of Banchory belonged to the see of Old Machar until 1571, when it was feued by the bishop, with the consent of the dean and chapter. It was acquired by Alexander Gardyne of Banchory in the year 1618. Down to that date the Kirkton titles contained no grant of salmon-fishing. In November 1743, a successor of Alexander Gardyne, by the same deed, disponed the lands and barony of Banchory and also the Kirkton to Alexander Thomson, "with the whole salmon-fishing in the water of Dee belonging to the said whole lands"; and in May 1744 the disponee, under the procuratory contained in that disposition, expede a crown charter of resignation, in which these lands are granted "cum integra salmonum piscatione super aquam de Dee ad dictas terras spectante."

The proof led by the parties, which I do not think it necessary to examine in detail, is chiefly directed to two matters, the first of these being the extent of possession of the disputed fishings which has been exercised by the parties respectively within and beyond the years of prescription; and the second, the point which has been reputed to be, and has been recognised as, the boundary between their fishings.

The evidence of possession, as might well have been anticipated in a case of this kind, cannot with propriety be described as full and satisfactory. But, having regard to the barren nature of the subject which forms the stake in this action, the possession of the appellant and his predecessors, and others in their right, exercised by rod and line, which was the only suitable method, appears to me to have been as extensive as might have been expected of a single proprietor who had a clear title from the Crown. There is no doubt a certain degree of complication arising from the fact that there is evidence of persons from the Banchory estate having angled in the disputed water. When, however, the evidence as to the boundary observed during the time when these incursions were made is taken into account, as in my opinion it ought to be, I cannot regard them as acts intentionally adverse to, and, therefore, as neutralising the effect of the possession proved by the appellant.

The evidence, in so far as it bears upon the second point, the question of fishing boundary, appears to me, as it did to the Lord Ordinary, to be in favour of the appellant. In arriving at that conclusion, I do not rely upon the respondent's admission, in a letter of July 16, 1889, to the effect that the fishing boundary now claimed by the appellant "had never been disputed by anyone." The respondent has retracted that admission, and has explained in his testimony that the letter was written under a misapprehension, upon information received by him from one Mackie, now in America, who was at that time, and had for many years previously been, ground officer on the estate of Banchory. It is, however, impossible to discard the fact that the information was given to him by his own servant, who presumably had the best means of knowing the truth, and Mackie's information is, in my opinion, corroborated by the proof. In November 1850 the whole of the Banchory salmon-fishings, including those ex adverso of the glebe, were offered on lease, and were taken by Robert Clark for three seasons, commencing on February 1, 1851. The conditions of let prepared by the proprietor and accepted by the tenant state that "the western boundary is at the manse offices." Clark from time to time renewed his tenancy upon the same terms, until he obtained a lease for nineteen years from Martinmas 1868 of a farm upon the estate of Banchory, "along with the salmon-fishing on the Dee presently occupied by him." Clark was examined as a witness, and stated that during his occupation under these leases, covering a period of thirty-seven years, he "never tried to fish further west than the manse offices of Banchory-Devenick." In the face of that evidence, which is practically uncontradicted, I am unable to regard an occasional cast in the disputed water by persons coming from the estate of Banchory as an assertion of their right to it by the proprietors of that estate.

No. 4.

Mar. 26, 1896.
Ogston v. Stewart.

Assuming the appellant to have made out his case, in so far as concerns possession by rod-fishing and the recognised boundary between his fishings and those of the respondent, these facts will not avail him unless he is able to shew that his possession, or right of fishing, can be reasonably ascribed to his title as proprietor of Ardoe. The respondent alleges, on record, that the glebe was designed "out of the church lands of the Kirkton of Banchory," and consequently that, after its designation, "the right to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the glebe remained in the proprietors of Banchory," and if these statements were substantiated, the appellant would not be in a position to ask decree in terms of his summons. There is no direct evidence in support of the allegation that the glebe was designed out of the lands of the Kirkton; it rests upon mere conjecture, and, in my opinion, there are various considerations which strongly point to a different conclusion.

It appears from the minute-book of the Presbytery of Aberdeen that the glebe was designated by them in March 1602. The difficulties which beset this part of the case have arisen from the fact that the presbytery-clerk, though he left a blank space for the purpose, has omitted to enter the formal act of designation, which, if it had been extant, would have shewn the particular lands which were taken from their owners, or given up by them, in order to constitute the glebe of the parish. There seems no reason to doubt that the glebe as then designated, with the exception of some immaterial alterations of boundary which were made about the year 1837, has ever since been possessed by Mr Robert Mercer, the incumbent of 1602, and his successors in the benefice. The parsonage of Banchory-Devenick was anciently held by a prebend of Old Machar, who had his residence in Aberdeen, the cure being served by a vicar, who in all likelihood had a residence at Banchory-Devenick. It is, however, obvious that in 1602 the minister's demand for a glebe and the lands assigned to him included a much larger area than had previously been occupied by the vicar.

The statutes from which, in the year 1602, the authority of presbyteries to allocate glebes for the reformed clergy was derived were 1563, c. 72, 1572, c. 48, 1592, c. 118, and 1593, c. 165. By these Acts the powers of the presbytery had been gradually increased, but they did not as yet extend beyond church lands, i.e., lands which either were or had at one time been the property of the Church. The Act of 1593 (Thomson's Acts, vol. iv. p. 17) provided that, in cases where there was no glebe, or where the old glebe was less than four acres, the designation was to be made "of the parson, vicar, abbot, or prior lands, and failing thereof, out of the bishop's lands, friar's lands, or any other kirk land lying within the bounds of the said parish."

No. 4.

Mar. 26, 1896.
Ogston v. Stewart.

Banchory, Kirkton of Banchory, and Ardoe, were all of them church lands within the meaning of these Acts, but there was this material difference between them. Banchory and Ardoe were abbot's lands, having originally belonged to the abbot and convent of Arbroath; whereas the lands of Kirkton were bishop's lands, and therefore not liable to be designated as glebe until Banchory and Ardoe had been exhausted. I have failed to discover, and the respondent did not suggest, any reason why the presbytery, in assigning a glebe to the minister of Banchory-Devenick, should have entirely disregarded the order of designation prescribed by the Act of 1593. The Kirkton of Banchory was not acquired by the proprietor of Banchory until 1618, and it cannot be presumed that its then owner consented to part of it being designated in 1602, in order to protect Banchory and Ardoe from designation.

There are other considerations which, to my mind, enhance the improbability of any part of the Kirkton of Banchory having been included in the designation of 1602. There is nothing to shew that any of the lands of Kirkton were riparian. The terms of the crown charter of 1744 do not appear to me necessarily to indicate that they were so. It was not a charter containing any fresh grant, but was merely a renewal of the rights already held by the predecessors of the grantee in and connected with the lands of Banchory and Kirkton, the latter having admittedly no right of salmon-fishing attached to them. It was revised and passed by the Scottish Court of Exchequer, as then constituted under 6 Anne, c. 26, who had no power to add to the rights previously granted out by the Crown. According to Mr Erskine (Inst. i. 3, 32),—"When the signature contains no more than was contained in the vassal's former charter, the barons may pass it; but when it imports a conveyance of any new subject not formerly granted by the Crown, it must be first superscribed by the King himself; for if it pass of course in Exchequer, it is not effectual to the grantee in so far as relates to such new right." If, therefore, part of Kirkton was riparian, the grant of its salmon-fishings was ultra vires of the Court, and could not bind the Crown. If not, the charter did nothing more than continue the former investitures. I do not think it ought to be assumed that the Court of Exchequer either neglected its duty or exceeded its powers.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that it is matter of reasonable inference from the title-deeds of the litigants, and from the facts disclosed in the proof, that the glebe of Banchory-Devenick, as designated, did not include any part of Kirkton, and that it did include portions both of Banchory and Ardoe. It being beyond the power of the presbytery to assign salmon-fishings to the minister, the disputed fishings would, in that case, remain with Ardoe, and the other fishings of the glebe with Banchory.

I would, therefore, advise your Lordships to reverse the judgment appealed from, to restore the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 8th February 1893, and to declare that the respondent must pay to the appellant the expenses incurred by him in the Court of Session after the date of that interlocutor, and also his costs of this appeal.

I have been requested by Lord Shand, who is unable to be present today, to state that he has examined and concurs in the opinion which I have expressed.

No. 4.

Mar. 26, 1896.
Ogston v. Stewart.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved by my noble and learned friend, and with the grounds on which he has rested it.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson), and I entirely concur in it.

LORD DAVEY.—I also have had an opportunity of reading the judgment which has just been delivered, and entirely concur in it.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 8th February 1893 restored: The respondent to pay the appellant the expenses incurred by him in the Court of Session since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and also the appellant's costs of the appeal.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—A. & W. BEVERIDGE—T. J. GORDON & FALCONER, W.S.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896.
Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

THE CLYDESDALE BANK, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER (Defenders), Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Murray—Ure—King.
JOHN PATON AND ANOTHER (Pursuers), Respondents.—Balfour, Q.C.—Sir Robert Reid, Q.C.—Robertson, Q.C.

Cautioner — Fraudulent Misrepresentation — Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60), sec. 6.—The Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), section 6, enacts,—"From and after the passing of this Act all guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person, and all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, &c., postponement of payment of debt, or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person undertaking such guarantee, security, or cautionary obligation, or making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorised by him or them, otherwise the same shall have no effect."

In an action of damages against a bank and against S., the agent at one of its branches, the pursuers averred that S., knowing that D. R. & Company, customers of the bank, were largely indebted to the bank, and were insolvent, or at least were in great financial difficulties, conceived, along with a partner of D. R. & Company, a fraudulent design of obtaining the pursuers' acceptances in favour of D. R. & Company in order to apply them pro tanto in reducing D. R. & Company's debt to the bank. That in pursuance of this scheme D. R. & Company applied to the pursuers for accommodation and referred them to S., who falsely assured them (1) that D. R. & Company were in a thoroughly sound condition financially, and only required temporary accommodation; (2) that the sum due to the bank was very trifling; (3) that D. R. & Company had made up certain losses which it was known they had incurred; and (4) that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptances by the pursuers would be applied in extinction of the bank's debt, or of any obligation to the bank. [The pursuers did not aver that these representations were made in writing.] That in reliance on these assurances the pursuers granted acceptances to D. R. & Company. The pursuers further averred that the proceeds of these acceptances were placed to the credit of D. R. & Company's overdrawn account, and that if they had not been so applied the bank's ultimate loss would have been so much the greater. That D. R. & Company were sequestrated, and the pursuers, as the bills fell due, paid them under protest.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896.

Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the action was not relevant, in respect (1) that the pursuers were not entitled to rely on the oral representations 1, 2, and 3 as to the credit of D. R. & Company, section 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act making such oral representations of no effect; and (2) as regarded the 4th alleged representation, that the pursuers had not alleged that the bank did not give credit to D. R. & Company after the date when it received the proceeds of the bills.

(IN the Court of Session, 23d October 1895, reported in the present volume, p. 38.)

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Watson. Ld. Herschell. Lord Davey.

The defenders appealed.

After hearing counsel,

The Lord Chancellor called the attention of the respondents' counsel to article 11 of the condescendence, where it was stated that "the acceptances were placed to the credit of Douglas, Reid, & Company's overdrawn account-current with the Clydesdale Bank," and that "the defenders the Clydesdale Bank were thus lucrati to the extent of the proceeds of said acceptances," and pointed out that it was not stated whether the bank did or did not give credit to Douglas, Reid, & Company after the bills were paid in.

The respondents subsequently proposed to amend article 11 as follows (the amendments are printed in italics):—(Cond. 11) "Notwithstanding the foresaid statements and assurances of the said Alexander Scott, the pursuers have now ascertained, and the fact is, that their said acceptances were all placed to the credit of the said Douglas, Reid, & Company's overdrawn account-current with the Clydesdale Bank, at the several dates when the pursuers' said acceptances respectively were obtained as aforesaid, and were applied in extinction pro tanto of the bank's debt, contrary to the assurances given as aforesaid. If the said acceptances had not been granted and applied as aforesaid, the bank's ultimate loss would have been larger by the amount of the said bills, namely, £4000 and interest thereon. The defenders, the Clydesdale Bank, were thus lucrati to the extent of the proceeds of said acceptances. The result was that the bank obtained and the pursuers lost the said sum of £4000 and interest. . . . The said Douglas, Reid, & Company were creditors on the bankrupt estate of Lipman & Company to the amount of £10,891, 8s. 8d. or thereby, on bills all held by the said Clydesdale Bank."

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that whatever doubt might have been entertained upon the original argument of this case, no doubt can now be entertained as regards that which appeared at first sight perhaps to be an insufficient and inadequate statement of the causes of action, but which might possibly, upon a certain construction, shew that there had been a cause of action sufficiently set forth upon the pleadings on the record. No doubt can now be entertained that the pleader (with the facts before him, and with a knowledge of the discussion which has taken place in this House pointing out that, taking the most favourable view for the pleader, the allegations were ambiguous, although time has been allowed for the purpose of amending that ambiguity) has done all that he possibly could do, consistently with being able to prove the facts at the trial, to avoid stating in express terms what, if it were true, he could have stated, namely, the non-performance of the promise by the bank to give additional credit to the firm which it was proposed to assist.

No. 5.

May 12, 1893. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

The matter seems to me to be very clear, and to use the language of English pleading, facts are set out from which it would appear that there has been (I will assume in favour of that view) a combination to induce the respondents to advance a further sum of money under circumstances in which it was to the advantage of the bank and to the advantage of those who persuaded the respondents to allow the debtor, who was in some difficulties which might lead to his sudden bankruptcy, to continue carrying on his business. If the allegations with which I am about to deal had been to the effect that in pursuance of that combination the bills had been signed, and that the bank by that combination had managed to get their own debt paid, in pursuance, as I say, of that combination, and that the person who signed the bills had been induced to sign them by the false representation that it was intended to enable the debtor to carry on his business so as perhaps to recover himself, but that in lieu of that the bank had appropriated the whole of the new advances to pay off their own past debt, I am of opinion that there would have been a good cause of action shewn upon the face of this record. But after the discussion which has taken place, and after what has been pointed out as to the ambiguous language used in the pleadings, it is manifest to me that no such thing can be averred; and it is perfectly consistent with every allegation on this record that the bank did what they were expected to do, and that on receiving these new advances they did apply them to the credit of the debtor. Although in a certain sense it may be that at the end the bank was less a loser than it would otherwise have been, by reason of this advance, yet the only thing which makes it properly a cause of action is omitted from this condescendence.

The language of an English pleader would be, that whatever was the contract intended to be entered into, and entered into in fact, there was no breach upon the face of this record properly averred. There is nothing which shews that the thing that was to be done by the bank was not done and done perfectly bona fide, and with the intention of helping the person who was in difficulties as he was helped, and that he was helped accordingly. That, as I have said, might have been a slip on the part of the pleader originally, and I myself should have been reluctant to have given judgment against the pursuer in this case upon that view if it had rested upon what might be only the ambiguous language of pleading. But after more than a week's delay, and seeing the amendments which are now proposed, it seems to me that, with great astuteness and skill in the use of language, the pleader has repeated exactly the same thing in different words, and has expressly avoided doing that which would, as I say, have set out a complete cause of action. Under these circumstances it appears to me that all your Lordships can do is to allow the appeal and remit the action to the Court below to assoilzie the defenders, and find the respondents liable in expenses.

The only difficulty I have had has been in looking through the different pleadings and seeing what has been sufficiently averred; and as we have from time to time made international reflections as to our different systems of pleading, I cannot help saying, and I say it with regret, that had this occurred in an English action, and had a statement of claim been the subject of controversy instead of these Scottish pleadings, I believe it would have been impossible for your Lordships to disentangle the allegations made, and to pronounce the judgment we are now proposing to pronounce, and to prevent the possibility of a considerable amount of costs being wantonly thrown away. By the precision of the Scottish pleading there is still a necessity to set out the real cause of action, which is capable of definite and precise statement, which I regret to say is no longer the case in English pleadings. I therefore speak with some degree of envy when I say that at all events the Scottish jurisprudence has preserved something like a system in which a definite and precise allegation of the cause of action is required to be set out before a litigant is allowed to incur considerable expense in proving what may after all turn out to be no cause of action at all.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that the judgment be reversed.

LORD WATSON.—The main question involved in this appeal is new to the law of Scotland, although it arises upon the terms of a statute which was passed in 1856. Section 6 of the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act of that year enacts that "all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, or postponement of payment of debt or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorised by him, otherwise the same shall have no effect." These enactments are in substance the same as the provisions of section 6 of 9 Geo. IV. cap. 14, commonly known as Lord Tenterden's Act, which applies to England and Ireland. There is this difference of expression between the two clauses, that in the earlier statute it is declared, not that the representations and assurances shall be of no effect, but that no action shall be maintainable upon them when they are not contained in a writing duly subscribed.

This was an action of damages brought by the respondents founded upon representations alleged to have been falsely and fraudulently made to them by the appellant Scott, who was agent in Dundee for the appellant bank, for the purpose and with the effect of inducing them to sign bills of exchange to the amount of £4000 for the accommodation of the firm of Douglas, Reid, & Company. It is also alleged that the main object which Scott had in view in making these representations was to enable the bank to apply the bills so procured in reduction of a large over-draft which was then due to it by the firm accommodated. It is not asserted that the directors, or any official of the bank other than Scott, were in the knowledge of his fraudulent proceedings, but it is averred that the representations made by him were within the scope of his employment as agent, and there are also averments which are said to mean that the bank did in fact receive the proceeds of the bills and apply the same in extinction of the debt due to it from Douglas, Reid, & Company.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

It is admitted by the respondents that all the representations upon which they rely were made by Scott verbally. These representations were—(1) that Douglas, Reid, & Company were in a sound condition financially, and only required temporary accommodation; (2) that the sum due by them to the bank was very trifling; (3) that Douglas, Reid, & Company had made up the losses which they had previously sustained through the failure of the firm of Lipman & Company by fortunate speculations in jute; and (4) that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptance by the respondents would be applied in extinction of the bank's debt, or of any obligation to the bank.

In their defences the appellants pleaded that these representations, being neither in writing nor subscribed as the Act of 1856 requires, were of no effect, and could not be admitted to proof. The plea was overruled by the Lord Ordinary (Low), who allowed the parties, before answer, a proof of their respective averments. It appears to have escaped his Lordship's notice that there are statements in the condescendence with respect to the appellant Scott's relations to one Hassberger, which are simply irrelevant and scandalous, and ought to have been deleted before the record was closed. The Second Division of the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and instead of a proof before answer, appointed issues to be lodged for the trial of the cause.

All the learned Judges in the Courts below were of opinion that the circumstances of the case, as disclosed in the condescendence, took these representations out of the statute of 1856. The Lord Justice-Clerk held it to be sufficient for that purpose that the representations were made in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme, by means of which the bills were obtained, on the assurances of its agent, for the purposes of the bank. The same view was more clearly indicated by Lords Young and Trayner, who were of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the representations would have been within the statute if they had been made for the sole purpose of inducing the respondents to accept the bills, but that they were excluded from its operation, because they were made for an ulterior purpose which is not mentioned in the statute, namely, in order that the bank might be enabled to obtain payment of its claims against Douglas, Reid, & Company.

The fourth representation does not appear to me to involve the construction of the statute. If differs from those which precede it in this respect, that it does not contain any assurance relating to Douglas, Reid, & Company, or to their credit, ability, or trade. In my opinion it does not possess the character of a representation to which the statute applies. In the view of the law which was adopted by the Courts below, the distinction between the fourth and the first three of the representations libelled on was immaterial.

The provisions of section 6 are expressed in terms as comprehensive as they are imperative. They enact that no verbal representations, being of the character and made for the purpose and with the intent specified in the clause, shall be of any legal effect as giving a remedy to the person who may be misled by them to his detriment. They in substance provide that no person to whom such verbal representations are made for such a purpose shall have any right to rely upon them, and that if he does choose to act upon them, he must bear the consequences of his own credulity. It is also, in my opinion, obvious that these provisions were not intended to meet the case of truthful and honest representations, and that they necessarily include all representations of the character, and made with the purpose specified, however false and however fraudulent.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896.

Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

In the present case it has hardly been controverted, and it does not appear to me to admit of serious dispute, that the first three of the representations upon which the action is laid answer precisely both in character and in their immediate object to the description contained in section 6. But it has been argued (and the argument found favour with the learned Judges of the Court of Session) that these three representations are not within the incidence of section 6, because they are alleged to have been made, not merely with the immediate purpose of inducing the respondents to sign accommodation bills, but with the further and fraudulent purpose of enabling the bank to appropriate the bills, when granted, to the payment of its debt. I do not think that the argument has any solid foundation in fact. The main, if not the only cause of action disclosed by the condescendence is the fraudulent procuring of the respondents' acceptance of the bills in question by means of these representations. But I am of opinion that, even if it be warranted by the facts, the argument is without foundation in law. It seeks to limit the generality of the enactments of section 6 by introducing a proviso to the effect that they shall not apply in cases where the person making the representations has in view some ulterior and illegitimate purpose beyond inducing the person to whom they are made to give credit or money to a third party. There is no warrant for such a limitation to be found in the words of the clause, which, in my opinion, declare explicitly that any verbal representation to which they apply shall be absolutely inefficacious, no matter what may be the further and fraudulent design of the person who made it.

It was maintained for the respondents that the competency of proving these representations by parole has been established by section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides that "in any judicial proceeding in Scotland, any fact relating to a bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory-note, which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence." It may well be doubted whether the present action does raise any question of liability upon the respondents' accommodation bills, but it is an obvious answer to the argument that in the present and similar cases such verbal representations have since the Act of 1856 ceased to be relevant facts.

It is possible that the fourth representation might be founded on, either as being a fraudulent inducement to sign bills for the accommodation of Douglas, Reid, & Company, or as constituting a promise or agreement binding the bank to abstain from imputing any part of the proceeds of these bills towards payment of its debt. But in neither of these aspects do I find any relevant allegation in the condescendence. It is not averred that the bank has failed to fulfil the representation said to have been made by its agent. The only averment upon this point, which occurs in the 11th article of the condescendence, is that the respondents' acceptances "were all placed to the credit of the said Douglas, Reid, & Company's overdrawn account-current with the Clydesdale Bank at the several dates when the pursuers' said acceptances were obtained as aforesaid. The defenders, the Clydesdale Bank, were thus lucrati to the extent of the said acceptances." These allegations are quite consistent with the possibility that the whole of the sums so credited were drawn out by Douglas, Reid, & Company, and by them applied to their own purposes, and are therefore irrelevant.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

Your Lordships delayed the consideration of this appeal in order that the respondents might have an opportunity of submitting any amendment shewing that the bank had applied the proceeds of these acceptances in reduction of the balance due to it by Douglas, Reid, & Company. The respondents have proposed to add two new averments, the first being that the acceptances were "applied in extinction pro tanto of the bank's debt," and the second, that "if the said acceptances had not been granted and applied as aforesaid, the bank's ultimate loss would have been larger by the amount of the said bills, viz., £4000 and interest thereon." I see no reason to doubt that these amendments have been very properly framed with a strict regard to the limits of truth, but, in my opinion, they come far short of relevancy. So far from negativing, they appear to me rather to suggest that the appellants' bank not only allowed to Douglas, Reid, & Company the free use of the proceeds of the respondents' acceptances, but made new advances to that firm out of its own funds.

I have only to observe further, that if the fourth representation were relied on as a promise which the bank had failed to fulfil, the respondents would have no title to raise the question. The only person having a title to complain of a breach of that promise would in that case be the trustee in Douglas, Reid, & Company's sequestration.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from must be reversed, with costs; and that the action ought to be remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session, with directions to assoilzie the appellants from its conclusions, with expenses in both Courts below.

My noble and learned friend Lord Morris, who is judicially engaged elsewhere to-day, has requested me to state that he concurs in the opinion I have just read.

Lord Herschell.—The action is founded upon four matters, the statement of which is contained in the fifth article of the condescendence. It cannot be doubted that the first three complaints referred to statements made, and are founded upon statements made by the appellants' agent with reference to the "character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings" of Douglas, Reid, & Company. Apart from the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of 1856 no doubt can be entertained that the condescendence discloses relevant facts establishing a cause of action against the appellants. The objection taken on their behalf to the relevancy of the condescendence is founded upon the provisions of that enactment. The respondents seek to avoid the operation of the statute so far as they are concerned in the present case, and have succeeded in obtaining judgment in their favour on the ground that the representations made were part of a scheme fraudulently devised by the appellants and Douglas, Reid, & Company for the purpose of benefiting the bank at the expense of the respondents. In my opinion the operation of the statute cannot be so avoided. Assuming that the respondents could establish that the representations were made for the purpose of giving effect to such a fraudulent scheme, I am of opinion that the enactment positively forbids any effect being given to those representations. It is impossible to conceive of an enactment in more general or unambiguous terms,—"all representations and assurances" of the nature described, unless in writing, are to have no effect. The action of the respondents, if it is to be maintained, requires as its foundation that effect should be given to those representations which the statute has said shall have no effect. I do not see how it is open to question that the representations were of a kind within the words of the statute, because the statute applies to all such representations made or granted to the effect or "for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods," &c. Now, the very framework of the respondents' case is that the representations had the effect of rendering them liable upon certain bills of exchange, which resulted in money being paid to the bank for the accommodation of Douglas, Reid, & Company. How then it can be said that they were not made or granted to the effect of enabling those persons to obtain credit or money it is difficult to see, and if the statute in terms applies, how is it possible to avoid its operation by proving that the design of the bank and of Douglas, Reid, & Company in making the representations and so procuring the credit was an ulterior benefit to the bank?

No. 5.

May 12, 1896.

Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

The respondents also maintain that the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 dispenses in such a case as this, inasmuch as obligations on bills of exchange come in question, with the necessity of the writing which is required by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. I think it is an argument which it is difficult to treat seriously. It is impossible to conceive that the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act can have repealed pro tanto the Mercantile Law Amendment Act whenever obligations upon bills of exchange have been obtained by representations as to conduct, credit, or character. That disposes of the case so far as regards the first three of the allegations contained in the condescendence. The fourth allegation is quite independent of the statute; it is "that the appellants represented that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptance by the pursuers would be applied in extinction of the bank's debt." I think that allegation is only relevant if it can be maintained as a representation made by the bank to the respondents, upon which they acted, being a false and fraudulent representation. If it is a promise only it would not be relevant, because the respondents would have no title to sue in respect of its breach. But no doubt that which is in form a promise may be in another aspect a representation, and I think that the fourth averment of the fifth article of the condescendence may be treated as relating to a representation by the bank which is alleged to be false and fraudulent.

Taking it to be so, I do not think that, when you take the whole of the condescendence together, it is shewn that the bank did make a false and fraudulent representation of an intention which they never meant to carry out, because that is, of course, what it must amount to. So far as appears, the bank, if they indicated an intention that it should not be used in extinction of the debt, carried out that intention. There is no allegation that they did not give full effect to that which they alleged to be the intention. It was open perhaps to some argument, as the case stood, whether the allegations in the subsequent articles of the condescendence had not been from want of care so framed as to be consistent with that intention either being carried out or not being carried out. Accordingly an opportunity was given to the respondents to suggest any amendment which they would desire to make with a view of clearing up the doubt which might be said to exist. Having had ample opportunity of considering what averments they could add, they have failed to suggest to your Lordships any averments as capable of proof by them which would shew that the bank did not intend that the money should not be applied in extinction of their debt, looking at the substance of the matter and not at the form, and that the alleged intention was not given effect to.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

For these reasons I think that the action altogether fails, and I entirely concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

LORD DAVEY.—I also concur in the judgment which your Lordships propose to give in this appeal, and also in the reasons which have been assigned for that judgment.

The fifth article of the condescendence, which contains the representations alleged to have been made by or on behalf of the bank, commences with the averment that those representations were made on the occasion of Douglas, Reid, & Company requiring temporary accommodation. It then avers that Mr Paton, one of the pursuers, saw Mr Scott, the manager of the bank, who made the four representations relied upon; those have been read, and I will not repeat them. We have it then that those representations were made upon the occasion of Douglas, Reid, & Company requiring temporary accommodation from the pursuers' firm, and one of the pursuers accordingly seeing the manager of the bank.

Now, it cannot be disputed, I think, that the three first of these representations contained in the fifth article of the condescendence are "representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings" of the firm of Douglas, Reid, and Company; and the Lord Ordinary holds, and to my mind it is obvious, that they were made for the purpose of enabling the firm of Douglas, Reid, & Company to obtain credit or money from the pursuers. If so, they would seem prima facie to fall within the 6th section of the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856.

But it is said, that although they were made for that purpose, there was an ulterior purpose or motive for obtaining the credit for Douglas, Reid, & Company from the pursuers which was of a fraudulent character and takes the case out of the statute. Now, my Lords, I entirely concur in the observation that has been made, that if it was intended to except representations made with a fraudulent motive, or representations of a fraudulent character, from that statute, the exception to that effect would have been introduced into the statute. Indeed, it appears to me that if you introduce such an exception into the Scottish statute, or into the English statute which has been referred to and is known by the name of Lord Tenterden's Act, you will, to a large extent, I should say almost entirely, nullify the beneficial operation of that statute, because what are the cases in which the statute comes into play? The class of representation in which the question which was intended to be dealt with by those two statutes occurs are usually and for the most part fraudulent representations, or it is sufficient to say that they may be, and if you excluded representations of a fraudulent character, or representations made fraudulently or with a fraudulent purpose, from those statutes, you would, in the majority of cases, fritter away the beneficial provisions of the statutes.

Therefore, my Lords, I think it is no answer to the plea of the defenders that the case falls within the words of the 6th section of the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, to reply that these representations were made with a fraudulent motive, or were of a fraudulent character; consequently I am of opinion that, having regard to the language of the 6th section of the Act, the present action is not maintainable upon these three first averments or representations by the defenders.

With regard to the fourth representation, I will assume that it may be read as a representation of a fact. I have myself considerable doubt whether in the form in which it is alleged, being an allegation of an intention and not of a fact, it is not giving too benevolent a construction to the pleadings so to read it, but for the present purpose I will assume that it is an allegation of a fact, and that it is a representation of the purpose for which the acceptances were required from the pursuers. Treating it so, it would not, I agree, be within the 6th section of the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act; it would be outside that statute. But then in order to make it actionable you would require allegations, not only that that representation was made fraudulently, which you have, but also that it was acted upon, and that the defenders suffered damage by such acting. Now, my Lords, it was agreed on all hands by your Lordships that the allegation in the condescendence as it stands (the 11th article of the condescendence) was wholly insufficient to allege any such damage, because it merely alleged that the £4000 were paid to the overdrawn account of Douglas, Reid, & Company with the Clydesdale Bank, and that "the Clydesdale Bank were thus lucrati to the extent of the proceeds of the said acceptances," leaving it perfectly open and perfectly uncertain whether the Clydesdale Bank, although they immediately got the benefit of the £4000, did not afterwards allow Douglas, Reid, & Company to draw to that extent for the purposes of their business, so that the £4000 really and in substance would go in the manner in which it was averred it was intended to go. Your Lordships have given the respondents an opportunity of amending their condescendence in case what I conceive to be the obvious meaning of it was only a slip. Possibly, if the amendment which they propose had been in the condescendence in the first instance, it might have been considered sufficient, but I am bound to say that, after the respondents had heard what had been said by your Lordships, and had known exactly where the shoe pinched, and where the averment was insufficient, if they had been able to aver that Messrs Douglas, Reid, & Company were not allowed to draw £4000 after the bills had been paid into the bank for the purposes of their business, I cannot conceive that the respondents would not have said so. Instead of that they propose to insert an allegation which is to my mind perfectly consistent with the fact that Douglas, Reid, & Company were allowed to draw, and did in fact draw out £4000 after having placed it to their credit with the bank; because what they say is, that "the bank's ultimate loss would have been larger by the amount of the said bills, namely, £4000, and interest thereon." My Lords, that is perfectly susceptible of the construction, and I am bound to say I think it is the true construction, that it means the ultimate loss of the bank, having regard to further advances made against the £4000. No doubt if they allowed Douglas, Reid, & Company to draw out the £4000 there would have been £4000 added to Douglas, Reid, & Company's debt if you did not give the bank the benefit of the £4000 paid to the credit of the account. It is sufficient to say that in my opinion the proposed amendment fails to meet the requirements which it was pointed out to the respondents by your Lordships should be met in any amendment which they proposed to make of their pleadings.

No. 5.

May 12, 1896. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, v. Paton.

Under these circumstances I think it would be a waste of expense to allow the defenders to go to trial upon the fourth representation contained in the 5th article of the condescendence.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, before putting the question, I should wish to say that my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten, as well as Lord Morris, concur in the judgment which your Lordships are delivering. And for myself I wish to add that, if I only dealt with the fourth allegation in the condescendence in the opinion which I have just expressed to your Lordships, it was because I really, with all respect to those learned persons who have looked into the matter, thought that the question with regard to the statute was too plain for argument. But, as my silence upon that question might be supposed to indicate some difference of opinion, I wish to say that I entirely concur in the construction of the statute which has been placed upon it by my noble and learned friends.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed: Further ordered, that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session, with directions to assoilzie the appellants from the conclusions of the action, and to find the respondents liable in expenses, &c.

MURRAY, HUTCHINS, STIRLING, & MURRAY—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—WILLIAM ROBERTSON & CO.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.

No. 6.

May 15, 1896. Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire.

LADY CONSTANCE MACKENZIE (Third Party), Appellant.—Balfour, Q.C.—D. Dundas—John Craigie.
COUNTESS OF CROMARTIE (Second Party), Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Murray—Macphail.
THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE AND OTHERS (The Duke of Sutherland's Trustees) (First Parties), Respondents.—R. L. Blackburn.

Succession—Trust-disposition—Construction—"Heirs-female."—A truster, "in order to make and secure additional provision for" his second son "and the other heirs of entail succeeding him in the lands and estates of Cromartie . . . to enable them to support the dignity and title of Earl of Cromartie," conveyed to trustees certain securities, and directed them, after his death, to pay the free proceeds thereof to his second son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to certain substitutes, "whom failing to the heirs-female of the body" of the said second son. The second son, the Earl of Cromartie, died leaving only two daughters, of whom the elder succeeded her father in the title and estates of Cromartie.

No. 6.

May 15, 1896.
Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the direction to the trustees to pay the income to the "heirs-female" of the body of the second son being unambiguous, must receive effect, and that, as the two daughters were heirs-portioners, each was entitled to one half of the income of the trust funds.

(IN the Court of Session, July 2, 1895, 22 R. 839.)

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury.)
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Shand.
Lord Davey.

On 23d July 1862 the Duke of Sutherland executed the following trust-deed:—"I, George Granville William, Duke and Earl of Sutherland, in order to make and secure additional provision for Francis Sutherland Leveson-Gower, commonly called Lord Macleod, my second surviving son, and the other heirs of entail succeeding to him in the lands and estate of Cromartie, such heirs being descendants of the marriage between me and Anne Hay Mackenzie, Duchess of Sutherland and Countess of Cromartie, my wife, to enable them to support the dignity and title of Earl of Cromartie,—therefore I," &c. His Grace then conveyed to trustees therein named certain bonds, policies of insurance, and other securities, for, inter alia, the following purposes:—"(Fourth) That my said trustees shall, on my death, if the said Francis Sutherland Leveson-Gower, commonly called Lord Macleod, be then in minority, out of the free proceeds of the trust funds, apply such amount as shall be requisite for his maintenance and education, and thereafter accumulate any balance which may remain, and invest the same in the purchase of Government stock, or in any of the securities above mentioned; and upon the said Francis Sutherland Leveson-Gower, commonly called Lord Macleod, attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, my said trustees shall then pay the free proceeds of the trust funds, including the accumulated sum as aforesaid, to him and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to any son or sons to be hereafter born of my present marriage, in the order of seniority, and the heirs-male of his or their bodies; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said Francis Sutherland Leveson-Gower, commonly called Lord Macleod; whom failing," &c.

The Duke of Sutherland died on 22d September 1892, and the income of the trust funds was paid to Francis, Earl of Cromartie (described in the trust-deed as Lord Macleod, afterwards Lord Tarbat), until his death on 24th November 1893. Lord Cromartie, who had no younger brother, left no male issue, but was survived by two daughters—viz., Lady Sibell Lilian Mackenzie and Lady Constance Mackenzie.

Lady Sibell Lilian Mackenzie in terms of the entail of 1878 succeeded her father in the Cromartie estates, and to the earldom.

A question having arisen as to the younger daughter's right to a share of the income of the trust funds, a special case was presented by (1) the trustees, (2) the Countess of Cromartie, and (3) Lady Constance Mackenzie.

The case asked the opinion and judgment of the Court upon, inter alia, the following question:—"Is the whole free income of the trust funds payable to Sibell Lilian, Countess of Cromartie?"

The Second Division answered the question in the affirmative.

Lady Constance Mackenzie appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that this case is susceptible of a very short solution. I simply look at the deed itself and I find that the provisions for the beneficiaries intended by this deed are satisfied by the persons claiming now as heirs-female. I really have great difficulty in saying more than that, because if the language of the instrument itself is sufficiently clear as to the beneficiaries pointed to, as I think it is, and if the trust purposes are set forth in the paragraph of the deed which is appropriate to such purposes, it seems to me to be absolutely unarguable that the true meaning of those words, and the purposes of the trust so set forth, can be in any way controlled, qualified, or modified by the initial statement of what the motive of the author of the deed was. It would to my mind be disastrous to introduce such a system of construing a deed. One has known the language of a will somewhat perverted to perform the function which it was assumed the testator intended to be performed, but I never in my life heard of the language of a deed which contained a perfectly unambiguous provision being twisted from the natural ordinary meaning of the words by a preliminary statement of what the maker of the deed intended should be the effect and purpose of the whole deed when made. I should say that, even if there were some contradiction between what was done and the supposed purpose. But here it is very obvious to remark that the purpose or the motive which the maker of the deed prescribes to himself is to some extent satisfied by what he does, and I can only say, speaking with the utmost respect of the learned Judges who expressed a different view, that I am unable to comprehend how that purpose could alter the natural and ordinary effect of the words used in the instrument.

No. 6.

May 15, 1896. Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire.

I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court below be reversed, and that this appeal be allowed.

Lord Watson.—I have come without difficulty to the same conclusion.

These ladies are heirs-female, and they are also heirs-portioners. Heirs-portioners who are heirs-female take, according to the law of Scotland, as a class. The destination or gift to them contained in this trust-deed, if it were a destination or a gift of land, would be effectual to give them a pro indiviso right in the land, each taking an equal share; and I have heard nothing suggested to the effect that when there is a gift of moveable property to the same class in plain and unambiguous terms it should have a different effect. There can be no reason for its receiving a different effect in such a case, unless it be upon a principle which is unknown to the law of Scotland—that in dealing with money you require to use language more precise than when you are dealing with a land right.

The ground upon which the judgment of the Court below proceeds really comes to this, that to read the words in the sense in which I think they ought to be read would be at variance with the main purpose of the deed as declared in the narrative of it. My Lords, I think that is carrying the principle of construction by intention too far. I can quite understand that where words are capable of being modified or qualified in the context in which they occur it may be legitimate to ascertain how far one reading or another would best promote the intention of the maker of the deed; but I fail to see that the words at the commencement of the deed which have been referred to as imperative come to anything more than a statement that the deed was made because the truster entertained benevolent intentions towards certain persons who are included in the deed, and who are benefited by it. But it does not bring about any contradiction between his intention and the words of the deed, if you find there that besides the persons whom he intended to benefit, and whom he has benefited, some benefit is given to others. I think that it is a very dangerous canon of construction to admit what may be a partial statement of intention, quite consistent with other objects, to control the whole of the other language of the deed with the effect of striking out beneficiaries whom the truster may have intended to benefit. The narrative words come to no more than this: "My intention is to do" so and so, and you may add this, "and I have accomplished that purpose by the provisions which follow." In such a case the safer and only legitimate course is to look to the provisions which follow, and to read them according to their natural and just construction.

No. 6.

May 15, 1896.
Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD SHAND.—If the truster in this case had contemplated the case that has actually occurred, it may very well be supposed he would have made a provision giving effect to the view which the Court below has taken. While saying at the outset of the deed that his purpose was to enable the beneficiaries "to support the dignity and title of the Earl of Cromartie," he might have thought it would better secure that purpose where heirs-portioners did succeed as females that the eldest heir-portioner should have the income. I can only say that if he had any such intention it is not expressed. The deed in its operative provision contains very distinct directions to the trustees. The trustees are expressly directed to give the income to the heirs-female, and it is conceded by the learned Judges in their opinions that the ordinary meaning of those words is that there shall be a distribution of the fund amongst all the heirs-female. I fail to see any room for the suggestion that there is ambiguity in that provision. Although it might appear that there was a failure to fulfil the intention of the truster, I should still give effect to the operative words of the deed, because his directions are given in distinct terms. But, as has been observed by the Lord Chancellor and by my noble and learned friend who has already spoken (Lord Watson), he does not fail to carry out that intention, for in any view that may be taken of the deed the eldest heir-female succeeding to the estate of Cromartie does get material benefits, although she has no right to the whole income.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the decision of the Court below in this case must be reversed.

LORD DAVEY.—I take it to be a settled principle of law that the operative words of a deed which are expressed in clear and unambiguous language are not to be controlled, cut down, or qualified by a recital or narrative of intention. Now, in this case Lord Trayner says in his judgment that "if these words are to be construed literally then the destination must be read as conveying the proceeds of the trust funds to the second and third parties equally, who are the heirs-female of Lord Tarbat." In that I agree, and that being so, I concur in the judgment proposed.

ORDERED, that the interlocutor of July 2, 1895, so far as complained of, be reversed: Further ordered, that the whole free

No. 6.

May 15, 1896. Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire.

income of the funds held in trust by the respondents, the parties of the first part, is payable in equal shares to and between the respondent, Sibell Lilian, Countess of Cromartie, the party of the second part, and the appellant, the Right Honourable Lady Constance Mackenzie, the party of the third part: Further ordered, that the costs of all parties to the appeal be paid out of the trust funds held by the respondents the trustees.

ROBINS, HAY, WATERS, & LUCAS—J. C. COUPER, W.S.—GADSDEN & TREHERNE—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—CURREY, HOLLAND, & Co.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

JOHN BLAIR AND OTHERS (Defenders), Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Murray—Ure—J. Wilson—A. W. Watson. ASSETS COMPANY, LIMITED (Pursuers), Respondents.—Balfour, Q.C.—Cozens Hardy, Q.C.—Charles D. Murray.

Writ—Testing Clause.—Held that words inserted in the testing clause of a deed can have no effect in altering or adding to its provisions.

Smith v. Chambers, 5 R. 97, and 5 R. (H. L.) 151, approved.

Dunlop v. Greenlees, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46, commented on.

Agent and Client—Agent's responsibility for advice to a client.—Observations on a law-agent's responsibility for advice given to a client.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Watson. Ld. Herschell. Lord Shand. Lord Davey.

THE CITY OF GLASGOW BANK went into liquidation on 22d October 1878, and the liquidation was subsequently continued under supervision of the Court (First Division).

By the City of Glasgow Bank (Liquidation) Act, 1882, and relative discharge by the liquidators in favour of the Assets Company, Limited, recorded on 30th December 1882, the assets* of the bank were vested in the company at that date.

In December 1894 an action was raised by the Assets Company against John Blair, W.S., and John William Young, W.S., who were in 1878 and 1879 partners of the dissolved firm of Davidson & Syme, the law-agents in the liquidation. The summons concluded for payment of £7560 as damage alleged to have been sustained by the bank and its liquidators through negligent failure of duty or want of reasonable skill on the part of Davidson & Syme as their law-agents.

The pursuers' averments were to the following effect:—

In December 1878 the Reverend John Robert Campbell, minister of the parish of Monzievaird, was on the list of contributories as holder of £200 of the stock of the bank, and was liable for calls amounting to £5500. Mr Campbell represented to the liquidators that he was unable to pay the calls, and offered to pay £1000 in full of all claims. Mr Campbell made a declaration as to his property in which, inter alia, he made this statement:—"My income is derived from three sources—(1) stipend . . . £254; in addition, there is manse and glebe valued at £40; (2) income derived from stocks and shares above mentioned; (3) my wife has a separate estate, the income of which for last year was £315; I enclose copy of our marriage-contract." (Cond. 4) "Upon receiving the said declaration and relative copy of marriage-contract, the liquidators forwarded them to Messrs Davidson & Syme, on or about the 10th January 1879, and employed them, inter alia,—(1) to advise the liquidators as to the terms on which it would be advisable to settle with the said John Robert Campbell; (2) to satisfy themselves that the whole means possessed by the said John Robert Campbell at 2d October 1878 had been disclosed; and (3) to report on what terms they would recommend the liquidators to grant a discharge."

* By section 1 of the Act the assets were defined to mean "all lands and heritages, debts, bonds, mortgages, securities, moneys, effects, choses in action, claims, and demands whatsoever, including claims for unpaid calls, and in general all property, real or personal, heritable or moveable, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, belonging to or vested in the bank or the liquidators, or which the bank has power to acquire, or which are or is held in trust for or to be realised solely for account of the bank at the date of vesting hereinafter mentioned, but shall not comprise the liability of any contributory to calls, except such as have been made by the liquidators before the passing of this Act."

Messrs Davidson & Syme wrote to the liquidators giving their opinion that a payment of £2068 should be required for a discharge, and subsequently after the proportion of stipend to be exacted had been considered by the liquidators with the defenders the sum to be required for a discharge was adjusted at £1250.

The liquidators, in reliance on the advice of their law-agents, agreed to grant a discharge on payment of this sum subject to their obtaining the sanction of the Court to the compromise. In May 1879 the liquidators received payment of £1250 from Mr Campbell, and thereupon employed Davidson & Syme to submit the compromise to the Court for consideration and sanction. The Court subsequently sanctioned the compromise, and the discharge was granted.

Davidson & Syme in fixing the basis of compromise failed to take into account Mr Campbell's right under the marriage-contract to the income of his wife's estate, which amounted to £315, and had at the date of the compromise an actuarial value of £4250.

(Cond. 7) " . . . By the said contract of marriage, as originally prepared, the said John Robert Campbell renounced and discharged his jus mariti and right of administration over the whole estate then belonging to his intended wife, the said Jane Campbell, or which she might acquire or succeed to stante matrimonio. This exclusion might have been construed as an exclusion of the jus mariti from the income of the estate of the said Jane Campbell, which would have been contrary to the intention of the parties to the contract. Accordingly, before the said contract was signed, the said John Robert Campbell insisted, as a condition of signing the said contract, upon a clause being inserted in the following terms:—'It being hereby declared before signing,'" &c., as inserted in the testing clause quoted in footnote.* "The said Jane Campbell consented to and

* The marriage-contract which was produced bore that Mr Campbell "hereby renounces and discharges his jus mariti and right of administration over the whole estate presently belonging to" his intended wife, "or which she may acquire or succeed to stante matrimonio." The testing clause was as follows:—"In witness whereof these presents, consisting of this and two preceding pages, and written on stamped paper down to and including the words 'in witness whereof' by Thomas Finlayson, clerk to J. & J. Miller, solicitors, Perth, and from thence to the end by David Sinclair Manson, also clerk to the said J. & J. Miller, are subscribed by the said Jane Campbell at Moulin Manse on the 31st day of May 1862, before these witnesses, John Scott, smith, Moulin, and Henry Duff, wright, Moulin; and by the said Reverend John Robert Campbell at Perth on the 2d day of June 1862 before these witnesses, James Dick Miller and John Miller

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

authorised the insertion of the said clause, and it was thereupon added to and made to form a part of the said contract, which was thereafter signed and completed.* The said contract, completed as aforesaid, was registered in the Books of Council and Session on 5th June 1862. In reliance upon the said completed contract, the parties were married on 3d June 1862. An extract from the Register of Marriages is herewith produced and referred to. The said contract has been adopted and acted on by both parties for upwards of thirty years, Mr Campbell having during that period regularly uplifted and applied to his own uses the income of his wife's estate."

(Cond. 8) " . . . The pursuers believe and aver that the said defenders culpably and negligeutly failed to read the whole of the said marriage-contract, and in particular failed to read the clause therein above quoted. If they did read the whole contract, including the said clause, they acted with want of reasonable skill in advising the liquidators in the manner foresaid. Even on the assumption that they did read the said clause, and had formed an opinion to the effect that it was not valid or effectual to qualify the other provisions in Miller, both solicitors in Perth: It being hereby declared before signing that while the jus mariti and right of administration of the said John Robert Campbell are renounced and excluded, such renunciation and exclusion shall only apply to the capital or principal of the estate of the said Jane Campbell, and shall not extend or apply to the annual produce or interest of her said estate, the said John Robert Campbell being entitled to draw the said annual produce or interest." Here followed the signatures of the parties and of the witnesses.

---

* The following letters were produced by the pursuers when the case was before the Second Division:—"Messrs J. & J. Miller, W.S., Perth, to Miss Campbell, Moulin Manse, with note by her appended. —2d June 1862.—Dear Madam,—Mr Campbell has informed us that it is your desire that he shall have the full control of the annual proceeds of your property of every description, and in consequence an alteration is necessary in the contract signed by you. This we propose doing by inserting a declaration that Mr Campbell's jus mariti and right of administration is only to be excluded in so far as regards the capital or principal of your estate, and this inserted will give him the absolute power of such annual proceeds. We confess we think this is going rather far in the circumstances, but if such is your deliberate wish, we must give up our opinion in the hope that no circumstances may ever occur to render the want of the additional precautions we consider proper to be a matter of regret.—We are, &c."

"Moulin Manse, 3d June 1862.—1.30 p.m.—I approve of the proposed alteration on the contract. JANE CAMPBELL."

"Messrs Miller to Rev. J. R. Campbell of Ardoch.—Perth, 2d June 1862.—10 p.m.—Dear Sir,—You have now subscribed the contract of marriage with Miss Jane Campbell on the understanding that a declaration of the following effect is to be inserted in the testing clause, and which you assure us is in accordance with Miss Campbell's desire, viz., it being hereby declared before signing that while the jus mariti and right of administration of the said Rev. John Robert Campbell is renounced and excluded, such renunciation and exclusion shall only apply to the capital or principal of the estate of the said Jane Campbell, and not extend or apply to the annual produce or interest of her said estate, the said Rev. J. R. Campbell being entitled to draw the said annual produce or interest. And on receiving a letter from Miss Campbell that such is her wish, we undertake that such clause shall be so inserted in said marriage-contract.—We are, your ob. serv."

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

the said marriage-contract, it was their duty to bring its terms under the notice of the liquidators, and to obtain their special instructions as to the mode in which the matter was to be dealt with. This they culpably and negligently failed to do."

The pursuers further averred that the defenders had failed in their duty in failing to call the attention of the Court to the terms of the clause in the marriage-contract.

The pursuers further stated that if the liquidators had been made aware of the clause they would not have agreed to the compromise, and instead of being "hopelessly insolvent, as represented to the liquidators and to the Court, the estate of the said John Robert Campbell was at said date quite able to meet the whole balance of the calls then remaining unpaid, amounting, after deduction of said sum of £1250, to the sum of £4250."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The City of Glasgow Bank and its liquidators having sustained loss and damage to the amount condescended on, in consequence of the culpable and negligent failure of duty, or want of reasonable skill on the part of Messrs Davidson & Syme as their law-agents, and in consequence of their misrepresentation of the facts to the Court, all as condescended on, decree should be pronounced as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support their pleas.

On 18th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defenders; sustains their second plea in law, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns." *

---

* "OPINION.—(His Lordship after giving a summary of the pursuers' averments as to Mr Campbell's declaration and the advice given by the defenders and the compromise following thereon, continued):—Now the pursuers aver that this advice given by Davidson & Syme proceeded on this error, that they failed to discover and to include or take into account a very important part of Mr Campbell's estate, viz., the income of his wife's estate, amounting to £315 per annum, and of an actuarial value of £4250; and I understand the pursuers' case to be that, if this life interest had been ascertained to be and had been treated as part of Mr Campbell's estate, the estate would have sufficed to pay the full amount of the calls, and no compromise would have been necessary or permissible; and they undertake to prove that in consequence the liquidators suffered damage to the extent of the sum sued for, which includes interest.

"The pursuers' contention that the annual interest of Mrs Campbell's estate formed part of Mr Campbell's estate is rested on the marriage-contract, an extract of which has been produced, the principal deed not having been before me. The marriage-contract is not a trust-deed. It bears that 'the said Reverend John Campbell hereby renounces and discharges his jus mariti and right of administration over the whole estate presently belonging to her' (Mrs Campbell), 'or which she may acquire or succeed to ante matrimonio.' But it is contended that this provision is qualified by a declaration in the testing clause, which is expressed in these very peculiar terms."—(His Lordship here quoted the testing clause, supra, p. 37, note.)

"The signatures of the parties follow this testing clause in the usual way. There is a very singular peculiarity in this testing clause which may here be noticed. It mentions the signature of Mrs Campbell on 31st May and of Mr Campbell on 2d June, and presumably therefore it was not written until on or after 2d of June, and therefore after the signature of Mrs Campbell on 31st May; and yet it bears that the declaration about the

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

The pursuers reclaimed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court are of opinion that this case cannot be satisfactorily disposed of without inquiry, and we give no opinion upon the matter dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, but his interlocutor will be recalled and a remit made to him to allow parties a proof of their averments before answer, the proof to be comprehensive of the whole questions between the parties, including any facts bearing on the question of damages, so that it may be exhaustively dealt with after the proof has been taken.

LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

---

exclusion of the jus mariti was 'hereby declared' before signing. This may possibly be susceptible of explanation, but apparently there is here in the testing clause a glaring inconsistency. It appears to be self-contradictory.

"The pursuers maintain that this declaration had the effect of conferring on Mr Campbell a right to the annual interest of his wife's estate, and they aver that in reliance on the marriage-contract as thus completed, the marriage took place on 3d June 1862, that the deed was recorded on 5th June, and that, in accordance with the declaration, Mr Campbell thereafter drew and applied to his own purposes the income of his wife's estate. The pursuers put their case thus: they aver that it was the duty of Davidson & Syme to have called the attention of the liquidators to this provision in the testing clause, to have informed them that this liferent interest formed a part of Mr Campbell's estate or might fairly be claimed as such, and to have advised them that no settlement should be concluded with Mr Campbell except on condition of receiving from him the actuarial value of that life interest, and that it was also their duty to lay that information before the Court. They aver that Davidson & Syme did not call the attention of the liquidators to the provision in question, and advised them to settle with Mr Campbell on the footing that he had no such right, and that the marriage-contract was not laid before the Court at all, and that the attention of the Court was not called to the provision introduced into the testing clause. They aver that, if Davidson & Syme had fulfilled their duty, the liquidators would not have made the compromise, and that, if they did, the Court would not have sanctioned it; and they aver that loss arose to the liquidators in consequence.

"It is to be observed that the pursuers do not, and I think cannot, say that the liquidators would, if properly advised, have made a better compromise, for they do not, and I suppose cannot, say that Mr Campbell would have agreed to a compromise on any terms more unfavourable to him. Their case is, and must be, that there would have been no compromise, and that they would have recovered the amount of the calls by an action in which they would have succeeded in establishing that the annual interest of Mrs Campbell's estate formed an item of Mr Campbell's estate. I think it manifest that it is essential to the success of the pursuers' case to be able to shew that the declaration in the testing clause was effectual to restrict the clause in the body of the deed, by which the husband's jus mariti and right of administration were renounced to the fee of the wife's estate. It is clearly not enough to shew that, at the date of the settlement, that was a doubtful point, but it is essential to shew that, as the law stood at that time, it was a sound legal proposition. Otherwise there would have been no loss.

"Now, the pursuers put their charge of failure in professional duty against Messrs Davidson & Syme in an alternative form, which they were quite entitled to do, but which I have found somewhat embarrassing. They say that either Davidson & Syme failed to notice the testing clause altogether, through negligence; or that they read it and failed, through professional ignorance or mistake, to appreciate the legal effect of it.

"I take the second view first, and assume that Davidson & Syme read the

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties before answer a proof of their averments, and the pursuers a conjunct probation, reserving all questions of expenses."

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an action brought by the Assets Company, whose title to sue I will assume, against the partners in a firm of Writers to the Signet, in consequence, as the pursuers allege, of loss sustained by reason of the negligence of the defenders. It appears that the firm in question were retained by the liquidators to advise them in respect of certain compositions which were being negotiated between themselves and the share-clause. It is then said that they were bound (1) to call the attention of the liquidators to it; (2) to have advised them not to compromise except on the footing that the life interest was part of the shareholder's estate; and (3) that they were bound to have brought the marriage-contract under the notice of the Court, and to have directed attention to its peculiarities.

---

"Now, I think that to the case as thus put, and as it appears on the record, and without further inquiry, the defenders have a sufficient answer.

"Their instructions were, as they are averred by the pursuers, to satisfy themselves as to the facts, and to advise the liquidators as to the terms on which they ought to settle. They were not instructed to inform the liquidators about the facts which the liquidators might be presumed to know, nor were they instructed to give their reasons for their advice, but only to advise the liquidators as to the terms of settlement.

"Admittedly they advised them on the footing that the life interest of Mrs Campbell's estate was not a part of her husband's estate, and if that view could not be taken without gross ignorance of law on their part, they may be liable for the consequent loss; otherwise not.

"Now, it is well settled that a law-agent does not guarantee the correctness of every advice he may give, and does not incur liability in consequence of every error into which he may fall, but is only liable in damages if his mistake be gross and inexcusable, and amounts to crassa ignorantia. The cases are conclusive on that point: Purves v. Landell, 1845, 4 Bell's Appeals, 46; Cooke v. Falconer, 20th Nov. 1850, 13 D. 157; Hamilton v. Emslie, 27th Nov. 1868, 7 Macph. 173. Now, if Messrs Davidson & Syme formed the opinion that the provision in the testing clause was ineffectual to restrict the provision in the body of the deed, it is hopeless to contend that that opinion indicated gross ignorance; for it was, if not absolutely warranted, at least strongly supported by the unanimous judgment of the Court, in the then recent case of Smith v. Chambers' Trustees, 9th Nov. 1877, 5 R. 97. In that case a clause had been introduced into the testing clause of a testamentary settlement, purporting to restrict the rights conferred on beneficiaries by the deed; and it was held to be ineffectual, a point on which the Judges in the Inner-House were unanimous. That case was not exactly the same as this, because here there is an allegation that the provision under question had been acted on. But if all that could be ascribed to Davidson & Syme was an opinion as to this case substantially the same as that held by the Judges of the Inner-House in Smith's case, of course that did not indicate crassa ignorantia, whatever it might indicate. It is true that very serious doubts have been expressed as to the soundness of the judgment in that case. The judgment itself was recalled in the House of Lords on another ground, which rendered it unnecessary to decide the point as to the effect of the testing clause; but Lord Gordon expressed a distinct opinion to the effect that the judgment of the Court of Session on that point was inconsistent with a previous judgment in the House of Lords in Dunlop v. Greenlees' Trustees, 2d June 1865, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46, and was erroneous;

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

holders of the Glasgow Bank in liquidation. The particular shareholder, the Rev. John Campbell, was liable to the extent of upwards of £5000 for unpaid calls, and it became material for the pursuers to ascertain what was the extent of his property, in order to judge whether they would or would not accept the composition offered by him in respect of his liability.

The only question in debate was whether they, the defenders, ought to have reckoned as part of his estate the income of his wife's separate property. The pursuers contend that the marriage-settlement made that income part of Mr Campbell's own property, and therefore to be reckoned as one of the items to be taken into consideration in relation to the composiand the other Judges reserved their opinions. So far as judgment went, it may be admitted that, at the date of the settlement, the point might be held to be open; but Davidson & Syme could not be held to be in gross fault if their judgment concurred with that of the Judges of the First Division.

---

"But it is said that it was their duty to tell the liquidators that the question was not closed, and that opposing opinions had been expressed about it. It might have been proper enough to do that; but I see no reason to think that it was their duty. It was their duty to form their own opinion, and to advise the liquidators accordingly. But it was not their duty, nor according to their instructions, to reason out the matter with the liquidators, to say whether their opinion was given with confidence or hesitation, or to quote their authorities.

"The defenders say that the contract of marriage was before the Court. If so, the Judges presumably read the testing clause. In any case, I greatly doubt whether they would have gone back to any extent on the judgment in Smith v. Chambers' Trustees. The Judges who decided that case were the very Judges before whom the compromises with the City of Glasgow Bank shareholders came. It would not have been unreasonable had Davidson & Syme thought it hopeless to raise the question again, and I doubt whether the Court would have disapproved of the proposed compromise, and compelled the liquidators to litigate a question on which they had unanimously pronounced an adverse judgment. Lord Gordon, in the House of Lords, proceeded on what he considered the disconformity of the judgment in Smith with that of the judgment in Dunlop v. Greenlees' Trustees. But that case had been very carefully considered by the Judges in Scotland in Smith's case, and they were of opinion that the two judgments did not conflict.

"I am unable to hold that the pursuers' averments, which proceed on the assumption that Davidson & Syme read the testing clause, amount to such a charge of gross ignorance as would subject them in damages; and, in this view of the case, I do not require to consider the further averments, viz., that the liquidators did not know of this clause, and would not, had they known it, have concluded the settlement which they made; and that the Court would not have sanctioned the compromise. The prospect of being able to prove these averments seems but distant. But, if they were proved, the liability of the defenders would not follow, because they were not chargeable with crassa ignorantia. Neither do I require to consider whether the view on which they are said to have acted was right or wrong—that is to say, whether Smith v. Chambers' Trustees was well decided.

"But then the pursuers have averred alternatively that Davidson & Syme failed to read the testing clause; and that, I cannot doubt, is an averment of such gross negligence as would support an action against them for such damage as might be proved to have resulted from it. But then I do not see that there is any relevant averment that any damage resulted from that. No doubt it is averred that if they had read it then it would have been their duty to have advised the liquidators in the manner averred, but that seems to be the same point which has been already considered. What the

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.

Blair v. Assets Co.

tion to be accepted. The appellants, the defenders, contend that the marriage-settlement made it irrevocably the property of the wife; and the contention on the other side as to the liability of the defenders depends very much upon what is to be called in strictness the marriage-settlement. There is no doubt that in one part of the parchment writing signed by the spouses (though at different times under circumstances I shall have to refer to hereafter) there appears in writing a declaration that the renunciation by Mr Campbell of his jus mariti, which was absolute and unqualified in the earlier part of the instrument, was only to apply "to the capital or principal of the estate of Jane Campbell," the wife.

An important part of the discussion (though for reasons to be given hereafter I think not a conclusive part) relates to the place and the date at which this renunciation was written on the original parchment. But for the technicalities and the usage of Scottish conveyancing I should myself pursuers have not averred and have not undertaken to prove is, that the defenders, if they had read the testing clause, would have formed the opinion that the provision in it was effectual, and that it was their duty to have advised the liquidators to that effect. Had the pursuers averred that, the case might have been different; but I suppose that such an averment would have been hopeless.

---

"I think, therefore, that there is no relevant averment that the defenders were guilty of such negligence or ignorance of law leading to loss as can make them liable for that loss.

"The defenders further argued that there could have been no loss, because the case of Smith v. Chambers' Trustees was rightly decided, and would have been followed had a litigation been raised, and that the provision in the testing clause would have been held ineffectual. The pursuers argued that the judgment in Smith v. Chambers' Trustees was wrong, and that the clause was effectual. I was thus called on to review the judgment of the First Division. I consider that it is not necessary for me to undertake that task. If that had appeared to be necessary, I think it would have been proper to have allowed a proof, in order to ascertain whether there was not a vital difference between that case and this. In Smith's case, as I understand it, the Court proceeded, not only on the opinion that the testing clause is a part of a deed, which may be held to be settled law, but also on the assumption that, in that case, it was added before the granters' signature, and was itself authenticated. But if it were shewn in this case that the clause was added a couple of days after Mrs Campbell signed the deed, as seems probable, that might differentiate the two cases.

"I have found it necessary to examine the nature of the case made against the defenders before considering the title of the pursuers, and, as I have come to the conclusion that there is no relevant case against the defenders, it is unnecessary to consider at any length the question of title, which seems attended with considerable difficulty. It is of course clear that the pursuers could have no claim or action unless the liquidators had. Now, suppose a case of gross negligence or gross ignorance made out against the defenders, it is not quite obvious that the liquidators would have had an action. It might perhaps have been argued that their functions were limited to the recovery of calls sufficient to pay the whole debts of the bank, and that if they paid the whole debts they could not possibly be losers.

"On the whole, I am, however, disposed to think that, at the date of the assignation to the Assets Company, when the debts of the bank were not fully paid, the liquidators would have had a right to sue the defenders to recover from them the amount of calls which, through their fault, had not been recovered, and that such a right is covered by the definition of assets in the statute. I am therefore not prepared to sustain the plea of 'no title to sue.'"

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v.
Assets Co.

have said that the words I have quoted as existing on the parchment writing formed no part of the deed at all; but apparently it has been the practice, sanctioned by decision, to consider the attestation clause a part of the deed, and so to comply with the ancient Scottish statutes, though I cannot but think in requiring the witnesses to be designed in the body of the deed these statutes contemplated an attestation of the deed and not in the deed. The designing of the witnesses was required apparently for the purpose of ascertaining beyond dispute who the witnesses were to be, that they should be named and described in the body of the deed itself. The very distinction "in the body of the deed" would seem to shew that this was what was originally contemplated.

The practice, however, appears to have grown up (probably for convenience's sake) that after the parties have attached their signatures to that which was in truth the bargain to which both the minds had assented, a space should be left between the end of what I call the deed and the signatures to enable the attesting clause to be added and so satisfy the words "in the body of the deed," and no limit appears to have been placed by Scottish law as to the interval which might elapse between the signature of the parties to what they had agreed to and the addition of the attesting clause. So that in one case thirty-two years have been held not too long an interval within which the attestation clause may be added. The very words by which the attesting clause begins, "In witness whereof," seem to shew what is the true construction of what the attesting clause must be,—We who are the witnesses hereto are putting our names to this written instrument to which the parties have agreed.

The contention before your Lordships apparently is that this attestation clause may legitimately be used for the purpose of introducing new stipulations, and even, as in this case, for qualifying, and even contradicting, the instrument which had previously been agreed upon and signed. In Scottish law, as in English, a deed is described as a solemn instrument, and with the same object in both countries. That is, it is intended to place what the agreement was beyond the doubts incident to any transaction where an infirm memory, not assisted by any written record of what has taken place at some distant interval, may fail to describe it accurately. The proof of deliberation and authenticity was to be secured in various ways,—sealing, at one time required in both countries, as it is now required in this, signature by various statutes, delivery, and so forth. These are various expedients to preserve the evidence of things agreed upon, equally against failure of memory as against the commission of fraud, or the conflict between the parties as to what has taken place. If, however, new stipulations can be introduced many years after the parties have come to their agreement, and can either qualify or contradict the agreement by putting into the form of attestation such qualifications or contradictions, what becomes of the finality of a deed?

It is nothing to the purpose to suggest that if challenged you must prove the assent of the parties to the new matter thus introduced by the attestation clause. You can only prove it by the very means which the existence of a deed at all was intended to prevent the necessity of having recourse to, and it is manifest that if you can alter or qualify a deed by the introduction of verbal evidence, its function as a deed is gone.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.

Blair v. Assets Co.

The authority of the Court of Session itself had decided,[1] not very long before the transactions now in question, that such a provision in the attesting clause of a deed was ineffectual to restrict the operation of what I have called the deed itself; and I concur both in the decision itself and in the reasoning by which that decision was supported.

My Lords, I do not stay for the moment to comment on what might be the operation on the minds of the defenders here of that decision, because I propose to treat more at large the question of the alleged negligence. But, speaking of the matter of law only, I think that was the law of Scotland, and I think nothing has passed in your Lordships' House which can qualify or cut down that decision. In saying that I do not omit to consider the observations of Lord Gordon in Smith v. Chambers.[2] I think the noble and learned Lord was in error in supposing that there was any conflict between the judgment of your Lordships in Dunlop v. Greenlees[3] and the decision in Smith v. Chambers.[2] In the case referred to by Lord Gordon,[2] all that had to be proved was the wife's consent to a provision for herself, and she put her signature "in token of her consent to and approval of the foregoing settlement." It appears to me that, whether she signed that consent in the attesting clause or on the paper in which the deed was wrapped up, her consent was effectual. In a strict sense her signature of the deed, although it was written on the same parchment, and although included in what was described as an attesting clause, was no signature to the deed. She was no party to the deed. Her signature had no operation in the deed as a deed. Her signature only operated as a conclusive proof that she had assented to that provision for herself in the deed, and she might just as easily have established that consent by a separate and independent writing altogether.

It appears to me that the diligence of the learned counsel has failed to discover any authority which justifies the proposition now contended for. The only case[4] suggested to be in point is one in which, as my noble and learned friend Lord Watson pointed out, it would have been impossible for the parties, representing the interests they did, to urge the objection now insisted on.

But I will now assume that the question is more open to doubt than I think it is. Can it be gravely contended that a Writer to the Signet in Scotland can be made liable in an action for negligence because his opinion has coincided with the unanimous judgment of the Court of Session? As I have said, I think the judgment in Smith v. Chambers[1] on this point was perfectly right. But suppose for a moment that Lord Gordon's[2] observations should have made the defenders doubtful of the accuracy of the decision in Smith v. Chambers,[1] does it follow that they would be negligent for advising their clients to accept the composition? They might well and most prudently think it was better to accept the composition offered than to incur the risk of a law-suit to be carried to your Lordships' House in order to solve those doubts. That the same Court before which an approval of the composition in question was to come in the first instance would

[1] Smith v. Chambers, 5 R. 97.
[2] 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[3] 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46, 37 Scot. Jur. 470.
[4] Brown v. Govan, Feb. 1, 1820, F. C.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

adhere to their own decision was tolerably certain, and therefore the proposition must be, that to accept a composition—which for the moment I will assume to be not all that could have been obtained—rather than incur the expense of an appeal to your Lordships' House, was negligence. That is too absurd, as it appears to me, to require more than the statement of the proposition. Besides negligence, the plaintiff in such an action is bound also to prove the loss or damage in consequence of the negligence. Is it susceptible of proof that, if Mr Campbell had been driven to extremities, more could have been obtained in any view of this case? I think not.

My Lords, I concur entirely with the very powerful reasoning of Lord Kincairney, and I only regret that the Judges of the Second Division did not deal with his judgment in such a way as to allow your Lordships to understand why they did not accept his reasoning.

(His Lordship then moved the order at the end of the report.)

Lord Watson.—(After stating the pursuers' averments)—In my opinion the relevancy of these averments entirely depends upon the proposition that the words so introduced into the testing clause form part of the deed, and must as such receive their full legal effect. If that proposition fails the other averments of the respondents amount to nothing more than this, that before marriage there was an informal agreement between the future spouses to alter the terms of their probative deed. As might have been expected, Mr Balfour did not maintain that such an agreement could per se prevail against the deed; but he argued at some length that the agreement was after marriage so validated rei interventu as to have that effect. Upon the general question as discussed by the learned counsel I do not find it necessary to express any opinion. His argument completely ignored the well-known rule of Scots law, which regards such acts of rei interventus by a wife after marriage, or even a formal ratification by her, as a donatio inter virum et uxorem which she can revoke at pleasure.

Two years before the date of the acts of negligence imputed to the appellants, the learned Judges of the First Division had unanimously decided in Smith v. Chambers,[1] that words similarly introduced into the testing clause of a trust-disposition and settlement, which materially qualified one of the directions previously given by the testator, were of no legal effect. Upon that point separate judgments were delivered by Lords Deas and Mure, and by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Shand), with the concurrence of the late Lord President Inglis. It does seem rather extravagant that a Scottish law-agent should be accused of negligence and want of skill because, in advising the liquidators as to the terms of a compromise, he accepted the law laid down by the same Judges who had the control of the liquidation, and whose sanction to the compromise was requisite.

If the judgment of the Court of Session in Smith v. Chambers[1] be according to law, it necessarily follows that the present action is groundless. That decision was accordingly strenuously impeached by the respondents' counsel, partly upon the authority of previous decisions with which it is said to conflict, and partly on the strength of observations made by my pre-

[1] Smith v. Chambers, 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.

Blair v. Assets Co.

decessor, Lord Gordon, in the case of Smith v. Chambers,[1] when it came by appeal to this House. The other noble and learned Lords who were present when the appeal was disposed of did not find it necessary to consider that part of the case which related to the testing clause of the deed, and expressed no opinion upon the point. In deciding Smith v. Chambers[1] the Judges of the First Division had, of course, no opportunity of considering the remarks subsequently made by Lord Gordon; but all the authorities cited to us in the course of the argument for the respondents, with the exception of Brown v. Govan,[2] which has been exhumed by the industry of their counsel, were carefully examined and discussed by Lord Deas, who also refers to a number of other authorities which have not been cited by the respondents' counsel, but are by no means favourable to the respondents' contention.

The testing clause of a probative deed, which is an anomalous feature of Scottish conveyancing, apparently owes its origin to 1681, c. 5, which enacts that "all such writs to be subscribed hereafter, wherein the writer and witnesses are not designed, shall be null, and are not suppliable by condescending upon the writer, or the designation of the writer and witnesses," and also "that in all the said cases the witnesses be designed in the bodie of the writ, instrument, or execution respectively, otherwise the same shall be null and void, and make no faith in judgment, nor outwith." The Act appears to me to contemplate that these requisites shall be inserted in the body of the deed before it is executed by the subscriptions of the parties to it and of their attesting witnesses. That course might be possible in cases where there was only one party to the deed, or where several parties and their witnesses were all present for the purpose of its execution at the same time and at the same place. But it became a practical impossibility in cases where a deed was executed by several parties and their respective witnesses at different times and in different places. In order to meet the difficulty the practice was introduced, and sanctioned by decisions of the Court, of filling in the testing clause after the deed had been executed by all the parties and their witnesses at any time before the deed was recorded in a public register, or produced in judgment. Mr Bell (Principles, s. 2226) justly observes that it is "a very dangerous practice." In Blair v. Earl of Galloway[3] it was held that a testing clause might be lawfully inserted by the holder of the deed after the lapse of thirty-two years, one of the learned Judges observing,—"As to the defect in the execution of the deed, there is nothing in the law of Scotland requiring the testing clause to be filled up within a specified period, and I therefore consider the objection to be a great deal too critical."

Their admission of the practice which has just been noticed involved the Judges of the Court of Session in the unpleasant consequences which inevitably attend the affirmation of two propositions which are self-contradictory. On the one hand, it compelled them to hold, fictione juris, that the testing clause had actually been filled in before execution of the deed, and had been subscribed by the parties and their witnesses. On the other

[1] 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[2] Feb. 1, 1820, F. C.
[3] Nov. 15, 1827, 6 Shaw, 51.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

hand, it equally compelled their recognition of the fact, that according to the practice which they themselves had sanctioned, and which was generally if not invariably followed, the testing clause formed no part of the deed at the time of its subscription, but was or might have been added after the deed had been formally authenticated by the signatures of the parties to it, and of the attesting witnesses. In these circumstances, it appears to me to be clear beyond doubt, that a testing clause which may have been, and probably was, inserted after subscription, ought not to contain, and cannot legitimately contain, any terms which would, if given effect to, cut down or modify the agreement which the parties had, in point of fact, executed. I am not prepared to go that length, unless constrained by clear and cogent authority, which I have been unable to find, either in the argument of the present respondents or elsewhere. It would be an extraordinary state of the law, if one of the parties to a deed, who had the custody of it, could, after the lapse of twenty or thirty years, and after the death of some or all of the parties to it, alter its whole tenor or effect by the insertion of a testing clause. But that is the logical result of the argument addressed to us for the respondents.

In my opinion, it is not immaterial to notice the facts and allegations which are before us in the present case, bearing upon the time at which the testing clause of the marriage-contract was written into the deed, which was executed by the wife on May 31, and by the husband on June 2, 1862. The insertion must have been made on or before June 5, because, on that day, the instrument, with the testing clause as it now stands, was duly recorded for preservation in the Books of Council and Session. But the productions made along with the record, and relied on by the respondents as shewing that the lady consented to an alteration of the terms of the deed, also shew conclusively that no proposal for an alteration was made to her until June 2, two days after her signature had been adhibited and attested, and that her husband, in like manner, subscribed the deed without the alteration, upon the written assurance of his law-agents that it would be subsequently inserted in the testing clause.

I am satisfied with the judgment of the First Division in Smith v. Chambers,[1] which, in my opinion, is decisive of the present case; and I entirely concur in the exhaustive exposition of the law and examination of previous decisions which is to be found in the opinion delivered by Lord Deas. I do not propose to occupy your Lordships' time by repeating the reasoning of Lord Deas, and shall content myself with a brief reference to two authorities relied on by the respondents, which, as already stated, are not noticed in his Lordship's opinion.

The case of Brown v. Govan[2] appears to be a recent discovery. It is not surprising to find that it was neither cited nor commented upon in Johnstone v. Coldstream,[3] Dunlop v. Greenlees,[4] or in Smith v. Chambers,[1] because the question which is involved in these cases and arises for decision in this appeal was not there raised, and no judicial opinion was expressed upon it. According to the report, a father by his contract of marriage made

[1] 5 R. 97, 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[2] Feb. 1, 1820, F. C.
[3] June 30, 1843, 5 D. 1297, 15 Scot. Jur. 541.
[4] 2 Macph. 1, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

certain provisions in favour of the children of the marriage, payable on their attaining majority or being married; and by a subsequent declaration he postponed the period of payment until twelve months after his decease. During his lifetime he made a conveyance of heritable subjects to his children, in security of their provisions, upon which they were infeft. After his death the trustee in his sequestration brought a reduction of the conveyance and sasine following upon it. It was suggested by the respondents that the declaration postponing the period of payment was only to be found in the testing clause of the contract, and they read some extracts from the Session papers, which did not satisfy me that such was the case. Whether it was so or not is to my mind immaterial. If the fact was as represented, it is clear that the children, who were the only persons having an interest to raise the point, did not attempt to do so. The only defence upon which they relied was that the heritable security which they had obtained from their parent was in law equivalent to payment of their provisions.

There only remains to be noticed the opinion expressed by Lord Gordon in Chambers v. Smith,[1] which was undoubtedly adverse to the unanimous decision of the Court below, in relation to the testing clause of Dr Chambers' settlement. That point was not disposed of by the House; and, seeing that the opinion expressed by the learned Lord was strictly obiter, I feel at liberty respectfully to differ. It was mainly rested upon the ground that the decision of the learned Judges of the First Division was at variance with the judgment of this House in Dunlop v. Greenlees.[2] The two cases were, to my mind, essentially dissimilar. In Chambers v. Smith[3] the effect of the testing clause was to alter materially one of the directions of the trust created by the testator. In Dunlop v. Greenlees[2] the words introduced into the testing clause were merely descriptive of the object with which Mrs Greenlees, who was not a party to the deed, subscribed her husband's settlement. They did not alter or affect a single provision made by the testator; and, in my opinion, if they had been omitted from the testing clause, the legal inference deducible from the bare fact of her subscription would have been precisely the same.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored; and I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Herschell.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The matter has been so fully treated by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me that I shall not detain your Lordships long.

It is admitted by the learned counsel for the respondents that unless the condescendence discloses a case of negligence against the appellants, whereby the respondents have been damnified, there was no necessity to send this case to proof, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to have stood.

I think the case might really be disposed of upon a very short point. The negligence charged is that the appellants, being professional men, advised the respondents erroneously—so erroneously as to be negligent—upon a question of law. At the time they gave their advice a decision had been arrived at by the very Court under whose superintendence the liquidation was being conducted, which the learned counsel for the respondents have not attempted to distinguish from the present case; and that decision was in exact accordance with the advice which the appellants gave to those who had employed them. The utmost that could be said is that subsequently to that decision, namely, when the case then in the Court of Session came before this House, where it was reversed upon another point, one of the noble and learned Lords expressed a doubt whether, upon the point which is now of importance, that case (Smith v. Chambers[1]) was rightly decided. My Lords, it was no part of the necessary duty of the appellants to discuss the questions of law which might arise upon the matters upon which they were asked to advise. I can see not the faintest shadow of ground for alleging that in giving the advice they displayed any want of care whatsoever. That would be enough to dispose of the case.

[1] 5 R. (H. L.) 151. [2] 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46. [3] 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

But, inasmuch as the question of law, whether the case of Smith v. Chambers[1] was correctly decided or not, has been elaborately argued and is of great importance, I think it right to say that I have arrived at the same conclusion as my noble and learned friends have already expressed. I cannot entertain any doubt whatsoever that Smith v. Chambers[1] was a perfectly sound and correct exposition of the law of Scotland. If there had been a long course of decisions to the contrary effect one might have been bound to give effect to them and to hold that the law of Scotland, as regards deeds and their execution, was in a condition so lamentably unsound and unreasonable as to require immediate amendment. But no such decisions have been furnished. The purpose and object of parties in reducing their agreements into writing and executing a deed which contains them is that, being thus solemnly recorded, no question shall arise afterwards as to what their agreement really was. It is not to depend upon infirmity of memory as to what passed between them. It is not to be liable to fraudulent misrepresentation as to what the agreement really was. The matter is to be put beyond doubt by a written instrument signed by the parties, their signatures being attested. If the law of Scotland were as the respondents contend it is, to my mind the value of a deed would be absolutely and utterly destroyed. What would be the use of parties solemnly recording the agreement which they had come to, signing the deed and having their signatures attested, if one of the parties afterwards, in whose custody the instrument was, behind the back of the other, could insert in the testing clause (which it would be perfectly proper for that party to fill in without reference to the other) a provision repugnant to some of the stipulations of the deed which the parties had signed? That might be perfectly honestly done, but the matter might never come to the notice of the other party until some dispute arose years afterwards; it might, indeed, never come to light until all the parties to the transaction were dead, and all that could be referred to was the instrument itself; and yet the provision thus inserted ex post facto in the instrument by one of the parties would inevitably control their rights, and might impose obligations or destroy rights which had been stipulated for

[1] 5 R. 97, 5 R. (H. L.) 151.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.

Blair v. Assets Co.

and agreed to and embodied in the deed which had been signed and attested.

One need only state such a proposition to see that it would be impossible to maintain it on any ground of principle, and that, as I say, one could only give one's assent to it if constrained to do so by an overwhelming weight of authorities. But no such authorities have been produced: the case of Johnstone v. Coldstream[1] and the case of Dunlop v. Greenlees[2] appear to me to be cases as far as possible removed from the case of Smith v. Chambers[3] or the present case. The point that was decided by the Court of Session in Johnstone v. Coldstream,[1] and by the Court of Session and this House in Dunlop v. Greenlees[2] was entirely different from the present. The only prior case not reviewed in the judgment of Smith v. Chambers[3] is the case of Brown v. Govan.[4] I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and for the reasons he has given, that that really is not a case in point at all.

For these reasons, my Lords, I think that, not only was there no case of negligence against the appellants, but that the opinion which was involved in the advice which they gave with regard to the law of Scotland was perfectly correct.

LORD SHAND.—I also am of opinion that the facts stated by the pursuers do not warrant the conclusion of liability for damages on the part of the law-agents who are sued in this action.

The whole case of the pursuers, the Assets Company, seems to depend on their establishing that the provision which was inserted in the testing clause of the marriage-contract was effectual. If it was not so, the pursuers have failed to shew that they have suffered any loss whatever on the facts stated.

By the provision contained in the marriage-contract as it was signed by Mrs Campbell, it was declared that her husband renounced and discharged "his jus mariti and right of administration over the whole estate presently belonging to her or which she might acquire or succeed to stante matrimonio." With that clause standing as a part of the deed she signed it. But days after she had signed the deed, when this testing clause was filled in, there was a most important stipulation added, repugnant to that which was contained in the deed when she signed it. It was to this effect:—"Such renunciation" (that is the renunciation I have just read) "and exclusion shall only apply to the capital or principal of the estate of the said Jane Campbell, and shall not extend or apply to the annual produce or interest of her said estate."

I am clearly of opinion, as I think all your Lordships are, that this alteration, seriously affecting a provision of the deed as it left the hand of the lady as she signed it, was ineffectual.

Having taken part in the decision of Smith v. Chambers[3] I do not propose to enter upon the grounds of that judgment. I might well have been silent in the First Division of the Court of Session after the elaborate and

---

[1] 5 D. 1297.
[2] 2 Macph. 1, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46.
[3] 5 R. 97, 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[4] February 1, 1820, F. C.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

careful judgment of Lord Deas, but I find on looking to the report[1] that I went fully over the grounds of my own opinion, and I do not think it necessary to add anything to what I there said.

Although I do not say that it is very material, still it is worthy of observation that in one aspect of this case it is more unfavourable for the present pursuers than what occurred in the case of Smith v. Chambers.[2] The Lord Ordinary, Lord Kincairney, in the careful, exhaustive, and closely reasoned judgment which he has given in this case, makes this observation in reference to Smith v. Chambers,[2]—"In Smith's case, as I understand it, the Court proceeded, not only on the opinion that the testing clause is a part of a deed, which may be held to be settled law, but also on the assumption that in that case it was added before the granter's signature, and was itself authenticated. But if it were shewn in this case that the clause was added a couple of days after Mrs Campbell signed the deed, as seems probable, that might differentiate the two cases." Having refreshed my memory from the report of that case, I agree in the opinion Lord Kincairney states. I think there the Court gave their judgment upon the assumption that the addition had been made before the granter's signature. But in this case the matter stands very differently, for it is admitted, and it appears to be perfectly clear upon documents which the pursuers have themselves produced, that the lady signed the deed on May 31, and that the alteration was made days afterwards, certainly not earlier than June 3, when the marriage was just about to take place. It is, therefore, a clause that is unauthenticated in any way by the signature of the lady who is said to be bound by it. That appears to me to illustrate the dangers there would be in giving to the alterations inserted in a testing clause the extraordinary effect which is contended for by the respondents in this case.

It is true they have said that this feature of the case may be overcome. It was said by Mr Balfour in his able pleading that he was prepared to prove authority—practically by parole evidence—for the change that was made in the testing clause altering the deed. And again, it was said there was another answer to the defenders' argument, namely, that the deed had been acted upon by the spouses in such a way as to shew that the provision added in the testing clause was really a provision to which the spouses intended to give effect.

As to the proof of authority, it is obvious that evidence of that kind would be incompetent to control a solemn deed. It is really a proposal to control the written instrument by parole evidence—it might be by evidence of witnesses—as to what had occurred in conversations. It happens here that the evidence would be fortified by a signature given by the lady to a document in which she said, "I approve of the alteration," but that practically would be nothing stronger than parole evidence to cut down the effect of a deed deliberately entered into. Plainly, therefore, that answer could not be successfully maintained.

As to the acting of the parties, it is said that the lady, from the time of the marriage onwards, allowed her husband to draw this annual income. As was observed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Herschell)

[1] 5 R. at p. 125. [2] 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.

Blair v. Assets Co.

in the course of the discussion, there is nothing more common than for a wife, although she has an income settled upon herself, to arrange that the husband shall draw it from time to time, and that arrangement goes on so long as it is satisfactory. Therefore, I should attribute no important effect to actings of that kind. But it must be further observed that actings after the marriage could surely never be allowed to construe or control the direct obligations of the parties as those are recorded in the deed which the parties had signed.

I have come to the conclusion without difficulty that there has been no allegation of such negligence on the part of the agents as would involve responsibility for damages under the claim made upon them. The clause was ineffectual as an alteration on the provision of the deed as to the lady's estate, and it was therefore of no consequence whether the agents did or did not read it.

It is true that after the date when Smith v. Chambers[1] was decided in the Court of Session, Lord Gordon, on an appeal to this House, expressed, I will not say a distinct opinion that that judgment was wrong, but at all events a strong opinion that, according to his view, sufficient effect had not been given to certain previous cases; but it is worthy of notice that in the opinions which were delivered in the First Division of the Court these cases were discussed; they were fully before the Court, and I think it was unanimously held that they were quite distinguishable from the case then before the Court. I believe several of your Lordships have already expressed that view.

Lord Kincairney very justly observes in his opinion that the instructions given to the agents "were as they are averred by the pursuers, to satisfy themselves as to the facts, and to advise the liquidators as to the terms on which they ought to settle." That was an instruction to give their final opinion upon the whole matter as to what they thought would be reasonable terms, and as to whether the terms which had been offered were reasonable or not. As he says in a subsequent passage, "but it is said that it was their duty to tell the liquidators that the question was not closed, and that opposing opinions had been expressed about it. It might have been proper enough to do that, but I see no reason to think that it was their duty. It was their duty to form their own opinion, and to advise the liquidators accordingly. But it was not their duty, nor according to their instructions, to reason out the matter with the liquidators, to say whether their opinion was given with confidence or hesitation, or to quote their authorities." I concur in these observations by Lord Kincairney. The law-agents in the circumstances might well hold the opinion, which I think was a sound opinion, that Mr Campbell had no right whatever to the income of the capital belonging to his wife, and entertaining that opinion, I think it cannot be maintained that they were bound to enter into details of the kind which have been suggested by the present respondents.

On these grounds, I am of opinion with your Lordships that we should revert to the opinion of Lord Kincairney, and reverse the interlocutor of the Second Division.

---

[1] 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

The pursuers reclaimed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court are of opinion that this case cannot be satisfactorily disposed of without inquiry, and we give no opinion upon the matter dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, but his interlocutor will be recalled and a remit made to him to allow parties a proof of their averments before answer, the proof to be comprehensive of the whole questions between the parties, including any facts bearing on the question of damages, so that it may be exhaustively dealt with after the proof has been taken.

LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

---

exclusion of the jus mariti was 'hereby declared' before signing. This may possibly be susceptible of explanation, but apparently there is here in the testing clause a glaring inconsistency. It appears to be self-contradictory.

"The pursuers maintain that this declaration had the effect of conferring on Mr Campbell a right to the annual interest of his wife's estate, and they aver that in reliance on the marriage-contract as thus completed, the marriage took place on 3d June 1862; that the deed was recorded on 5th June, and that, in accordance with the declaration, Mr Campbell thereafter drew and applied to his own purposes the income of his wife's estate. The pursuers put their case thus: they aver that it was the duty of Davidson & Syme to have called the attention of the liquidators to this provision in the testing clause, to have informed them that this liferent interest formed a part of Mr Campbell's estate or might fairly be claimed as such, and to have advised them that no settlement should be concluded with Mr Campbell except on condition of receiving from him the actuarial value of that life interest, and that it was also their duty to lay that information before the Court. They aver that Davidson & Syme did not call the attention of the liquidators to the provision in question, and advised them to settle with Mr Campbell on the footing that he had no such right, and that the marriage-contract was not laid before the Court at all, and that the attention of the Court was not called to the provision introduced into the testing clause. They aver that, if Davidson & Syme had fulfilled their duty, the liquidators would not have made the compromise, and that, if they did, the Court would not have sanctioned it; and they aver that loss arose to the liquidators in consequence.

"It is to be observed that the pursuers do not, and I think cannot, say that the liquidators would, if properly advised, have made a better compromise, for they do not, and I suppose cannot, say that Mr Campbell would have agreed to a compromise on any terms more unfavourable to him. Their case is, and must be, that there would have been no compromise, and that they would have recovered the amount of the calls by an action in which they would have succeeded in establishing that the annual interest of Mrs Campbell's estate formed an item of Mr Campbell's estate. I think it manifest that it is essential to the success of the pursuers' case to be able to shew that the declaration in the testing clause was effectual to restrict the clause in the body of the deed, by which the husband's jus mariti and right of administration were renounced to the fee of the wife's estate. It is clearly not enough to shew that, at the date of the settlement, that was a doubtful point, but it is essential to shew that, as the law stood at that time, it was a sound legal proposition. Otherwise there would have been no loss.

"Now, the pursuers put their charge of failure in professional duty against Messrs Davidson & Syme in an alternative form, which they were quite entitled to do, but which I have found somewhat embarrassing. They say that either Davidson & Syme failed to notice the testing clause altogether, through negligence; or that they read it and failed, through professional ignorance or mistake, to appreciate the legal effect of it.

"I take the second view first, and assume that Davidson & Syme read the

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties before answer a proof of their averments, and the pursuers a conjunct probation, reserving all questions of expenses."

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an action brought by the Assets Company, whose title to sue I will assume, against the partners in a firm of Writers to the Signet, in consequence, as the pursuers allege, of loss sustained by reason of the negligence of the defenders. It appears that the firm in question were retained by the liquidators to advise them in respect of certain compositions which were being negotiated between themselves and the share-clause. It is then said that they were bound (1) to call the attention of the liquidators to it; (2) to have advised them not to compromise except on the footing that the life interest was part of the shareholder's estate; and (3) that they were bound to have brought the marriage-contract under the notice of the Court, and to have directed attention to its peculiarities.

---

"Now, I think that to the case as thus put, and as it appears on the record, and without further inquiry, the defenders have a sufficient answer.

"Their instructions were, as they are averred by the pursuers, to satisfy themselves as to the facts, and to advise the liquidators as to the terms on which they ought to settle. They were not instructed to inform the liquidators about the facts which the liquidators might be presumed to know, nor were they instructed to give their reasons for their advice, but only to advise the liquidators as to the terms of settlement.

"Admittedly they advised them on the footing that the life interest of Mrs Campbell's estate was not a part of her husband's estate, and if that view could not be taken without gross ignorance of law on their part, they may be liable for the consequent loss; otherwise not.

"Now, it is well settled that a law-agent does not guarantee the correctness of every advice he may give, and does not incur liability in consequence of every error into which he may fall, but is only liable in damages if his mistake be gross and inexcusable, and amounts to crassa ignorantia. The cases are conclusive on that point: Purves v. Landell, 1845, 4 Bell's Appeals, 46; Cooke v. Falconer, 20th Nov. 1850, 13 D. 157; Hamilton v. Emslie, 27th Nov. 1868, 7 Macph. 173. Now, if Messrs Davidson & Syme formed the opinion that the provision in the testing clause was ineffectual to restrict the provision in the body of the deed, it is hopeless to contend that that opinion indicated gross ignorance; for it was, if not absolutely warranted, at least strongly supported by the unanimous judgment of the Court, in the then recent case of Smith v. Chambers' Trustees, 9th Nov. 1877, 5 R. 97. In that case a clause had been introduced into the testing clause of a testamentary settlement, purporting to restrict the rights conferred on beneficiaries by the deed; and it was held to be ineffectual, a point on which the Judges in the Inner-House were unanimous. That case was not exactly the same as this, because here there is an allegation that the provision under question had been acted on. But if all that could be ascribed to Davidson & Syme was an opinion as to this case substantially the same as that held by the Judges of the Inner-House in Smith's case, of course that did not indicate crassa ignorantia, whatever it might indicate. It is true that very serious doubts have been expressed as to the soundness of the judgment in that case. The judgment itself was recalled in the House of Lords on another ground, which rendered it unnecessary to decide the point as to the effect of the testing clause; but Lord Gordon expressed a distinct opinion to the effect that the judgment of the Court of Session on that point was inconsistent with a previous judgment in the House of Lords in Dunlop v. Greenlees' Trustees, 2d June 1865, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46, and was erroneous;

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

holders of the Glasgow Bank in liquidation. The particular shareholder, the Rev. John Campbell, was liable to the extent of upwards of £5000 for unpaid calls, and it became material for the pursuers to ascertain what was the extent of his property, in order to judge whether they would or would not accept the composition offered by him in respect of his liability.

The only question in debate was whether they, the defenders, ought to have reckoned as part of his estate the income of his wife's separate property. The pursuers contend that the marriage-settlement made that income part of Mr Campbell's own property, and therefore to be reckoned as one of the items to be taken into consideration in relation to the composiand the other Judges reserved their opinions. So far as judgment went, it may be admitted that, at the date of the settlement, the point might be held to be open; but Davidson & Syme could not be held to be in gross fault if their judgment concurred with that of the Judges of the First Division.

---

"But it is said that it was their duty to tell the liquidators that the question was not closed, and that opposing opinions had been expressed about it. It might have been proper enough to do that; but I see no reason to think that it was their duty. It was their duty to form their own opinion, and to advise the liquidators accordingly. But it was not their duty, nor according to their instructions, to reason out the matter with the liquidators, to say whether their opinion was given with confidence or hesitation, or to quote their authorities.

"The defenders say that the contract of marriage was before the Court. If so, the Judges presumably read the testing clause. In any case, I greatly doubt whether they would have gone back to any extent on the judgment in Smith v. Chambers' Trustees. The Judges who decided that case were the very Judges before whom the compromises with the City of Glasgow Bank shareholders came. It would not have been unreasonable had Davidson & Syme thought it hopeless to raise the question again, and I doubt whether the Court would have disapproved of the proposed compromise, and compelled the liquidators to litigate a question on which they had unanimously pronounced an adverse judgment. Lord Gordon, in the House of Lords, proceeded on what he considered the disconformity of the judgment in Smith with that of the judgment in Dunlop v. Greenlees' Trustees. But that case had been very carefully considered by the Judges in Scotland in Smith's case, and they were of opinion that the two judgments did not conflict.

"I am unable to hold that the pursuers' averments, which proceed on the assumption that Davidson & Syme read the testing clause, amount to such a charge of gross ignorance as would subject them in damages; and, in this view of the case, I do not require to consider the further averments, viz., that the liquidators did not know of this clause, and would not, had they known it, have concluded the settlement which they made; and that the Court would not have sanctioned the compromise. The prospect of being able to prove these averments seems but distant. But, if they were proved, the liability of the defenders would not follow, because they were not chargeable with crassa ignorantia. Neither do I require to consider whether the view on which they are said to have acted was right or wrong—that is to say, whether Smith v. Chambers' Trustees was well decided.

"But then the pursuers have averred alternatively that Davidson & Syme failed to read the testing clause; and that, I cannot doubt, is an averment of such gross negligence as would support an action against them for such damage as might be proved to have resulted from it. But then I do not see that there is any relevant averment that any damage resulted from that. No doubt it is averred that if they had read it then it would have been their duty to have advised the liquidators in the manner averred, but that seems to be the same point which has been already considered. What the

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

tion to be accepted. The appellants, the defenders, contend that the marriage-settlement made it irrevocably the property of the wife; and the contention on the other side as to the liability of the defenders depends very much upon what is to be called in strictness the marriage-settlement. There is no doubt that in one part of the parchment writing signed by the spouses (though at different times under circumstances I shall have to refer to hereafter) there appears in writing a declaration that the renunciation by Mr Campbell of his jus mariti, which was absolute and unqualified in the earlier part of the instrument, was only to apply "to the capital or principal of the estate of Jane Campbell," the wife.

An important part of the discussion (though for reasons to be given hereafter I think not a conclusive part) relates to the place and the date at which this renunciation was written on the original parchment. But for the technicalities and the usage of Scottish conveyancing I should myself pursuers have not averred and have not undertaken to prove is, that the defenders, if they had read the testing clause, would have formed the opinion that the provision in it was effectual, and that it was their duty to have advised the liquidators to that effect. Had the pursuers averred that, the case might have been different; but I suppose that such an averment would have been hopeless.

---

"I think, therefore, that there is no relevant averment that the defenders were guilty of such negligence or ignorance of law leading to loss as can make them liable for that loss.

"The defenders further argued that there could have been no loss, because the case of Smith v. Chambers' Trustees was rightly decided, and would have been followed had a litigation been raised, and that the provision in the testing clause would have been held ineffectual. The pursuers argued that the judgment in Smith v. Chambers' Trustees was wrong, and that the clause was effectual. I was thus called on to review the judgment of the First Division. I consider that it is not necessary for me to undertake that task. If that had appeared to be necessary, I think it would have been proper to have allowed a proof, in order to ascertain whether there was not a vital difference between that case and this. In Smith's case, as I understand it, the Court proceeded, not only on the opinion that the testing clause is a part of a deed, which may be held to be settled law, but also on the assumption that, in that case, it was added before the granters' signature, and was itself authenticated. But if it were shewn in this case that the clause was added a couple of days after Mrs Campbell signed the deed, as seems probable, that might differentiate the two cases.

"I have found it necessary to examine the nature of the case made against the defenders before considering the title of the pursuers, and, as I have come to the conclusion that there is no relevant case against the defenders, it is unnecessary to consider at any length the question of title, which seems attended with considerable difficulty. It is of course clear that the pursuers could have no claim or action unless the liquidators had. Now, suppose a case of gross negligence or gross ignorance made out against the defenders, it is not quite obvious that the liquidators would have had an action. It might perhaps have been argued that their functions were limited to the recovery of calls sufficient to pay the whole debts of the bank, and that if they paid the whole debts they could not possibly be losers.

"On the whole, I am, however, disposed to think that, at the date of the assignation to the Assets Company, when the debts of the bank were not fully paid, the liquidators would have had a right to sue the defenders to recover from them the amount of calls which, through their fault, had not been recovered, and that such a right is covered by the definition of assets in the statute. I am therefore not prepared to sustain the plea of 'no title to sue.'"

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

have said that the words I have quoted as existing on the parchment writing formed no part of the deed at all; but apparently it has been the practice, santioned by decision, to consider the attestation clause a part of the deed, and so to comply with the ancient Scottish statutes, though I cannot but think in requiring the witnesses to be designed in the body of the deed these statutes contemplated an attestation of the deed and not in the deed. The designing of the witnesses was required apparently for the purpose of ascertaining beyond dispute who the witnesses were to be, that they should be named and described in the body of the deed itself. The very distinction "in the body of the deed" would seem to shew that this was what was originally contemplated.

The practice, however, appears to have grown up (probably for convenience's sake) that after the parties have attached their signatures to that which was in truth the bargain to which both the minds had assented, a space should be left between the end of what I call the deed and the signatures to enable the attesting clause to be added and so satisfy the words "in the body of the deed," and no limit appears to have been placed by Scottish law as to the interval which might elapse between the signature of the parties to what they had agreed to and the addition of the attesting clause. So that in one case thirty-two years have been held not too long an interval within which the attestation clause may be added. The very words by which the attesting clause begins, "In witness whereof," seem to shew what is the true construction of what the attesting clause must be,—We who are the witnesses hereto are putting our names to this written instrument to which the parties have agreed.

The contention before your Lordships apparently is that this attestation clause may legitimately be used for the purpose of introducing new stipulations, and even, as in this case, for qualifying, and even contradicting, the instrument which had previously been agreed upon and signed. In Scottish law, as in English, a deed is described as a solemn instrument, and with the same object in both countries. That is, it is intended to place what the agreement was beyond the doubts incident to any transaction where an infirm memory, not assisted by any written record of what has taken place at some distant interval, may fail to describe it accurately. The proof of deliberation and authenticity was to be secured in various ways,—sealing, at one time required in both countries, as it is now required in this, signature by various statutes, delivery, and so forth. These are various expedients to preserve the evidence of things agreed upon, equally against failure of memory as against the commission of fraud, or the conflict between the parties as to what has taken place. If, however, new stipulations can be introduced many years after the parties have come to their agreement, and can either qualify or contradict the agreement by putting into the form of attestation such qualifications or contradictions, what becomes of the finality of a deed?

It is nothing to the purpose to suggest that if challenged you must prove the assent of the parties to the new matter thus introduced by the attestation clause. You can only prove it by the very means which the existence of a deed at all was intended to prevent the necessity of having recourse to, and it is manifest that if you can alter or qualify a deed by the introduction of verbal evidence, its function as a deed is gone.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

The authority of the Court of Session itself had decided,[1] not very long before the transactions now in question, that such a provision in the attesting clause of a deed was ineffectual to restrict the operation of what I have called the deed itself; and I concur both in the decision itself and in the reasoning by which that decision was supported.

My Lords, I do not stay for the moment to comment on what might be the operation on the minds of the defenders here of that decision, because I propose to treat more at large the question of the alleged negligence. But, speaking of the matter of law only, I think that was the law of Scotland, and I think nothing has passed in your Lordships' House which can qualify or cut down that decision. In saying that I do not omit to consider the observations of Lord Gordon in Smith v. Chambers.[2] I think the noble and learned Lord was in error in supposing that there was any conflict between the judgment of your Lordships in Dunlop v. Greenlees[3] and the decision in Smith v. Chambers.[2] In the case referred to by Lord Gordon,[3] all that had to be proved was the wife's consent to a provision for herself, and she put her signature "in token of her consent to and approval of the foregoing settlement." It appears to me that, whether she signed that consent in the attesting clause or on the paper in which the deed was wrapped up, her consent was effectual. In a strict sense her signature of the deed, although it was written on the same parchment, and although included in what was described as an attesting clause, was no signature to the deed. She was no party to the deed. Her signature had no operation in the deed as a deed. Her signature only operated as a conclusive proof that she had assented to that provision for herself in the deed, and she might just as easily have established that consent by a separate and independent writing altogether.

It appears to me that the diligence of the learned counsel has failed to discover any authority which justifies the proposition now contended for. The only case[4] suggested to be in point is one in which, as my noble and learned friend Lord Watson pointed out, it would have been impossible for the parties, representing the interests they did, to urge the objection now insisted on.

But I will now assume that the question is more open to doubt than I think it is. Can it be gravely contended that a Writer to the Signet in Scotland can be made liable in an action for negligence because his opinion has coincided with the unanimous judgment of the Court of Session? As I have said, I think the judgment in Smith v. Chambers[1] on this point was perfectly right. But suppose for a moment that Lord Gordon's[2] observations should have made the defenders doubtful of the accuracy of the decision in Smith v. Chambers,[1] does it follow that they would be negligent for advising their clients to accept the composition? They might well and most prudently think it was better to accept the composition offered than to incur the risk of a law-suit to be carried to your Lordships' House in order to solve those doubts. That the same Court before which an approval of the composition in question was to come in the first instance would

[1] Smith v. Chambers, 5 R. 97.
[2] 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[3] 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46, 37 Scot. Jur. 470.
[4] Brown v. Govan, Feb. 1, 1820, F. C.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

adhere to their own decision was tolerably certain, and therefore the proposition must be, that to accept a composition—which for the moment I will assume to be not all that could have been obtained—rather than incur the expense of an appeal to your Lordships' House, was negligence. That is too absurd, as it appears to me, to require more than the statement of the proposition. Besides negligence, the plaintiff in such an action is bound also to prove the loss or damage in consequence of the negligence. Is it susceptible of proof that, if Mr Campbell had been driven to extremities, more could have been obtained in any view of this case? I think not.

My Lords, I concur entirely with the very powerful reasoning of Lord Kincairney, and I only regret that the Judges of the Second Division did not deal with his judgment in such a way as to allow your Lordships to understand why they did not accept his reasoning.

(His Lordship then moved the order at the end of the report.)

Lord Watson.—(After stating the pursuers' averments)—In my opinion the relevancy of these averments entirely depends upon the proposition that the words so introduced into the testing clause form part of the deed, and must as such receive their full legal effect. If that proposition fails the other averments of the respondents amount to nothing more than this, that before marriage there was an informal agreement between the future spouses to alter the terms of their probative deed. As might have been expected, Mr Balfour did not maintain that such an agreement could per se prevail against the deed; but he argued at some length that the agreement was after marriage so validated rei interventu as to have that effect. Upon the general question as discussed by the learned counsel I do not find it necessary to express any opinion. His argument completely ignored the well-known rule of Scots law, which regards such acts of rei interventus by a wife after marriage, or even a formal ratification by her, as a donatio inter virum et uxorem which she can revoke at pleasure.

Two years before the date of the acts of negligence imputed to the appellants, the learned Judges of the First Division had unanimously decided in Smith v. Chambers,[1] that words similarly introduced into the testing clause of a trust-disposition and settlement, which materially qualified one of the directions previously given by the testator, were of no legal effect. Upon that point separate judgments were delivered by Lords Deas and Mure, and by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Shand), with the concurrence of the late Lord President Inglis. It does seem rather extravagant that a Scottish law-agent should be accused of negligence and want of skill because, in advising the liquidators as to the terms of a compromise, he accepted the law laid down by the same Judges who had the control of the liquidation, and whose sanction to the compromise was requisite.

If the judgment of the Court of Session in Smith v. Chambers[1] be according to law, it necessarily follows that the present action is groundless. That decision was accordingly strenuously impeached by the respondents' counsel, partly upon the authority of previous decisions with which it is said to conflict, and partly on the strength of observations made by my pre-

[1] Smith v. Chambers, 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

decessor, Lord Gordon, in the case of Smith v. Chambers,[1] when it came by appeal to this House. The other noble and learned Lords who were present when the appeal was disposed of did not find it necessary to consider that part of the case which related to the testing clause of the deed, and expressed no opinion upon the point. In deciding Smith v. Chambers[1] the Judges of the First Division had, of course, no opportunity of considering the remarks subsequently made by Lord Gordon; but all the authorities cited to us in the course of the argument for the respondents, with the exception of Brown v. Govan,[2] which has been exhumed by the industry of their counsel, were carefully examined and discussed by Lord Deas, who also refers to a number of other authorities which have not been cited by the respondents' counsel, but are by no means favourable to the respondents' contention.

The testing clause of a probative deed, which is an anomalous feature of Scottish conveyancing, apparently owes its origin to 1681, c. 5, which enacts that "all such writs to be subscribed hereafter, wherein the writer and witnesses are not designed, shall be null, and are not suppliable by condescending upon the writer, or the designation of the writer and witnesses," and also "that in all the said cases the witnesses be designed in the bodie of the writ, instrument, or execution respectively, otherwise the same shall be null and void, and make no faith in judgment, nor outwith." The Act appears to me to contemplate that these requisites shall be inserted in the body of the deed before it is executed by the subscriptions of the parties to it and of their attesting witnesses. That course might be possible in cases where there was only one party to the deed, or where several parties and their witnesses were all present for the purpose of its execution at the same time and at the same place. But it became a practical impossibility in cases where a deed was executed by several parties and their respective witnesses at different times and in different places. In order to meet the difficulty the practice was introduced, and sanctioned by decisions of the Court, of filling in the testing clause after the deed had been executed by all the parties and their witnesses at any time before the deed was recorded in a public register, or produced in judgment. Mr Bell (Principles, s. 2226) justly observes that it is "a very dangerous practice." In Blair v. Earl of Galloway[3] it was held that a testing clause might be lawfully inserted by the holder of the deed after the lapse of thirty-two years, one of the learned Judges observing,—"As to the defect in the execution of the deed, there is nothing in the law of Scotland requiring the testing clause to be filled up within a specified period, and I therefore consider the objection to be a great deal too critical."

Their admission of the practice which has just been noticed involved the Judges of the Court of Session in the unpleasant consequences which inevitably attend the affirmation of two propositions which are self-contradictory. On the one hand, it compelled them to hold, fictione juris, that the testing clause had actually been filled in before execution of the deed, and had been subscribed by the parties and their witnesses. On the other

[1] 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[2] Feb. 1, 1820, F. C.
[3] Nov. 15, 1827, 6 Shaw, 51.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v.
Assets Co.

hand, it equally compelled their recognition of the fact, that according to the practice which they themselves had sanctioned, and which was generally if not invariably followed, the testing clause formed no part of the deed at the time of its subscription, but was or might have been added after the deed had been formally authenticated by the signatures of the parties to it, and of the attesting witnesses. In these circumstances, it appears to me to be clear beyond doubt, that a testing clause which may have been, and probably was, inserted after subscription, ought not to contain, and cannot legitimately contain, any terms which would, if given effect to, cut down or modify the agreement which the parties had, in point of fact, executed. I am not prepared to go that length, unless constrained by clear and cogent authority, which I have been unable to find, either in the argument of the present respondents or elsewhere. It would be an extraordinary state of the law, if one of the parties to a deed, who had the custody of it, could, after the lapse of twenty or thirty years, and after the death of some or all of the parties to it, alter its whole tenor or effect by the insertion of a testing clause. But that is the logical result of the argument addressed to us for the respondents.

In my opinion, it is not immaterial to notice the facts and allegations which are before us in the present case, bearing upon the time at which the testing clause of the marriage-contract was written into the deed, which was executed by the wife on May 31, and by the husband on June 2, 1862. The insertion must have been made on or before June 5, because, on that day, the instrument, with the testing clause as it now stands, was duly recorded for preservation in the Books of Council and Session. But the productions made along with the record, and relied on by the respondents as shewing that the lady consented to an alteration of the terms of the deed, also shew conclusively that no proposal for an alteration was made to her until June 2, two days after her signature had been adhibited and attested, and that her husband, in like manner, subscribed the deed without the alteration, upon the written assurance of his law-agents that it would be subsequently inserted in the testing clause.

I am satisfied with the judgment of the First Division in Smith v. Chambers,[1] which, in my opinion, is decisive of the present case; and I entirely concur in the exhaustive exposition of the law and examination of previous decisions which is to be found in the opinion delivered by Lord Deas. I do not propose to occupy your Lordships' time by repeating the reasoning of Lord Deas, and shall content myself with a brief reference to two authorities relied on by the respondents, which, as already stated, are not noticed in his Lordship's opinion.

The case of Brown v. Govan[2] appears to be a recent discovery. It is not surprising to find that it was neither cited nor commented upon in Johnstone v. Coldstream,[3] Dunlop v. Greenlees,[4] or in Smith v. Chambers,[1] because the question which is involved in these cases and arises for decision in this appeal was not there raised, and no judicial opinion was expressed upon it. According to the report, a father by his contract of marriage made

[1] 5 R. 97, 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[2] Feb. 1, 1820, F. C.
[3] June 30, 1843, 5 D. 1297, 15 Scot. Jur. 541.
[4] 2 Macph. 1, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

certain provisions in favour of the children of the marriage, payable on their attaining majority or being married; and by a subsequent declaration he postponed the period of payment until twelve months after his decease. During his lifetime he made a conveyance of heritable subjects to his children, in security of their provisions, upon which they were infeft. After his death the trustee in his sequestration brought a reduction of the conveyance and sasine following upon it. It was suggested by the respondents that the declaration postponing the period of payment was only to be found in the testing clause of the contract, and they read some extracts from the Session papers, which did not satisfy me that such was the case. Whether it was so or not is to my mind immaterial. If the fact was as represented, it is clear that the children, who were the only persons having an interest to raise the point, did not attempt to do so. The only defence upon which they relied was that the heritable security which they had obtained from their parent was in law equivalent to payment of their provisions.

There only remains to be noticed the opinion expressed by Lord Gordon in Chambers v. Smith,[1] which was undoubtedly adverse to the unanimous decision of the Court below, in relation to the testing clause of Dr Chambers' settlement. That point was not disposed of by the House; and, seeing that the opinion expressed by the learned Lord was strictly obiter, I feel at liberty respectfully to differ. It was mainly rested upon the ground that the decision of the learned Judges of the First Division was at variance with the judgment of this House in Dunlop v. Greenlees.[2] The two cases were, to my mind, essentially dissimilar. In Chambers v. Smith[3] the effect of the testing clause was to alter materially one of the directions of the trust created by the testator. In Dunlop v. Greenlees[2] the words introduced into the testing clause were merely descriptive of the object with which Mrs Greenlees, who was not a party to the deed, subscribed her husband's settlement. They did not alter or affect a single provision made by the testator; and, in my opinion, if they had been omitted from the testing clause, the legal inference deducible from the bare fact of her subscription would have been precisely the same.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored; and I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Herschell.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The matter has been so fully treated by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me that I shall not detain your Lordships long.

It is admitted by the learned counsel for the respondents that unless the condescendence discloses a case of negligence against the appellants, whereby the respondents have been damnified, there was no necessity to send this case to proof, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to have stood.

I think the case might really be disposed of upon a very short point. The negligence charged is that the appellants, being professional men, advised the respondents erroneously—so erroneously as to be negligent—upon a question of law. At the time they gave their advice a decision had been arrived at by the very Court under whose superintendence the liquidation was being conducted, which the learned counsel for the respondents have not attempted to distinguish from the present case; and that decision was in exact accordance with the advice which the appellants gave to those who had employed them. The utmost that could be said is that subsequently to that decision, namely, when the case then in the Court of Session came before this House, where it was reversed upon another point, one of the noble and learned Lords expressed a doubt whether, upon the point which is now of importance, that case (Smith v. Chambers[1]) was rightly decided. My Lords, it was no part of the necessary duty of the appellants to discuss the questions of law which might arise upon the matters upon which they were asked to advise. I can see not the faintest shadow of ground for alleging that in giving the advice they displayed any want of care whatsoever. That would be enough to dispose of the case.

[1] 5 R. (H. L.) 151. [2] 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46. [3] 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896. Blair v. Assets Co.

But, inasmuch as the question of law, whether the case of Smith v. Chambers[1] was correctly decided or not, has been elaborately argued and is of great importance, I think it right to say that I have arrived at the same conclusion as my noble and learned friends have already expressed. I cannot entertain any doubt whatsoever that Smith v. Chambers[1] was a perfectly sound and correct exposition of the law of Scotland. If there had been a long course of decisions to the contrary effect one might have been bound to give effect to them and to hold that the law of Scotland, as regards deeds and their execution, was in a condition so lamentably unsound and unreasonable as to require immediate amendment. But no such decisions have been furnished. The purpose and object of parties in reducing their agreements into writing and executing a deed which contains them is that, being thus solemnly recorded, no question shall arise afterwards as to what their agreement really was. It is not to depend upon infirmity of memory as to what passed between them. It is not to be liable to fraudulent misrepresentation as to what the agreement really was. The matter is to be put beyond doubt by a written instrument signed by the parties, their signatures being attested. If the law of Scotland were as the respondents contend it is, to my mind the value of a deed would be absolutely and utterly destroyed. What would be the use of parties solemnly recording the agreement which they had come to, signing the deed and having their signatures attested, if one of the parties afterwards, in whose custody the instrument was, behind the back of the other, could insert in the testing clause (which it would be perfectly proper for that party to fill in without reference to the other) a provision repugnant to some of the stipulations of the deed which the parties had signed? That might be perfectly honestly done, but the matter might never come to the notice of the other party until some dispute arose years afterwards; it might, indeed, never come to light until all the parties to the transaction were dead, and all that could be referred to was the instrument itself; and yet the provision thus inserted ex post facto in the instrument by one of the parties would inevitably control their rights, and might impose obligations or destroy rights which had been stipulated for

[1] 5 R. 97, 5 R. (H. L.) 151.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

and agreed to and embodied in the deed which had been signed and attested.

One need only state such a proposition to see that it would be impossible to maintain it on any ground of principle, and that, as I say, one could only give one's assent to it if constrained to do so by an overwhelming weight of authorities. But no such authorities have been produced: the case of Johnstone v. Coldstream[1] and the case of Dunlop v. Greenlees[2] appear to me to be cases as far as possible removed from the case of Smith v. Chambers[3] or the present case. The point that was decided by the Court of Session in Johnstone v. Coldstream,[1] and by the Court of Session and this House in Dunlop v. Greenlees[2] was entirely different from the present. The only prior case not reviewed in the judgment of Smith v. Chambers[3] is the case of Brown v. Govan.[4] I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and for the reasons he has given, that that really is not a case in point at all.

For these reasons, my Lords, I think that, not only was there no case of negligence against the appellants, but that the opinion which was involved in the advice which they gave with regard to the law of Scotland was perfectly correct.

Lord Shand.—I also am of opinion that the facts stated by the pursuers do not warrant the conclusion of liability for damages on the part of the law-agents who are sued in this action.

The whole case of the pursuers, the Assets Company, seems to depend on their establishing that the provision which was inserted in the testing clause of the marriage-contract was effectual. If it was not so, the pursuers have failed to shew that they have suffered any loss whatever on the facts stated.

By the provision contained in the marriage-contract as it was signed by Mrs Campbell, it was declared that her husband renounced and discharged "his jus mariti and right of administration over the whole estate presently belonging to her or which she might acquire or succeed to stante matrimonio." With that clause standing as a part of the deed she signed it. But days after she had signed the deed, when this testing clause was filled in, there was a most important stipulation added, repugnant to that which was contained in the deed when she signed it. It was to this effect:—"Such renunciation" (that is the renunciation I have just read) "and exclusion shall only apply to the capital or principal of the estate of the said Jane Campbell, and shall not extend or apply to the annual produce or interest of her said estate."

I am clearly of opinion, as I think all your Lordships are, that this alteration, seriously affecting a provision of the deed as it left the hand of the lady as she signed it, was ineffectual.

Having taken part in the decision of Smith v. Chambers[3] I do not propose to enter upon the grounds of that judgment. I might well have been silent in the First Division of the Court of Session after the elaborate and

---

[1] 5 D. 1297.
[2] 2 Macph. 1, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46.
[3] 5 R. 97, 5 R. (H. L.) 151.
[4] February 1, 1820, F. C.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

careful judgment of Lord Deas, but I find on looking to the report[1] that I went fully over the grounds of my own opinion, and I do not think it necessary to add anything to what I there said.

Although I do not say that it is very material, still it is worthy of observation that in one aspect of this case it is more unfavourable for the present pursuers than what occurred in the case of Smith v. Chambers.[2] The Lord Ordinary, Lord Kincairney, in the careful, exhaustive, and closely reasoned judgment which he has given in this case, makes this observation in reference to Smith v. Chambers,[2]—"In Smith's case, as I understand it, the Court proceeded, not only on the opinion that the testing clause is a part of a deed, which may be held to be settled law, but also on the assumption that in that case it was added before the granter's signature, and was itself authenticated. But if it were shewn in this case that the clause was added a couple of days after Mrs Campbell signed the deed, as seems probable, that might differentiate the two cases." Having refreshed my memory from the report of that case, I agree in the opinion Lord Kincairney states. I think there the Court gave their judgment upon the assumption that the addition had been made before the granter's signature. But in this case the matter stands very differently, for it is admitted, and it appears to be perfectly clear upon documents which the pursuers have themselves produced, that the lady signed the deed on May 31, and that the alteration was made days afterwards, certainly not earlier than June 3, when the marriage was just about to take place. It is, therefore, a clause that is unauthenticated in any way by the signature of the lady who is said to be bound by it. That appears to me to illustrate the dangers there would be in giving to the alterations inserted in a testing clause the extraordinary effect which is contended for by the respondents in this case.

It is true they have said that this feature of the case may be overcome. It was said by Mr Balfour in his able pleading that he was prepared to prove authority—practically by parole evidence—for the change that was made in the testing clause altering the deed. And again, it was said there was another answer to the defenders' argument, namely, that the deed had been acted upon by the spouses in such a way as to shew that the provision added in the testing clause was really a provision to which the spouses intended to give effect.

As to the proof of authority, it is obvious that evidence of that kind would be incompetent to control a solemn deed. It is really a proposal to control the written instrument by parole evidence—it might be by evidence of witnesses—as to what had occurred in conversations. It happens here that the evidence would be fortified by a signature given by the lady to a document in which she said, "I approve of the alteration," but that practically would be nothing stronger than parole evidence to cut down the effect of a deed deliberately entered into. Plainly, therefore, that answer could not be successfully maintained.

As to the acting of the parties, it is said that the lady, from the time of the marriage onwards, allowed her husband to draw this annual income. As was observed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Herschell)

[1] 5 R. at p. 125.

[2] 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

in the course of the discussion, there is nothing more common than for a wife, although she has an income settled upon herself, to arrange that the husband shall draw it from time to time, and that arrangement goes on so long as it is satisfactory. Therefore, I should attribute no important effect to actings of that kind. But it must be further observed that actings after the marriage could surely never be allowed to construe or control the direct obligations of the parties as those are recorded in the deed which the parties had signed.

I have come to the conclusion without difficulty that there has been no allegation of such negligence on the part of the agents as would involve responsibility for damages under the claim made upon them. The clause was ineffectual as an alteration on the provision of the deed as to the lady's estate, and it was therefore of no consequence whether the agents did or did not read it.

It is true that after the date when Smith v. Chambers[1] was decided in the Court of Session, Lord Gordon, on an appeal to this House, expressed, I will not say a distinct opinion that that judgment was wrong, but at all events a strong opinion that, according to his view, sufficient effect had not been given to certain previous cases; but it is worthy of notice that in the opinions which were delivered in the First Division of the Court these cases were discussed; they were fully before the Court, and I think it was unanimously held that they were quite distinguishable from the case then before the Court. I believe several of your Lordships have already expressed that view.

Lord Kincairney very justly observes in his opinion that the instructions given to the agents "were as they are averred by the pursuers, to satisfy themselves as to the facts, and to advise the liquidators as to the terms on which they ought to settle." That was an instruction to give their final opinion upon the whole matter as to what they thought would be reasonable terms, and as to whether the terms which had been offered were reasonable or not. As he says in a subsequent passage, "but it is said that it was their duty to tell the liquidators that the question was not closed, and that opposing opinions had been expressed about it. It might have been proper enough to do that, but I see no reason to think that it was their duty. It was their duty to form their own opinion, and to advise the liquidators accordingly. But it was not their duty, nor according to their instructions, to reason out the matter with the liquidators, to say whether their opinion was given with confidence or hesitation, or to quote their authorities." I concur in these observations by Lord Kincairney. The law-agents in the circumstances might well hold the opinion, which I think was a sound opinion, that Mr Campbell had no right whatever to the income of the capital belonging to his wife, and entertaining that opinion, I think it cannot be maintained that they were bound to enter into details of the kind which have been suggested by the present respondents.

On these grounds, I am of opinion with your Lordships that we should revert to the opinion of Lord Kincairney, and reverse the interlocutor of the Second Division.

---

[1] 5 R. 97.

No. 7.

May 15, 1896.
Blair v. Assets Co.

LORD DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that those who maintain the doctrine that the substantive provisions in the earlier part of the deed may be varied by words introduced into the testing clause, rest their argument on the legal presumption that everything in the deed was there before execution by the parties. Legal presumptions are very good and useful things when properly applied, but they ought not as a rule to be introduced in plain contradiction of the facts or the settled usage of mankind. It has been decided and is now settled law that the testing clauses may lawfully and properly be inserted after execution, and it is admitted that such is the almost invariable practice. When once that has been decided it appears to me that the legal presumption referred to no longer applies to the testing clause, and the real presumption of fact is the other way. The considerations of convenience and the inveterate practice which led to its being held that the testing clause may be inserted after execution by the parties have no application to words contained in the testing clause which have the effect of varying the provisions contained in the earlier part of the deed. It is in this sense that I understand and appreciate what has been said by learned Judges, that the testing clause is not the proper place in which to introduce substantive provisions.

But, my Lords, if I felt more doubt than I do as to the correctness of the decision of the Court of Session in Smith v. Chambers,[1] it seems to me, as it does to your Lordships, extravagant to hold that law-agents were guilty of actionable negligence because they gave advice to their clients which involved the assumption that a recent and unanimous decision of the very Judges before whom the question would come was correct. I say this notwithstanding the obiter dictum of Lord Gordon in this House in Smith v. Chambers.[2] That noble and learned Lord assumed, as I think erroneously, that the decision of the Court of Session in Smith v. Chambers[1] was inconsistent with Johnstone v. Coldstream[3] and Dunlop v. Greenlees.[4] I may remark that Lord Deas, who delivered the leading opinion in Smith v. Chambers,[1] was a party to the decision of the Court of Session in Dunlop v. Greenlees.[4] That learned Judge thought the latter decision right and not inconsistent with the opinion he was delivering in Smith v. Chambers.[1]

It does not very clearly appear what facts the Inner-House desired proof of in this case. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that no evidence is required for the decision of the case, and I think his judgment should be restored.

ORDERED, that the interlocutor of the Second Division of November 27, 1895, complained of in the appeal be reversed: That the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary dated June 18, 1895, be restored; and that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions to find the appellants entitled to the expenses incurred by them in the Court of Session from and after the date of the interlocutor restored: Further ordered that the respondents pay the appellants the costs incurred in respect of the appeal.

FAITHFULL & OWEN—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—WILLIAM ROBERTSON & Co.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.

---

[1] 5 R. 97. [2] 5 R. (H. L.) 151. [3] 5 D. 1297.
[4] 2 Macph. 1, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46.

No. 8.

May 8, 1896.
Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Marshall.

CALLANDER AND TROSSACHS HYDROPATHIC COMPANY, LIMITED, AND THE EAGLE PROPERTY COMPANY (Defenders), Appellants.—D.-F. Asher, Q.C.—W. Campbell.
WILLIAM H. MARSHALL (Pursuer), Respondent.—Balfour, Q.C.—John Wilson.

(IN the Court of Session, July 18, 1895, 22 R. 954.)

The defenders appealed.

After argument, counsel for the appellants consented to the appeal being dismissed.

THE HOUSE dismissed the appeal.

DEACON, GIBSON, & MEDCALF—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—RANKEN, FORD, FORD, & CHESTER—J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.

No. 9.

July 13, 1896.
Carruthers v. Carruthers.

MISS MARGARET CARRUTHERS (Pursuer), Appellant.—A. S. D. Thomson.
WILLIAM CARRUTHERS (Trustee of David Carruthers) (Defender), Respondent.—Craigie.

Trust—Personal liability of trustees—Failure to fulfil trust directions as to audit of factor's accounts.—A truster empowered his trustees to appoint a factor, who might be one of their own number, and directed them "annually, within one month after the 31st day of December in each year during their administration, to cause their factor to make up an account of the intromissions had by him in virtue hereof in the course of the year ending on that date, and to lay the same, with the whole vouchers thereof, before them, to be by them examined and audited."

The trustees did not obey the truster's direction as to an annual account and audit, but the factor's accounts were occasionally rendered and examined. The factor's account for the period from 1st March 1888 to 1st June 1890, which was correct, and was examined by the trustees, shewed that the trust-estate was due to the factor a balance of £61, and that one and a-half year's interest, amounting to £130, was due to heritable creditors. There was no subsequent examination of the factor's accounts by the trustees. In December 1891 the factor absconded and became bankrupt, leaving unaccounted for a balance of £382 of trust funds, of which £165 had come into his hands between June and December 1890, and the remainder in 1891.

In an action brought by a beneficiary under the trust to have the trustees ordained to replace the balance due by the factor, on the ground of contravention of the trust-deed, and separatim, of "gross breach of trust and neglect of duty whereby a portion of the trust-estate had been lost," it was proved that if the trustees had in January 1891 called for the factor's account it would have shewn that he had in hand £165 of trust funds, subject to his own claim for £61, and to claims by heritable creditors for £130 of arrears of interest. It was proved that prior to December 1891 the trustees had no cause to doubt the honesty or solvency of the factor.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) (1) that there was culpa lata on the part of the trustees in failing to call for the factor's account in January 1891; (2) that the onus lay upon the trustees to shew that if they had called for the account in January 1891 the balance of £104 then in the hands of the trustee would have been lost notwithstanding, and that the trustees having failed to discharge the onus, they were liable for said sum; (3) that the trustees were not in fault in regard to sums received by the factor after 31st December 1890, and were not liable therefor.

No. 9.

July 13, 1896.
Carruthers v. Carruthers.

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.
Lord Morris.
Lord Shand.
Lord Davey.

(In the Court of Session, June 26, 1895, 22 R. 775.)
The pursuer appealed in forma pauperis.

Lord Herschell.—This is an appeal from interlocutors o the Second Division of the Inner-House affirming the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. The controversy between the parties arises out of the provisions of a trust-deed, by which certain property was vested in trustees for the benefit of the truster during his life (he died on April 7, 1879), and afterwards upon trusts which it is not necessary to enter into beyond saying that if there has been money lost to the trust-estate by reason of any acts of the respondents of which the appellant has a right to complain, she has a sufficient interest and title to enable her to sue here and to require that the money should be made good to the trust fund.

The trust-deed contained this provision:—"With full power to my said trustees to appoint factors either of their own number or other fit persons for uplifting the rents and interest of my said estate, and to hold him liable to them for all omissions, errors, or neglect of management, and for his own personal intromissions with my said estate, and I do hereby direct my said trustees under this settlement, annually, within one month after the 31st day of December in each year, during their administration, to cause their factor to make up an account of the intromissions had by him by virtue hereof in the course of the year ending on that date, and to lay the same, with the whole vouchers thereof, before them, to be by them examined, audited, and (if found to be correct) approved of." Then there is a further provision that in the event of their being dissatisfied with the management of the estate by the factor they may remove him and appoint a new factor in his place.

Nothing is said in that clause about the appointment of one of their number as the factor with a remuneration to him for his services; but I think there can be no doubt that the intention of the truster in giving the power was to enable them not only to appoint one of their own number the factor, which they could have done without any such power, but also to appoint one of their own number as factor and to pay him remuneration, which without such express power it would not have been competent for them to do. It gave them, therefore, in my opinion, that power which they would not have possessed at common law.

But the truster whilst empowering his trustees to leave in the hands of one of their number the entire collection of the rents and the disposal of them, at the same time guarded that provision with this further one, that the other trustees should at least once in every year, within one month from the termination of the year, examine and audit the whole of the last year's accounts, require vouchers, and see that the accounts had been properly kept, and that the money had been properly received and properly applied. The trustees appear to have largely disregarded this provision. The first account delivered comprised the items of account between the date of the truster's death in 1879 and January 31, 1881. The next account comprised the items between January 31, 1881, and May 15, 1882. No other account was delivered until February 1888, which included the accounts of nearly six years. In the month of June

No. 9.

July 13, 1896.
Carruthers v. Carruthers.

1890 an account was made out shewing the condition of the trust-estate down to that period. Some controversy arose as to how far this account was seen or in the possession of the trustees; but it is not, in my view, material, and therefore I do not enter upon that conflict of view. It is enough to say that it is common ground that down to June 1890 there had been no improper dealing with the trust funds, that at that date there was a sum of £61, 5s. 3d. due to Mr Hall Grigor, the factor, and certain other accounts were outstanding. Mr Hall Grigor was not in express terms appointed factor, but he had been, by the manner of dealing with him and the manner in which the accounts were rendered, clearly appointed factor and allowed a remuneration for his services. No question is raised as to his having been a factor duly appointed under the trust-deed, and therefore there is no dispute that it was the duty of the trustees to have examined his accounts more frequently than they had done. But, as I have said, down to June 1890, although there had been a breach of duty on their part in that respect, the trust-estate had in no way suffered.

During the year 1890 sums of money were received by Mr Hall Grigor which, after allowing for the balance of £61 odd that had been due to him, left in his hands a sum of £104, 2s. 7d. Now this sum of money he obviously ought to have applied in the payment of certain ground-rents or the interest on heritable bonds on the land which formed part of the trust-estate, which was at that time and had been for a considerable time due. This sum of money never was in any way applied to trust purposes by Mr Hall Grigor. During the year 1891 he received further sums on account of the trust-estate; and at the end of 1891 he absconded, leaving the whole of these sums of money due from him to the trust unaccounted for.

Now the first question is whether the appellant is entitled to an order that the respondents should make good to the trust-estate the sum of £104, 2s. 7d. About the breach of duty on their part in not requiring the delivery of accounts at the commencement of the year 1891 and auditing them, there cannot be two opinions. But it is said that the trustees are protected by the clause of immunity, which is now to be taken as inserted in all trust-dispositions, against omissions on their part; that the not requiring of the delivery of and not auditing the accounts was an "omission"; that the clause of immunity protects them against it, and therefore they cannot be made liable in respect of it. My Lords, it is well settled that the clause of immunity to which I have referred does not protect in a case of culpa lata or gross negligence. The first question, therefore, which I proceed to consider is whether in this case there was culpa lata on the part of the trustees.

Now, they were entrusted with a power which they had not at common law, which I have already alluded to; but the truster, whilst he enabled them thus to employ one of their number as factor, insisted upon a check on the proceedings of that factor. It was the very thing which in that case he left the other trustees to do, to exercise that check by an annual audit. Nothing can be more emphatic than the terms of the provision; and it was clearly made a condition of their leaving the trust-receipts and expenditure to one of their number as factor that they should exercise that supervision. My Lords, can it be said under those circumstances that where the trustees fail to exercise that check, and, taking advantage of the power given them to leave the trust management to another, do not supervise the action of that other in the manner expressly directed by the truster, there has not been culpa lata on their part? I entirely concur with Lord Rutherfurd Clark in thinking that such conduct on their part constitutes culpa lata. It is admitted that, if that view be correct, the immunity clause does not protect the trustees. Then what is the extent of their liability? They are liable, as it seems to me, for all the results naturally flowing from the breach of duty on their part; and I think where this culpa lata is shewn, and it might be reasonably concluded that the trust would not have suffered as it did if the duty had been observed, it lies with the trustees to shew, if they seek to absolve themselves on that ground, that no benefit would have accrued to the trust if they had discharged their duty, and that the loss would have been precisely the same, and must have been precisely the same whether they did so or not. I do not think they are entitled to insist upon the Court speculating as to whether it is or is not possible that, even if the trustees had done their duty, the loss would equally have resulted. In the present case I own I have a strong impression and belief that if they had called for accounts in January 1891, or at the end of 1890, in order that they might be audited in the course of the following January, this £104 would have been applied in the payment of the outstanding ground-rents, and that the accounts would not only have appeared upon the face of them to be perfectly proper, but would have been perfectly proper; and that £104 would have been applied in discharge of the liability of the trust, and therefore would not have been lost to the trust-estate. If that be so, then this £104 has been lost to the trust in consequence of the failure of the trustees to do their duty—a clear, obvious, and expressly imposed duty which they failed to discharge.

No. 9.

July 13, 1896. Carruthers v. Carruthers.

The only other question is whether the further sums which were received by Mr Hall Grigor, the factor, in the course of 1891, and misappropriated by him, can be recovered against the trustees. The case there seems to me to be very different. If the conclusion is a probable one that the accounts delivered in 1891 would have been in order, and all would have appeared to have been properly paid, then there would be nothing to excite the suspicion of the trustees, and they would have been acting with perfect propriety if during the rest of the year 1891 they had left the matter as theretofore in the hands of Mr Hall Grigor, in which case he would have received the moneys—the time for audit would not have arrived, and he would have misappropriated them before the trustees had any opportunity of ascertaining that anything was wrong. Under those circumstances I do not see my way to hold the respondents liable for more than this sum of £104, 2s. 7d., which was in the hands of the factor prior to the termination of the year 1890. I think therefore that the proper course in the present case will be to reverse the interlocutors appealed from, and to declare that the respondents are bound to make good to the trust-estate the sum of £104, 2s. 7d., with interest from January 31, 1891. As regards costs, I think the appellant must receive the costs in the Inner-House and also the costs in this House, those costs to be taxed according to the rule laid down where the appellant sues in forma pauperis; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

No. 9.

July 13, 1896.
Carruthers v. Carruthers.

LORD WATSON.—I agree in the judgment which has just been moved by my noble and learned friend.

I am not altogether satisfied in this case that what was done or left undone by the trustees amounted to a mere "omission" on their part. They have from the outset of the trust administered it through one of their own number, who was appointed to be their factor, and was remunerated for his services in that capacity out of the trust funds. The whole management of the trust was devolved upon the factor. At common law the trustees had no power to take that course. Under the trust they had power to do so, but subject to this very plainly expressed condition, that there should be an annual and regular audit of the factor's accounts. With that audit the trustees practically dispensed. That is said to have been a mere matter of omission, and, in one view that may be taken of it, it was a mere matter of omission; but the result, and the necessary result, was that their administration as actually conducted was sanctioned neither by the common law of trust nor by the provision of the deceased's deed. I am not prepared to hold that a course of administration which cannot be defended or justified either on the ground of its being consistent with the common law or on the ground of its being consistent with the provisions of the trust-deed can be regarded as a mere "omission."

But it is unnecessary in this case to go any further than the character of the act, even on the assumption that it ought to be treated as a matter of omission. The immunity clause of the Act of 1861, or a similar immunity conferred by the terms of a trust-deed, does not afford a protection to trustees against any act or omission which, according to the law, is regarded as constituting culpa lata. My Lords, I think the acting of the trustees in this case did amount to culpa lata. I should be very sorry to hold that the systematic disregard of a check enacted by the testator in his trust-deed, a reasonable check, and in some cases, as in the present, a necessary precaution, does not constitute culpa lata.

Upon the amount of damage I do not think it necessary to say anything. I entirely agree with the observations which have been made by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack in regard to that part of the case.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—I also concur.

LORD DAVEY.—I concur.

ORDERED, that the interlocutors so far as complained of in the appeal be reversed, with a declaration that the respondents are bound to restore and make good to the trust-estate the sum of £104, 2s. 7d., with interest thereon at the rate of £4 per cent per annum from January 31, 1891: Further ordered, that the respondents pay to the appellant the costs incurred by her in the Inner-House: Further ordered, that the respondents pay to the appellant the costs incurred by her in respect of her appeal to this House, the said costs in this House to be taxed in the manner usual when the appellant sues in forma pauperis, and the amount thereof to be certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments: Further ordered, that the cause be remitted back

No. 9.

July 13, 1896. Carruthers v. Carruthers.

to the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this judgment: And further ordered, that unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the Court of Session in Scotland, or the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills during the vacation, shall issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

RANGER, BURTON, & FROST—FINLAY & WILSON, S.S.C.—ROBINS, HAY, WATERS, & LUCAS—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.

No. 10.

July 27, 1896. Metcalfe v. Cox.

METCALFE AND OTHERS (Members of the University Court and of the Senatus of St Andrews University) (Pursuers), Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Byrne, Q.C.—Pitman.

COX AND OTHERS (Members of Council of University College, Dundee) (Defenders), Respondents.—D.-F. Asher, Q.C.—Henry Johnston—Clyde.

University—Affiliation of College—Affiliation and incorporation distinguished—Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 55), secs. 15, 16, and 21.—The Universities (Scotland) Act, sec. 15, enacted that the Commissioners under the Act "may, if they think fit, make ordinances to extend any of the Universities by affiliating new Colleges" to them, "subject to the following conditions . . . (3) The University Court, or any College which under this Act shall have been affiliated to the University, may respectively, at any time thereafter, resolve that such College shall cease to be affiliated to such University" . . . "and the University Court shall, subject to the approval of the Universities Committee [of the Privy Council] rescind the ordinance by which such College was affiliated to such University."

Section 16 enacted,—"Without prejudice to any of the powers hereinbefore conferred, the Commissioners shall with respect to the University of St Andrews and the University College of Dundee have power (1) to affiliate the said University College to, and make it form part of, the said University, with the consent of the University Court of St Andrews, and also of the said College."

Section 21 enacted,—"After the expiration of the powers of the Commissioners, the University Court of each University shall have power to make such ordinances as they think fit, with the approval of Her Majesty in Council . . . (2) Altering or revoking any of the ordinances affecting such University which have been or may be framed and passed under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, or this Act, and making new ordinances. . . ."

Held (1) that the power to rescind an affiliation of a College to a University under section 5 was applicable only to cases of mere affiliation, and would not apply to the case of Dundee College, in the event of its being affiliated and made to form part of the University of St Andrews; and (2) that section 21 could not be construed as giving power to the University of St Andrews, after Dundee College had been incorporated with it, to revoke the ordinance making the incorporation.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Watson. Ld. Herschell. Lord Morris. Lord Shand.

(IN the Court of Session, March 4, 1896, reported in the present volume, p. 559—previous reports, 22 R. 210, and 22 R. (H. L.) 14.)

In March 1894 the present action was raised by the Rev. William M. Metcalfe and other members of the University Court of St Andrews University and by certain members of the Senatus against, inter alios, the Rev. William James Cox and others, the members of the Council of University College, Dundee, concluding for reduction of the following:—

1. A minute of the University Court of the University of St Andrews dated 15th February 1890, bearing to consent to the union of University College, Dundee, and the University of St Andrews.

2. The agreement between the University of St Andrews and the University College, Dundee, dated 15th February 1890.

3. A docquet appended to a copy of a letter of the clerk of the Commissioners dated 4th March 1890, bearing to be a consent by the University Court of the University of St Andrews to the alteration made by the Commissioners on the terms of the agreement.

4. An order of the University Commissioners dated 21st March 1890, purporting to affiliate the University College of Dundee, and to make it form part of the University of St Andrews; and

5. An order of the Commissioners dated 10th April 1890, purporting to declare that the new University Court of the University of St Andrews had been duly constituted.

Defences were lodged by Mr Cox and others, the members of the Council of University College, Dundee.

On 8th April 1895 the House of Lords held that the pursuers were entitled to a decree reducing the orders of the Commission, on the ground that the statutory procedure as to ordinances had not been followed, and remitting the cause to the Second Division of the Court of Session "to pronounce decree to that effect, and to dispose of the conclusions of the summons with respect to the documents first, second, and third called for and sought to be reduced."

When the case came before the Second Division, the attention of the Court was called to the fact that, on 3d February 1894, the University Commissioners had issued another order to the same effect as the previous order, but with regard to which the procedure prescribed by the statute had been followed, and that this order had been laid before the Privy Council for approval.

The Court, on the ground that the validity and effect of the documents sought to be reduced were questions within the jurisdiction of the Privy Council, pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the action.

The pursuers appealed.

The principal question raised was whether the following agreement dated 15th February 1890, being the second document sought to be reduced was ultra vires of the parties thereto:—"Agreement for the union of University College, Dundee, with the University of St Andrews, under and in terms of section 16 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889.—University College, Dundee (afterwards called Dundee College), shall be affiliated to and form part of the University of St Andrews, in terms of section 16 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, in the manner and upon the terms following:—1. The said union shall, as regards duration, be permanent, and dissoluble only by Act of Parliament. . . . 4. Subject to the provisions of the statute, the Council of Dundee College shall elect to the University Court from time to time such number of representatives as the Scottish Universities Commissioners may fix and allow, and such elected person or persons shall become and be members of the said Court accordingly; but subject thereto, none of the other conditions of section 15 of the said Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, shall apply to Dundee College, or its principal or professors, provided always that none of the representatives of Dundee College elected under the provisions of this article shall be entitled to sit and vote in the University Court while any matter falling under article 8 hereof is under consideration. . . ."

No. 10.

July 27, 1896. Metcalfe v. Cox.

The appellants, besides contending that they were entitled to a judgment on the merits from the Court below, maintained on the merits (a) that the University Court had no power to enter into an agreement, but merely to give or refuse an unqualified consent to affiliation; (b) that the agreement was inconsistent with the Act, in so far as it stipulated that the union should be permanent, and dissoluble only by Act of Parliament, while subsection 3 of section 15 of the Act provided means by which a College once affiliated might cease to be affiliated, and section 21 gave power to the University Court of each University "to make such ordinances as they think fit, with the approval of Her Majesty in Council . . . (2) altering or revoking any of the ordinances affecting such University which have been or may be framed and passed under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, or this Act, and making new ordinances" on certain conditions, and that article 4 of the agreement was inconsistent with section 5 of the Act.

The respondents supported the judgment, and further contended that subsection 3 of section 15 of the Act applied to cases of mere affiliation, and not to cases of affiliation and incorporation, and that the power to make ordinances given by section 21 must be construed as limited to ordinances for the management of a University.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I confess I have had some difficulty in following the objections which have been made, and I am afraid my difficulty has not been removed yet. Whatever may be the jurisdiction to reduce documents, about which I am afraid my mind is not very clear even up to the present moment, it appears to me that it is enough to say that no ground has been made good at present in this case to justify such a proceeding.

I propose to deal very shortly with the only point which, as it seems to me, the case properly raises, and that is what has in fact been done, and whether any objection can properly be raised to what has been done. In the first place, the document sought to be reduced has been variously described as a consent or an agreement. I do not think it is very material to consider whether it is the one or the other. As a matter of fact, it is one of the documents which formed a stage towards something which was ultimately to become an operative document in the sense in which the Dean of Faculty used those words. But, apart from considering what its nature is or what the power of reducing it was, if it were susceptible of reduction on any grounds, it appears to me that the objection to it fails. What was consented to, and the form in which it was consented to, appears to me to come within the Act of Parliament. That brings us back to the question, What has in fact been done? As I understand it, the objection is this, We want to keep alive by the consent we give the power, if it is thought proper, to dissolve the union which shall ultimately be made (I am using words different from those of the statute on purpose), and this document which is to be made in pursuance of the power given by the statute does something which is inconsistent with the statute. That is the objection. Well, my Lords, all I can say is that I think it is exactly in conformity with the statute, and that the ordinance ultimately made is completely covered by the authority which the statute conveys.

Then we come to what is the real point, and the only point in this case which seems to me to be in truth susceptible of argument, namely, the point upon the 21st section, and the question which arises under the 2d subsection of the 21st section. The only point is this: it is said you must keep alive and applicable to a completely incorporated university the same powers and the same facilities of dissolving the union which exist in merely affiliated bodies.

It must be conceded, I think, that the language of the statute and the mode in which the words are used are perhaps not a model of draftsmanship, but the substance of it is clear enough. There is one thing which the statute describes as affiliation. Two separate institutions are to have such a bond of union between them as may be called affiliation. What that bond is and how far it involves the management of the two concerns it is immaterial to inquire. The statute has made the distinction, and the statute must be obeyed. That affiliation can be dissolved at the option of either, that is certain, and the very fact that they are so distinguished, that the partial union between them can be so dissolved at the option of either, is carried out in the statute by this, that in order to be affiliated and to continue affiliated they are absolutely separate institutions and not incorporated into one. Then one comes to those institutions which are to be incorporated into one, so that one forms part of the other. They then become no longer two separate institutions, but one institution, and when that second condition of things has arisen, you must read the statute by the light which the statute itself gives as to what is the meaning of the institution so constituted. When so constituted, let us see what the arrangements contemplated by the statute would come to if the construction now insisted upon were the true one. "Divided again at the instance of either." What does that mean? There is no "either." There are not two, but one. It appears to me, therefore, that the very starting point of the inquiry shews that the statute never could have contemplated that when they were once united they could be capable of being severed again at the instance of those who at one time had formed an independent institution. I say that the language is not susceptible of that. The whole difficulty of it is, I think, sufficiently exhibited by the mere statement of the proposition. When one comes to consider the subject-matter we are dealing with, an united body, one body, which has one finance, it seems to me that it is impossible to say that that can be the meaning or the construction of the statute.

But, further than that, I think the language is not susceptible of the construction contended for by the Solicitor-General. It does not appear to me that it is possible to suggest that an ordinance which affects an university is an ordinance which is capable of destroying the university. One might just as well say that a Rule Committee which is intended to regulate the process and practice of a Court should as one of its incidents have the power to destroy that Court altogether, and to say that no such Court should exist. I am wholly unable to follow an argument of that sort, and it seems unnecessary to pursue the subject further than that. When once one begins to understand the technical language which is used in the statute, and to apply it to what the statute has enacted, it appears to me to be impossible to concede the proposition that the Solicitor-General contends for.

No. 10.
July 27, 1896.
Metcalfe v. Cox.

I am not quite sure that I follow the reasoning of the Court below, nor is it necessary to consider it. I take the proposition that is now put before your Lordships; it is one which I cannot agree with, and I think that the order of the Court below was right, whatever reasoning it may have rested upon, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—I also am of opinion that your Lordships have no alternative except to affirm the judgment of the Court below, although in coming to that conclusion I have not been influenced by the reasons which were assigned by the learned Judges of that Court.

The only question which is of any importance appears to me to be a very simple one. I do not think it necessary to discuss how far a document of the character of what is termed an "agreement" in this case can be made the subject of a reduction or a declarator of nullity. It is quite sufficient for the disposal of the appeal, in my opinion, that the considerations urged in support of it are, when one comes to examine them, perfectly illusory.

I shall only say a word upon the most important of them, namely, the objection that one of the conditions of the agreement, which is that the union to be effected by the Commissioners shall not be dissoluble except by Parliament, is a condition which infringes the provisions of the Act. That is founded upon the idea that section 21 will, in the event of and after affiliation and incorporation, give to the University Court of the newly incorporated university a power, subject to the checks provided in the statute, to make ordinances putting an end to that new incorporation and to its own existence. My Lords, I cannot so read section 21. It gives a power to alter ordinances which affect an existing university—a power on the face of it plainly implying that there is to be no power to destroy the university or to impair the university as then constituted. The only power is to make regulations which shall prevail within the corporation which is then existing.

My views upon this part of the case are confirmed by the provisions of section 5. The most important governing body with a Scottish university under the Act of 1889 is the University Court. It is to them that the power of making ordinances and of repealing ordinances is committed by section 21. The constitution of that Court as part of the university is not committed to the Commissioners, and cannot in any view of it be said to be committed to their successors, the University Court. The University Court which is to have this power has its constitution prescribed by section 5 of the statute, which neither of the Commissioners nor any one who succeeds them in the right of making ordinances has power to repeal or touch.

I shall not refer to any of the other grounds which have been urged in support of this appeal, and I shall simply content myself with expressing my concurrence with the views which have been already expressed by the Lord Chancellor.

No. 10.
July 27, 1896.
Metcalfe v. Cox.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary to inquire here, in the view which your Lordships take, whether, upon the shewing of the appellants themselves, there was anything in this so-called agreement which was capable of being reduced, because, looking at the substance of the matter, I think it perfectly clear that there is nothing in that consent which can be said to be inconsistent with any of the provisions of the statute. The suggestion that the consent could not be made a conditional one, that it must be an absolute Yes or No, appears to me to be incapable of serious treatment.

The other point, that there is conflict with the statute in a clause which commences "Subject to the provisions of the statute," appears to me, to say the least of it, as untenable.

The only remaining point is that with which my noble and learned friends have dealt: whether the provision that the union should be only capable of dissolution by Act of Parliament was inconsistent with the power contained in the statute itself to dissolve that union by an order made under the statute, under the provisions of which the ordinance was made, or is to be made, constituting this University of St Andrews with the Dundee College incorporated in it. My Lords, I do not think it necessary to say anything upon this point, because I entirely agree with what has been said. I think no violence is done to the statute by construing section 21 as wholly inapplicable to the revocation of such an ordinance as the present, in so far as it constitutes the University of St Andrews with the Dundee College incorporated in it.

It is quite unnecessary, and it would be out of place now, to say what provisions might be dealt with by an ordinance under section 21. All that at least seems to me certain on the present occasion is this: that it is hopeless to contend that by an ordinance made under that section, any ordinance, whatever its terms, which constituted the University of St Andrews with the Dundee College incorporated in it, could be revoked.

LORD MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD SHAND.—The Court of Session, in dealing with this case, have not advanced to the consideration of the question raised between the parties on the merits, but have held that the action, so far as regards the documents which have now formed the subject of discussion, ought not to be entertained, because the whole of the matters in controversy ought properly to be discussed before the Universities Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council. I do not think it necessary to discuss this ground of decision further than to say I am not prepared, on the argument we have heard, to agree with it. It appears to me that cases may occur in which, where there is a direct violation of the statute, I shall not say by agreement only, but by the terms of an agreement or consent followed by an ordinance, the Court of Session would have jurisdiction to cut down the proceedings, and should exercise that jurisdiction if called on to do so. It is a satisfaction to me that in this matter, which has been so long a subject of litigation, and in which litigation is so very undesirable, your Lordships are able, on the argument which has been submitted to the House, to deal with the questions which have been raised on their merits, and, to some extent at least, to give a decision on questions which have been much disputed.

No. 10. July 27, 1896. Metcalfe v. Cox.

On those questions I entirely agree with what has fallen from your Lordships. I think the pursuers have failed to shew that their objections to the agreement and relative documents are well founded. The main, and substantial, point on which argument has been maintained is, that the provision of the agreement under its first head—namely, that the union between St Andrews University and the College of Dundee shall, as regards duration, be permanent and shall be dissoluble only by Act of Parliament—is in violation of or contrary to the provisions of the statute. That argument was based on two provisions of the statute: the first of them contained in the 3d subsection of section 15, and the second in section 21.

Now, my Lords, in regard to the 3d subsection of section 15, I think one observation only requires to be made. The whole of that section deals with affiliation, and affiliation only. One of its provisions is this,—"That the University Court, or any college which under this Act shall have been affiliated to the university, may respectively at any time thereafter" (that is, after affiliation) "resolve that such college shall cease to be affiliated to such university." That applies as it appears to me, to affiliation only; it has no application whatever to such a case as we have before us, where the agreement, which has been followed by an ordinance, is not only that there shall be affiliation, but that there shall be what has been called in the former judgment in this case incorporation. Section 16 provides that the Commissioners shall have power as therein stated "to affiliate the said University College" (that is, the College of Dundee) "and make it part of the said university." The result of that really is that the Dundee College would be merged in the university, and that the two institutions would no longer be two but one only—the University of St Andrews. The provision is for incorporation, not affiliation only. The provision therefore of section 15, which applies to affiliation alone, and gives the parties power to resolve that affiliation shall cease after a certain lapse of time, has no application to a totally different class of case, where you have not merely affiliation but incorporation—the College of Dundee merged in and forming part of the University of St Andrews.

The other ground on which it was maintained that the provision of the agreement goes too far and is contrary to the provisions of the statute, is that section 21 provides that "After the expiration of the power of the Commissioners the University Court of each university shall have power to make ordinances" "altering or revoking any of the ordinances affecting such university which have been or may be framed and passed under the Universities Act." It has been maintained that this provision must apply even to the case of an ordinance which provides, not only that the college should be affiliated, but should form part of the university. My Lords, I think that so to hold would be straining the provision of subsection 2 of section 21 beyond its true meaning. There appears to me to be great force, indeed irresistible force, in the argument which was submitted by the Dean of Faculty, that the meaning of that clause giving power to alter and revoke ordinances is satisfied by reference to section 14 of the statute, which contains power to the Commissioners to make ordinances with regard to endowments and bursaries, and many other matters which are closely connected with the administration of the university and with this alone. I think it would be stretching the meaning of these words too far to say that they authorise the altering or revoking of an ordinance which incorporates the college with the university. I accept the view, as it was shortly put by my noble and learned friend opposite, that the ordinances there referred to are not ordinances constituting the incorporated body, but ordinances affecting the university after it has been so constituted, and affecting it in reference to the details of its management and other like matters. It does not embrace the power to destroy the incorporation itself; indeed, after such incorporation has taken place it appears to me that it would be a matter almost inexplicable to go back upon what has been done, and all that has followed the incorporation. That is a very strong consideration, in my mind, for interpreting the words "ordinances affecting such university" in this sense.

No. 10.

July 27, 1896.
Metcalfe v. Cox.

The fourth head of the agreement was also objected to; but even if there were force in the criticism on the details of that provision, the provision itself is made expressly "subject to the provisions of the statute"; so the statute must prevail.

I am of opinion, with your Lordships, that the case for the pursuer entirely fails on its merits; and if the Court of Session, instead of granting a decree dismissing the action, had granted a decree of absolvitor dealing with the case on its merits, I should have been prepared to affirm that decree.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—MARTIN & LESLIE—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.

No. 11.

July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

DAME REBECCA S. BARNES OR ROSS (Defender), Appellant.—Haldane, Q.C.—Clyde.

SIR CHARLES H. A. F. LOCKHART ROSS, Bart. (Pursuer), Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Murray—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Pitman.

Minor and Pupil—Allowance for heir's maintenance and education—Keeping up establishment for minor heir.—Circumstances in which a mother, who had for ten years as her son's tutor and curator managed large entailed estates and kept up the family residence for her own and his behoof at a cost of £3000 per annum, and expended upwards of £1000 per annum for his maintenance and education and travelling and other expenses, was held (varying judgment of the First Division) entitled in a question with her son to take credit for an annual charge at the rate of £3000 for his maintenance and education, in the sense of fitting him for his future position in life.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Shand.

SIR CHARLES W. A. ROSS, Bart., of Balnagowan, died on 26th July 1883, survived by his widow and by an only child, Sir Charles H. A. F. Lockhart Ross, Bart., who attained majority on 4th April 1893. The present action was raised by the son against his mother, Lady

No. 11. July 27, 1896. Ross v. Ross.

Ross for count and reckoning for her intromissions with the pursuer's estate as tutor and curator, and as an individual, from 26th July 1883 to 4th April 1893.

The defender lodged an account shewing receipts from rents, woods, and estate produce, amounting to £158,666, 9s., and payments amounting to £159,382, 3s., and bringing out a balance due by the heir to the defender of £716, 2s. 3d.* The payments included a charge for upkeep of establishments and heir's maintenance and education of £4000 a year to 26th July 1892, and of £3000 for the period between that date and 4th April 1893.†

---

* The abstract of accounts lodged by the defender was as follows [the item as to the Forest Farm, No. 3, is not material] :—

"Receipts.

"Amount of rents, woods and estate produce, received per Appendix No. I. page 4, ...		£158,666 0 9
"Payments.
"1. Public burdens, repairs, interest of heritable debt, rent charges, management, and miscellaneous estate payments, also upkeep of establishments and heir's maintenance, per Appendix, No. II. p. 4,	£129,344 2 10
"2. Jointure to Lady Lockhart Ross, under marriage-contract and bonds of annuity to Martinmas 1892, per Appendix No. III. p. 5, ...	18,605 9 7
"3. Sums payable in respect of Forest Farm sheep stock, including sum borrowed from Lady Ross, and interest, in terms of Mr Howden's report for year 1884, per Appendix No. IV. p. 5, . .	3,513 11 3
"4. Rent of furniture in Balnagowan Castle, Bonnington House, and shooting lodges, belonging to Lady Lockhart Ross, per Appendix No. V. p. 6, .	5,212 17 6
"5. Interest on sums due to Lady Lockhart Ross for period of accounts, per Appendix No. VI. p. 6, . .	2,698 11 10
"6. Balance in factor's hands at 4th April 1893, to which Lady Ross is entitled,	7 10 0
		159,382 3 0
"Balance due by the heir to Lady Lockhart Ross,		£716 2 3"

† Appendix II.—"Payments for public burdens, repairs, interest of heritable debt, &c. &c., upkeep of establishments and heir's maintenance, from 26th July 1883 to 4th April 1893."

[Here followed a statement of the annual payments for public burdens and interest on heritable debts, and an annual charge at the rate of £4000 a year for upkeep of establishments and heir's maintenance, amounting in all to £129,344, 2s. 10d.]

"Note.—In regard to the statement of the round sum of £4000 per annum, in respect of cost of upkeep of establishments, and maintenance and education of the minor heir, it is stated that the curator did not consider it necessary, as between herself and her son, to keep regular accounts and vouchers of expenditure on the above heads, and that, in point of fact, beyond some incomplete jottings and memoranda, she has no accounts, and beyond her cheques she has no vouchers of her expenditure on these heads. It might be possible, at the cost of much time and labour, to collect some

No. 11.

July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

Objections lodged to these accounts by the pursuer contained, inter alia, the following articles:—"(1) The accounts lodged by the defender are not fully vouched. In particular, no vouchers have been produced to instruct the sum of £4000 per annum, for which the defender takes credit for the upkeep of establishments and heir's maintenance in Appendix No. II. of defender's account. The pursuer is willing, however, under reservation of his right to demand a detailed and fully vouched account, to allow the defender to take credit for the sum of £19,220, 11s., being the amount of an allowance, calculated at the rate of £2000 per annum, from 26th July 1883 to 4th April 1893, as shewn in Appendix I. hereto, and he objects to any larger sum than that being charged, whatever vouchers may be produced. (3) The pursuer objects to the charge made for interest on furniture, and submits that the defender is only entitled to 5 per cent on the value of the furniture in Bonnington House and the shooting lodges, as shewn in Appendix III. hereto, and to no interest on the furniture in Balnagowan Castle, she having occupied the castle herself."

The offer contained in the first of these articles was not accepted, and the defender lodged accounts shewing an expenditure on the upkeep of Balnagowan Castle, gardens, &c., of upwards of £3000 per annum, on the school fees, personal expenses, and travelling expenses of the heir of £1260 per annum, and on Ankerwycke, their residence near Eton, of £657, in all about £5000 a year.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, and a proof was led.

The following were the material facts:—

The average free income from the entailed estates was over £5000, after deducting an annuity to the defender of £2000, which was a burden upon them.

The unentailed estates of Balnagowan, of which the annual value did not exceed £1000, were left to the pursuer, subject to a liferent given to the defender. The total income of the defender (including interest on the furniture in Balnagowan and shooting lodges) amounted to nearly £4000.

The late Sir Charles left to the defender the whole of his moveable property, including the furniture in Balnagowan Castle and in shooting lodges. The total value of the moveable estate amounted to £32,000, of which the pursuer was entitled to one-half as legitim.

The garden and policies attached to Balnagowan Castle extended to eight acres, and the keeping up of the establishment there required an outlay of £3000 per annum. The defender spent about £5000 a year in keeping up the establishments at Balnagowan Castle and Eton and in travelling to Egypt and other places.

The pursuer was at school at Inverness College, where he remained till 1886. He then went to Eton, which he left in 1891 for Trinity College, Cambridge. According to Lady Ross's evidence he was of a headstrong disposition, and both at school and college was extravagant material from which to create an account more or less complete of her expenditure on these heads. But she herself is quite satisfied—and she believes that her son must be satisfied also from his own knowledge—that the sum actually spent by her on his account, and to a great extent at his own request, upon these heads has been considerably in excess of the round sum here stated, and for the present she is content to state that sum as covering the expenditure, reserving her right to restate this branch of the account upon such materials as she may be able to recover hereafter should that be found necessary."

---

No. 11.
July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

in his expenditure. Letters were produced by her written by Sir Charles when he was at Eton, and by Sir Charles' tutors there, which supported her evidence. She explained that fearing that he would borrow money unknown to her she arranged with him to supply him amply with pocket-money and to provide for him such mechanical and electrical appliances, and such shooting, yachting, and boating as he might want. The defender had kept no record of the net expenditure upon these heads, but she maintained that it amounted to considerable sums, and was so far beneficial to the heir as to prevent him running into debt.

The accounts so far as they related to the expenditure upon Balnagowan Castle, and on the establishments near Eton, were not seriously disputed as regarded amount, but it was maintained by the pursuer that both establishments were kept up almost entirely for the defender's own benefit and to gratify her own wishes. Upon this point there was a conflict of evidence as to how far the pursuer used these establishments himself and for the entertainment of his school and college friends.

As regards the item of travelling expenses the defender maintained that the journeys abroad were undertaken by her on account of the pursuer's health, while on the other hand the pursuer's evidence was that this was not the case, but that he merely attended his mother on some of these occasions at her request. In regard to the Scotsburn shootings the pursuer denied that he authorised that they should be retained for him, but admitted writing a letter in October 1889 to Lady Ross in which he said,—"I hope for the next three years you will keep Scotsburn in your hands, and then I can take it off you, as half our game goes there, and we are in a maimed condition without it."

Scotsburn shooting extended to the extent of two-thirds over the unentailed part of Balnagowan, and to the extent of one-third over the entailed estate. Of the rent, £100 was credited to the entailed estate, and £200 to the unentailed estate. The defender kept the shooting unlet for the years 1889 to 1892.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling), on 22d April 1895, pronounced an interlocutor containing, inter alia, the following findings:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, finds with reference to article 1 of the pursuer's objections to the defender's account that the defender is entitled to take credit in her said account for sums in name of upkeep of establishment and maintenance of heir at the rate of £2000 a year from 26th July 1883 to 26th July 1886, and £2500 a year from the last-mentioned date till 4th April 1893. and also as separate items of charge against the pursuer for sums amounting to £2205 which were placed to his credit after he went to Cambridge, and for the actual payments made by the defender in respect of guns and boats for the pursuer's use: . . . With reference to article 3 of said objections, finds that the defender is entitled to take credit for interest on the appraised value of the furniture in Bonnington House, and the shooting-lodges, as brought out in Appendix III. to said objections, but substituting the rate of 10 per cent for the rate of 5 per cent therein proposed, and that the defender is not entitled to take credit for any interest on the furniture in Balnagowan Castle: . . . With reference to the further item of rent for Scotsburn shootings, finds that the defender is not entitled to charge against the pursuer any rent in respect thereof, and subject to these findings, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the total sum due by the defender to the pursuer, including interest, may be ascertained."*

No. 11.

July 27, 1896.

Ross v. Ross.

* "NOTE.— . . . 1. Upkeep of Establishments and Heir's Maintenance. —The question here is between £4000 a year, claimed by the defender, and £2000 a year which the pursuer is willing to allow. Lady Ross began by resolving to make £1500 suffice for this purpose; then she tentatively fixed £2000 a year, as shewn by Mr Pitman's memorandum of 3d April 1884, but before long she increased this to £3000 a-year, and this sum was regularly passed by the estate officials to the credit of her private account. It now appears that, on an average of years, she spent nearly £5000 a year without taking into account her purely personal expenses. Of this she proposes to charge the heir with a proportion amounting to four-fifths, and she does so on the avowed principle, as expressed in her answers to the pursuer's objections, that as the heir was to succeed to a large income 'there was no object in accumulating a sum of ready cash for his coming of age.' I cannot subscribe to that doctrine. Considering that the pursuer was to succeed to a free income of not much more than £5000 a year, with all the responsibilities of a large proprietor of land, and with the necessity of raising money to buy the very furniture in the family residence, a prudent guardian would have acted on exactly the opposite principle, and would have made it his first endeavour to accumulate such a sum as might enable the heir, on his attaining majority, to meet all capital expenditure and start clear. On the other hand, I say nothing against the defender's resolution to keep up the family place. Undoubtedly that required a much larger expenditure than would have been necessary for the actual maintenance and education of a boy of twelve. But the advantages to the boy himself of being brought up with tastes, habits, and associations which would fit him for the position he was to fill, were such as to outweigh all considerations of mere economy. I look at the question, therefore, in this light. Lady Ross had herself an income not far short of the heir's. It would have been possible for her to live more economically away from Balnagowan, but to her also it must have been a satisfaction to remain in the house where her married life had been spent, and to retain the influence and authority which such a residence implied. For these advantages I think she might fairly be called upon to make some pecuniary sacrifice. I have not therefore fixed the sums of £2000 and £2500 a-year successively on the footing that these sums ought to have covered the whole expense of the joint establishment and ward's education, but on the footing that, with a suitable contribution from Lady Ross, and with a proper regard to economy, they might have been made to do so. On this principle it seems to me that, for the first three years of the period of guardianship the sum of £2000 a year proposed by the pursuer is quite sufficient, for so long as he was at Inverness College the mere cost of his education must have been comparatively small. After he went to Eton, I think an addition of £500 a year is reasonable. But I have fixed these sums on the footing that the pursuer is to allow—as he expressed his willingness to do—not merely the sums amounting to £2205 which were placed to his credit after he went to Cambridge, but also the actual payments made by the defender for guns and boats, as a separate charge against him, and I have provided for this accordingly. I may add that I think the defender's proposal to saddle her son with the expense of her summer residence on the Thames is quite preposterous. . . .

"3. Interest on Furniture.—The pursuer admits his obligation to pay interest on the value of the furniture in Bonnington House and the shooting lodges, but I think the rate which he proposes is too low by one half. Neither party has proposed any test of value except the appraisement made by Mr Dowell, and I have not left out of view that the appraisement was probably a moderate one. With regard to the furniture in Balnagowan Castle, the defender had the use of it herself, and it is an afterthought

No. 11.

July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

On 13th November the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor giving effect to the findings in his former interlocutor.

On a reclaiming note by the defender, the First Division, on 25th February 1896, pronounced an interlocutor in which, inter alia, they "recall the findings in said interlocutor of 22d April 1895 with reference to article 1 of the pursuer's objections to the defender's account: . . . Find with reference to article 1 of the pursuer's said objections to the defender's account that the defender is entitled to take credit in her said account for sums in name of upkeep of establishment and maintenance of heir at the rate of £2000 a year, from 26th July 1883 to 26th July 1886, and £2500 a year from the last-mentioned date to 26th July 1891; and £2000 a year from the last-mentioned date to 4th April 1893." *

---

on her part to make any charge for it. Her original resolution was to make none, and I think she was right then, and is wrong now.

"8. Scotsburn Shooting.—This is an item which, so far as I see, is not specifically dealt with in any of the pursuer's objections; but counsel on both sides discussed it, and I have dealt with it accordingly. The defender proposes, as I understand, to debit the pursuer with £200 a year from 1890 onwards, as rent of the shootings on the unentailed portion of Scotsburn estate, on the ground that these were retained by her entirely for the pursuer's behoof. In proof of this she founds on a letter written to her by the pursuer from Eton on 9th October 1889, in which he says—'I hope for the next three years you will keep Scotsburn in your own hands, and then I can take it off you, as half our game goes there, and we are in a maimed condition without it.' Now, I think there has been too much of this sort of thing in the defender's case. Her argument repeatedly has been that the boy wanted her to do this or that; therefore she did it; and therefore he must pay for it. It was no part of her duty as his guardian to gratify every whim of a rather headstrong lad, and if she did so out of good nature, or for the sake of making things pleasant at the time, it by no means follows that he should be compelled to bear the cost. In this instance, I daresay, the retention of Scotsburn increased the sporting attractions of Balnagowan both to the pursuer and to all the male visitors who came there. It would be perfectly justifiable for the guardian of such a ward to retain a moderate portion of his own shooting instead of letting it, and in so far as Scotsburn was entailed, I do not think the pursuer could complain (or does complain) of its not having been let. But it is a very different thing to charge him with a rent for the portion of the shooting which belonged to the defender herself, and I see no justification for it."

* The following opinion was delivered:—

Lord Adam.—The chief question at issue between the parties, and which was argued to us under this reclaiming note, was the amount of the annual allowance which the defender should be entitled to credit herself with for the upkeep of establishments and the maintenance of the heir during his minority.

The defender claims a sum of £4000 per annum on this account. The Lord Ordinary has allowed her a sum of £2000 per annum during the first three years of her guardianship, and a sum of £2500 thereafter. The pursuer does not object to this, except as regards the time of his residence at Cambridge, when, for the reasons which I shall afterwards mention, he suggests that the sum allowed should be £2000 per annum, as fixed by the Lord Ordinary for the first three years.

In consequence of the refusal of certain other persons (who had been named by the late Sir Charles Ross as guardians to the pursuer along with Lady Ross) to accept of that office, she became his sole guardian at his father's death. He was then about twelve years of age, and was an only

The defender appealed.
At delivering judgment,—

No. 11.

July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question with which your Lordships have to deal in this case does not admit of very precise treatment. How much money belonging to a ward may be spent upon his bringing up must in each case depend upon the circumstances of the case, and no rule applicable to every case can ever possibly be laid down so as to bring out a definite sum.

In the case now before your Lordships a mother was left sole guardian of her only child, who would be possessed of ample means upon his attaining his majority. In this action he now complains that too much has been spent by his mother during the period of the guardianship. It appears to me that, not only can no rule be laid down which will bring out a definite sum, but I think no sum in particular can be pointed out of which it can be affirmed absolutely that it was proper to spend it, though it is possible, in respect of some sums, to say that they were beyond the authority of the guardian. A broad view is all the case is susceptible of, and that may be child. He then became entitled to the entailed estates, but his father had left him without a sixpence of money. He left his whole personal estate to the defender Lady Ross, including the furniture in Balnagowan Castle and in the various shooting lodges, and the valuable sheep stock on the Forest Farm, which his father had had in his own hands. He had also left to Lady Ross the liferent of the unentailed lands, and a jointure of £2000 a year, charged on the entailed lands. From these sources she seems to have had an income of £4000 a year. The free income from the entailed lands to which the pursuer became entitled appears to have been about £5000 a year —but the rents did not become payable to him until about eighteen months after his succession—having been backhanded rents, I suppose. Such were the relative positions of the pursuer and defender at the commencement of the tutory. Lady Ross had the sole control of the property and person of her son, and it is obvious that she was in a position of great difficulty and delicacy. She was well-advised of this by her law-agents, and of the necessity of keeping the strictest accounts of her curatorial management, as it was her duty to do. She, however, did nothing of the kind. She kept no account whatever. She made no distinction between her own and her son's affairs—with the result that they became apparently inextricably confused and intermingled, and hence the necessity of the present proceedings. In such circumstances I agree with the Lord Ordinary that she must be held to a strict accounting.

---

It lay with Lady Ross to determine as to the future upbringing of her son. She resolved to reside at Balnagowan Castle, and to keep up an establishment there that he might have a home to come to during his vacations. That was a matter, it appears to me, within her discretion to decide. Whether it was a prudent resolution or not, looking to the hampered circumstances in which her son was placed, being absolutely without money, may be questionable; but it is not challenged by him, and it is on that footing that the present accounting has taken place. But it appears to me that it was a resolution which could only reasonably be arrived at on the footing that Balnagowan should be kept up at the joint expense of his mother and himself. Any use or enjoyment he could have out of Balnagowan was comparatively small. He was either at school or college during the whole period of the guardianship, and could only be at Balnagowan for about three months in the year, during his holidays. As far as his personal requirements were concerned, a very different establishment would have been necessary from that which was in fact kept at Balnagowan. I alto-

No. 11.
July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

thus stated, whatever it was proper under the circumstances for a prudent guardian to spend is proper to be allowed, and whatever is beyond that line ought to be disallowed.

The only rule that can be laid down in such a case is that the boy should be brought up in such a way as is appropriate to the position which he is afterwards to fill. This is simple enough; but it is obvious that it opens a wide field of inquiry, so that it is impossible to say what ought or ought not to have been spent without having the circumstances of each case before one. It is plain that the disposition and tendencies of the boy himself must be considered by a prudent guardian who intends, having the goal which is to be reached before him, that the boy should be properly fitted for the station in life which he is afterwards to fill; that he should neither be lavishly supplied according to his own will, nor, on the other hand, so treated with false economy that he might, and probably would, have an entirely erroneous view of his responsibilities when he attained his majority.

I confess for myself it would be to my mind absolutely impossible to go through each of the leading topics which have been made the subject of gether demur to the proposition that Lady Ross was entitled to keep up a large establishment at Balnagowan at her son's expense, consisting of numerous male and female servants, carriages and horses, and six or eight gardeners. The large establishment which was maintained at Balnagowan was in fact primarily maintained for Lady Ross's use, and she had almost the entire enjoyment of it. It appears to me that the establishment must be regarded as a joint establishment, kept up for the mutual benefit of mother and son, to the maintenance of which both were bound to contribute; and it appears to me, without going into detail, that the sum of £2000 a year, which the Lord Ordinary has fixed as the son's contribution to the expense thereof, is amply sufficient.

---

It will be observed that the Lord Ordinary has allowed Lady Ross an additional sum of £500 a year after her son went to Eton, in respect of the increased cost of his education. The pursuer did not object to this, although he considered the allowance large. It will be observed, however, that the Lord Ordinary has continued this sum during the two years while the pursuer was at Cambridge, and has also allowed Lady Ross to credit herself with a sum of £2205 during that time. It appears that the pursuer had then a bank account of his own, into which Lady Ross paid this sum for which she thus receives credit. The pursuer does not object to Lady Ross receiving credit for this sum, but he maintains that out of this account he paid the whole of his expenses at Cambridge, and that his education there cost his mother nothing, and that therefore his annual contribution should be reduced during these years to the original sum of £2000. I think the pursuer is right in this, and that the interlocutor should be altered accordingly.

The next finding in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor which was objected to by Lady Ross was that in which he finds that she is not entitled to take credit for any interest on the furniture in Balnagowan Castle. I agree with the Lord Ordinary as to this. I think that this furniture is fairly to be considered as part of Lady Ross's contribution to the joint establishment, of which she had herself the principal use and enjoyment. . . .

As regards the Scotsburn shootings and the rate of interest to be allowed on the amount ascertained to be due by Lady Ross, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and do not desire to add anything.

Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear concurred.

The Lord President was absent.

inquiry at your Lordships' bar, and to affirm or to deny as to those items which had been contested that they were properly debited to the mother, or were properly expended by the mother in the course of her guardianship.

I take in the first place the education of the boy; and I think it is necessary to give to that word "education" a very wide signification. It is not a question simply of what literary accomplishments he may become the master of, but he is to be fitted for life as a gentleman inheriting ample means and having duties in the place in which he is to exercise his functions afterwards, and it may be (I am speaking only now generally) appropriate and proper that, apart from keeping up the house, which, it can hardly be denied, could not be abandoned without injury to the estate, he should also be accustomed to the amusements and habits of those with whom he has afterwards to associate and among whom he is to live, and that he should be, as his mother, I think, in one place says, acquainted with the tenants among whom he is to reside and upon whom he is to exercise an influence.

Passing on to another matter, one cannot help thinking that during his education at Eton (still using the word "education" in a very extended sense) it may have been very proper and appropriate that he should be familiar with the amusements which are there in vogue, and also that he should be as much as possible associated with his own mother at that time. I confess there is one passage of the Lord Ordinary's judgment with which I cannot say that I feel myself in harmony. The Lord Ordinary, speaking of an argument which had been urged by the mother, or by those who were representing her, that it was at the boy's own desire, says,—"I think there has been too much of this sort of thing in the defender's case. Her argument repeatedly has been that the boy wanted her to do this or that; therefore she did it; and therefore he must pay for it. It was no part of her duty as his guardian to gratify every whim of a rather headstrong lad, and if she did so out of good nature, or for the sake of making things pleasant at the time, it by no means follows that he should be compelled to bear the cost." My Lords, I think that is an inadequate view of this question. Assuming the part which the mother has to play is that of a person who is really actuated, and only actuated, by a desire for the heir's good, including in that not only the mere increase of his temporal wealth, but that which is invaluable to a young man, namely, that he should have the association and interests belonging to his class, that he should have the advantage of association with his own mother and the influence of a mother, the value of which to a young man is inestimable—that if she had not herself been the guardian, but some other person had been the guardian, and he was considering what would be the best for the lad's real interest, I cannot doubt that a prudent guardian would have said to himself,—"It may be that I can get a person for pay to look after this young man; it may be that he would live cheaper in a place that I should appoint, and by associating with a person who would, at much less expense than his mother, maintain the common home in which the two were to live"; but I cannot help thinking the guardian would also say to himself,—"No person can be so useful a guardian, no person can be so likely to bring up the lad well, and look after him, and associate with him in a way calculated for his permanent benefit, as his own mother"; and therefore one would think that a prudent guardian would be quite justified in paying a much larger sum, in drawing much more upon the funds at his disposal as a guardian, for what I have described as the inestimable advantage of the boy living with his mother in the style and manner which it would become proper for him to maintain afterwards.

No. 11.
July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

It seems to me that, taking that view, it is impossible to put your finger upon a particular piece of expenditure and say it was not proper that he should have this or that—it was not proper that the mother should have a summer residence for herself in the immediate neighbourhood of Eton. Taking that item by itself as if it were the only thing you were to regard, I can quite well understand that a great many of those things might be rejected as extravagant and improper. It seems to me, with submission to the Lord Ordinary, that that is not the real question we have to determine. The question is what, under the circumstances as they have turned out, was proper expenditure. I do not reject the teaching of experience. We have to look at the matter now after the fact. I believe it to be perfectly legitimate to say that if this had been a question which the Court were considering beforehand as to what would, could, or might be appropriate expenditure for this boy, it may be that one would not have been able to anticipate that this or that sort of expenditure ought to be incurred; but I do not reject the teaching of experience, and I do not reject the fact which the Lord Ordinary himself refers to, that the boy with respect to whom these inquiries arise was a headstrong boy very desirous of having his own way. The question of how a boy of that character ought to be treated is a matter which is eminently a question for a prudent guardian to consider; and if the associations with which the mother was able to surround him at Eton, and if the fact that he was amply supplied with money, more amply perhaps than a priori would be considered the proper thing to do, involved a certain amount of expenditure, when we are looking at the question in the light of experience, it appears to me that a great deal of that expenditure was most appropriate, most wise, and conceived not only in the spirit dictated by the love of a mother for her son, but that it is what a prudent guardian who stood in no relation of blood or kindliness would advise to be done.

Under these circumstances, as I say, it is impossible, taking a broad view of this case, to do more than to say that the style of living and the mode in which he was being brought up, and the circumstances with which he was surrounded, undoubtedly disclose a state of things in which it was a prudent course for a mother as guardian to do many things which a priori one might have said would have been beyond the ordinary mode in which one would treat a boy of that age.

With respect to some part of the case your Lordships are not called upon to form any judgment, because the candour of the learned counsel who has ably argued on behalf of the defender at your Lordships' bar has admitted that it is impossible to maintain some of these specific items as sums which ought to be allowed—for instance, the claim in respect of Forest Farm, as to which it cannot be denied that it is hardly susceptible of being sustained. Though, as I said just now, one cannot lay one's finger always upon a particular form of expenditure, and say this was undoubtedly authorised and proper, there are some things of which one can say certainly they were not. I think your Lordships have been very fairly treated by the learned counsel in the arguments they have addressed to us in eliminating as far as possible what really was not susceptible of argument on behalf of the appellant.

The history of the case seems to me in some respects a very painful one. I cannot help thinking that many of the things which are now made subject of complaint and are susceptible of argument after the event are matters which undoubtedly were done for her son at the time by a loving and devoted mother, who would probably have given anything to him.

Now, my Lords, while I say that I cannot help feeling that there are some lines which must be sharply drawn, and notwithstanding that the defender is a mother, one must not diminish, if one can help it, the obligation upon a person who is managing the estate and effects of another to be able to render an account afterwards of what he or she has done. I cannot help feeling, therefore, with respect to a great many of these things, when the mother is challenged (whether one would have expected the son to raise the point or not is another question) she has only herself to thank for the consequences of disregarding the very wise advice of those whom she had at first consulted to keep accounts. She was bound to keep accounts, and if in any respect she has suffered—and I cannot help feeling that she must have suffered very bitterly in having to defend an action of this sort against her son—she had to some extent brought it upon herself by her neglect to follow the wise advice that was given to her, by keeping accounts so as to be able to shew what in fact she had spent, and in respect to what matters she had spent it.

I do not propose to go into details. As I have said, I do not think the matter is susceptible of being treated as if one could go through every item of this account, or even the heads of the account, and say what was spent, or what ought to have been spent, in a particular month or in a particular year. Speaking generally, it appears to me that her mode of treatment of her son, regarding her simply as a guardian, was not only most kind, which might be expected, but also most wise. The particular disposition and tone which the son adopted, and which may be seen, both from his own correspondence and from the reports of his tutors at Eton, shew that questions of great difficulty arose as to the mode in which he should be kept from borrowing money by supplying him with money amply, and the mode in which he should be kept away from certain associations which might be injurious to him in after life; all the efforts were dictated, I have no doubt, not only by affection, but by wisdom. Still, having said all that, the question remains, and a very puzzling question it would be if one were to strive to go into it as a matter of minute detail, whether or not the allowance that has been hitherto made by the Courts below has been exactly what your Lordships would desire. My Lords, I cannot help thinking that they have drawn the line too narrowly—that the amounts which have been allowed in respect of upkeep and education have been too strictly limited. Therefore I have to move your Lordships that the judgments, so far as they have drawn too narrow a line, should be reversed, and that your Lordships should take a somewhat more liberal and wider view. I propose that the interlocutor of the First Division should be varied to the following extent and effect:—That the appellant shall be entitled, in lieu of the yearly allowances made to her by the interlocutor in the name of upkeep of establishment and maintenance of the heir, to take credit in account for an allowance at the rate of £3000 per annum, such allowance being in addition to the sums advanced by her to the heir, amounting to £2205, which are specified in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of April 22, 1895. That is the substance of what I shall move your Lordships. Then one has to deal with the costs. As I have said, I think the circumstances shew that there has been a considerable departure from what I would call the accurate business keeping of accounts by the appellant, and I think in respect of that matter it is impossible to say that your Lordships could visit altogether upon the heir the costs which have been incurred in these somewhat painful proceedings. I think, therefore, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dated November 13, 1895, and the interlocutor of the First Division, should be reversed—first, in so far as they relate to, or decern for, the expenses of process; and secondly, in so far as they fix or decern for the balance due by the appellant; that each of the parties shall bear the expenses of process hitherto incurred by them in the Court of Session, and that the respondent shall pay to the appellant her costs of this appeal; that the interlocutor appealed from, except in so far as hereby varied or reversed, be affirmed, and the cause remitted to the First Division of the Court.

No. 11.

July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

Lord Watson.—This case comes before us in a very unsatisfactory shape. The appellant acted for nearly ten years as the guardian of the respondent, who is her only child. During that period she did not, as it was her plain duty to have done, keep tutorial or curatorial accounts, shewing the precise sums which from time to time were spent out of the income of the minor's estate upon his education and maintenance. Unfortunately the kindly relations which had previously subsisted between the mother and son ceased about the time of his attaining his majority—shortly after which he raised the present action of accounting. The investigations which have been made in the course of the action afford sufficient materials for ascertaining the amount of the expenditure upon the minor's estate, which entirely consisted of land, and also the amount of the net income derived from it. But the family expenditure of guardian and ward had been massed together, and there are no materials for determining with anything like precision whether some of these outlays were or were not, at the time when they were made, meant to come out of the funds of the minor. I have difficulty in resisting the conclusion that there are various charges for which the appellant now seeks to take credit which, at the time when they were incurred, were not intended to fall upon the minor, and would in all probability never have been placed to his debit had it not been for their subsequent disagreement.

I agree with the learned Judges below in thinking that the presumption must in dubio be against a guardian who has failed to keep regular accounts; but I am of opinion, at the same time, that a guardian who has in other respects done her duty by the ward, is entitled, even in the absence of such accounts, to a fair and reasonable allowance out of the income of his estate. In estimating the amount of the allowance, the only test which occurs to me is to consider what sums would, in the circumstances of this case, have been allowed to the mother by the Court, or by an independent guardian, in respect of the minor being educated by her, and occupying along with her the principal residence upon his own property.

No. 11.
July 27, 1896.
Ross v. Ross.

Keeping that principle in view, I have come to the same conclusion with your Lordships in regard to the increased allowance which ought to be made to the appellant in substitution for the annual sums with which she has been credited by the judgment of the First Division. After the observations which have been made by the Lord Chancellor, in which I concur, I do not think it necessary to state the considerations which have led me to that result. I only desire to explain that the allowance has been estimated with reference to the whole period of minority and then distributed, and that it does not necessarily represent what ought to have been the amount allowed for each particular year.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I desire only to add a word or two. I agree with my noble and learned friends that it is impossible to lay down any rigid rule in a case of this sort; but I think the test is that which my noble and learned friends have pointed out, the sum allowed ought to be such as it would be reasonable for an independent guardian or curator to allow to the mother for the maintenance of the child and of the establishment, and in determining what is reasonable all the circumstances of the case must be taken into account, the leading consideration,—in fact as regards the amount, one may say, the governing consideration,—being the interest of the heir.

LORD SHAND.—Concurring as I do, not only in the judgment proposed, but in the views which your Lordships have stated as the ground of that judgment, I think it unnecessary to add anything to what has fallen from your Lordships.

ORDERED, that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland of the First Division, of February 25, 1896, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby, varied to the following extent and effect: That the appellant shall be entitled, in lieu of the yearly allowances made to her by the said interlocutor in name of upkeep of establishment and maintenance of the heir, to take credit in account for an allowance at the rate of £3000 per annum from July 26, 1883, to April 4, 1893; such allowance being in addition to the sums advanced by her to the heir, amounting to £2205, which are specified in the Lord Ordinary's said interlocutor of April 22, 1895: Further ordered, that the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of November 13, 1895, and also the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session of the First Division, of February 25, 1896, be, and the same are hereby, reversed (1) in so far as they relate to, or decern for, expenses of process, and (2) in so far as they fix or decern for a balance due by the appellant: Further ordered, that the said interlocutors appealed from, except in so far as hereby varied or reversed, be, and the same are hereby, affirmed: Further ordered, that each of the parties shall bear the expenses of process hitherto incurred by them in the Court of Session, and that the respondent shall pay, or cause to be paid, to the appellant, the costs incurred by the said appellant in respect of the said appeal to this House, the amount of such last-mentioned costs to be certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments: And it is further ordered, that the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted to the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this variation and judgment, &c.

No. 11.

July 27, 1896. Ross v. Ross.

MARTIN & LESLIE—KEITH R. MAITLAND, W.S.—GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.

No. 12.

July 16, 1896. Highland Railway Co. v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY (Defenders), Appellants.—Littler, Q.C.—Johnston—Dundas.

THE GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY COMPANY (Pursuers), Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Murray—Cripps, Q.C.—Ferguson.

Arbiter—Award—Ambiguity—Extrinsic Evidence.—The Great North of Scotland Railway Company and the Highland Railway Company referred to A B as arbiter the following question:—"Whether the proviso of section 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865, applies to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Railway Act, 1884, between the two companies at Elgin, or whether the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively, in accordance with their respective mileage, and under the rules of the Clearing House?"

The arbiter in his award found "that the proviso of section 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865 . . . does not apply to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Railway Act, 1884, between the two companies at Elgin," and further, "that the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively, in accordance with their respective mileage, and under the rules of the Clearing House."

In an action raised by the Great North of Scotland Railway Company for implement of the award, the defenders made and asked to be allowed a proof of the following averment:—"The terms 'traffic exchanged under the Act of 1884 between the two companies at Elgin,' occurring in the question submitted to A B do not include, and were not intended to include, passenger traffic. This was explained to A B, and he and both the parties acted in the whole proceedings before him on the footing that no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts was submitted to him, and he accordingly decided no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts."

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the award was unambiguous, and must receive effect.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Watson. Ld. Herschell. Lord Morris. Lord Shand.

ON 18th June 1886 the Great North of Scotland Railway Company and the Highland Railway Company referred to Mr James Beale as arbiter the following questions:—"(1) Whether the proviso to section 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865, applies to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Railway Act of 1884 between the two companies at Elgin, or whether the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively in accordance with their respective mileage and under the rules of the Clearing-House? (2) If the proviso applies at all, does it apply to anything other than competitive traffic passing via Aberdeen?"

On 9th July 1886 Mr Beale issued the following award:—"I hereby award and determine that the proviso of section 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865, printed on the fourth page of, and referred to in the above written submission, does not apply to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Railway Act, 1884, between the two companies at Elgin, and I further award and determine that the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively in accordance with their respective mileage and under the rules of the Clearing House."

In February 1894 the Great North of Scotland Railway Company brought this action against the Highland Railway Company for implement of the decree-arbitral.

In their defences the Highland Railway Company made, and asked to be allowed a proof of, the following averment:—"The terms 'traffic exchanged under the Act of 1884 between the two companies at Elgin' occurring in the first question submitted to Mr Beale do not include, and were understood by the parties not to include, passenger traffic. This was explained to Mr Beale, and he and both the parties acted in the whole proceedings before him on the footing that no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts was submitted to him, and he accordingly decided no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts."

On 25th November 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds and declares, decerns and ordains, in terms of the conclusions of the summons," &c.

The Second Division, on 1st February 1895, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think for the decision of this case it is not necessary to enter into any detail. What has passed in the interlocutory observations between your Lordships and the learned counsel is sufficient to shew that it is impossible that these interlocutors should be reversed. It seems to me that the case depends upon very short grounds indeed. Here is an award on the face of it perfectly good, dealing in express terms with the very subject which was submitted to the arbitrator in a written document which discloses without the least doubt what it was that was submitted to him. That written document submits to the arbitrator two questions—raising the questions in a very specific form, which were apparently the subjects in dispute in regard to a particular Act of Parliament.

I am not going into particulars with respect to them, because it seems to me to be luce clarius that what was in dispute was decided by the arbitrator. Upon the face of the award the very thing submitted to him was decided by him. To my mind it is not susceptible of argument that the document discloses any ambiguity at all upon the face of it. In order to make it ambiguous we are asked to enter into the mind of the arbitrator, and to go upon various speculations as to what may have been intended by him, but upon the face of the award the very thing which was submitted to him has been decided. That is all I propose to say upon that matter, because it seems to me that although we have had it argued for some hours now it cannot be made more clear than the documents themselves make it.

As to the other question which has been raised, assuming your Lordships affirm the interlocutors, all I wish to say is this, that if Mr Johnston has the right which he says he has, he has got it; but I will be no party to give him any additional right. The litigation such as it is has been conducted for a good many years. The award is ten years old, and I certainly do not consider that the condition of things is such that he ought to receive any encouragement from your Lordships' House for further litigation. The only thing we decide is the matter submitted to us. If that decision is nevertheless capable by another process of being made of no avail, I cannot help it, but I certainly would not by any reservation be a party to doing that which would first allow a cause to be brought to this House on appeal, to be argued and decided in this House, and then give an opportunity of taking an additional proceeding afterwards which would render that judgment of no effect whatever.

No. 12.

July 16, 1896. Highland Railway Co. v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutors be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. It does not certainly occur to me that there is any such ambiguity appearing upon the face of this award as to entitle the parties to a proof for the purpose of clearing up its meaning. The terms of the document are to my mind quite plain and unambiguous. The criticisms that have been made upon its findings by the learned counsel who have addressed us for the Highland Railway Company have no doubt raised, or been calculated to raise, some doubts, whether upon full consideration a better arrangement could not have been made by the arbiter, but really they amount to nothing else than an impeachment of his findings upon the merits. They certainly did not in the least degree suggest the existence of ambiguity.

Upon the other point, I think your Lordships are bound to dispose of this case, and ought to take the course of disposing of it. We have heard some statements at the bar, but upon examining the record I can find no statement whatever made on the part of the defenders which could raise a relevant case for setting aside or impeaching the award. They may have such a case, and it may be competent for them to state it. If, notwithstanding our decision in the present suit, they have a right, they may state it. I shall only say that I do not wish to convey a suggestion that in my opinion such a right exists.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—It appears to me, as it does to your Lordships, that the agreement of reference and the award are quite unambiguous. The contract of reference refers to the arbitrator the question whether the proviso to section 82 of the Highland Railway Act of 1865 applies to the traffic exchanged under the Act of 1884. That word "traffic" includes in my opinion all traffic. The contention of the appellants is that it does not include passenger traffic, and that it does not include competitive traffic. I can see no foundation for such a contention. According to the plain meaning of the word "traffic," used without qualification in the contract of reference and award, and the meaning of the word "traffic" as it is used in the statute in which the proviso is contained, it applies to and includes all traffic. Therefore upon the interpretation of this agreement of reference and the award I am of opinion that the limited construction for which the appellants contend is inadmissible, and that the pursuers are right and are entitled to succeed in their action.

No. 12.

July 16, 1896.
Highland Railway Co. v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

As to the other matter which has been adverted to, I agree in what has fallen from your Lordships as to this not being a case in which there should be any stay of proceedings or express reservation of a right to bring an action of reduction, especially after the lapse of time and the protracted proceedings which have occurred since the statute of 1884 was passed. On the other hand, it strikes me that there is force in the observation that this action deals with the interpretation of the award only, and it may well be pleaded that any decree following upon that interpretation is limited to the case of the award being regarded as effectual and operative. The defenders in this case may still be entitled to bring an action of reduction with the object of setting aside the award altogether on grounds which could not have been maintained in defence to the present action but which could only be urged and receive effect in an action at their instance. In such an action an entirely different question from that of interpretation of the agreement and award would arise for decision. As to what might occur if such an action were raised, and the remedy to which the appellants might in that case be entitled, I desire to reserve my opinion.

THEIR Lordships dismissed the appeal, with costs.

MARTIN & LESLIE—J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—DYSON & Co.—GORDON, FALCONER, & FAIRWEATHER, W.S.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

1895-96.

HENRY WHITCHURCH, Appellant.—Lorimer.
JOHN MILLAR, Respondent.—Salvesen—Findlay.

No. 1.

Oct. 25, 1895.
Whitchurch v. Millar.

Breach of the Peace—Relevancy—Proof—Salvation Army Procession.—A member of the Salvation Army was charged under a summary complaint, which set forth that on Sunday afternoon he "did behave in a disorderly manner, and did march along the said street playing on a concertina or other similar instrument, and refuse to desist, and annoy and disturb the lieges, and commit a breach of the peace." The accused was convicted. In an appeal the case stated that the following facts were proved:—The appellant marched at the head of a procession playing on a concertina, there being singing and shouting by members of the procession; the playing of the concertina attracted a crowd of thirty or forty persons, thereby making it difficult for people to pass; this was the cause of annoyance to several persons who were examined as witnesses; the complainer on being asked to desist refused to do so.

Held that the complaint was relevant, and that the Magistrates, on the facts proved, were entitled to convict.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

JOHN MILLAR, Chief Constable, Hamilton, brought a summary complaint in the Police Court there, against Henry Whitchurch, a "Captain" in the Salvation Army, which bore that the accused "did about three o'clock on the afternoon of Sunday, 4th August 1895, in Quarry Street, Hamilton, behave in a disorderly manner, and did march along said street playing on a concertina or other similar instrument, and refuse to desist, and annoy and disturb the lieges, and commit a breach of the peace." The Magistrates found the accused guilty of the crime charged, and dismissed him with an admonition.

Whitchurch obtained a case, which set forth the following facts:—That the appellant was the "Captain" of the Salvation Army, and that on Sunday 4th August (the Sunday previous to the trial), about three o'clock in the afternoon, he marched at the head of a procession through one of the principal thoroughfares of the burgh, viz., Quarry Street, playing on a concertina, accompanied with singing and shouting by members of the procession. In consequence of the playing of the concertina on this Sunday, with the singing and shouting being heard at a considerable distance, and also on account of complaints previously made against the appellant for using instrumental music in a similar manner on a recent previous Sunday, a police-constable followed the procession, which constituted a crowd of thirty to forty persons, and knowing that the appellant had been formerly warned against playing such instruments on Sundays, went to and called upon him to stop playing the concertina. The appellant replied that he would not stop unless he was arrested. He was accordingly arrested, and taken to the police station. He was again asked if he would desist from using instrumental music on Sundays, but he refused to stop, and said he was acting on instructions from Headquarters. He was liberated, to appear when summoned. It was further proved that the playing of the concertina attracted a crowd of about thirty or forty persons, thereby making it difficult for people to pass, and that this was the cause of annoyance to several of the witnesses examined who were residenters in the neighbourhood.

No. 1.

Oct. 25, 1895. Whitchurch v. Millar.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court of Justiciary was:—"Whether, in order to the facts of the case being laid before them, the Magistrates were right in sustaining the relevancy of the complaint, and whether the Magistrates having held the facts as above stated to be satisfactorily proved, they were justified in finding that a breach of the peace had been committed?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The charge was irrelevant. Nothing was said of obstruction in the street. To play on a concertina was not a breach of the peace. He was not accused of noise and shouting. It was not charged that a crowd assembled. (2) The facts did not warrant conviction. The crowd only consisted of the members of the demonstration. It was not alleged to be disorderly.[1] "Difficulty in passing" was not obstruction. This case was a fortiori of Hutton v. Main,[2] where the conviction was quashed. In Deakin v. Milne there was more specification and proof, and besides, a disregarded proclamation of the Magistrates.[3] Reasonable apprehension was a necessary element in breach of the peace and was absent.[4]

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As to the relevancy of this complaint I have no doubt. What is said to have been done here might or might not create a breach of the peace, according to circumstances, but it has been alleged in this complaint that in this case it did create a breach of the peace. The facts found proved were that the appellant marched at the head of a procession playing on a concertina, there being singing and shouting by members of the procession, and that the playing of the concertina attracted a crowd of thirty or forty persons, thereby making it difficult for people to pass, and that this was the cause of annoyance to several persons who were examined as witnesses, and that the complainer on being asked to desist refused to do so, which facts unquestionably constitute a relevant ground for a charge of a breach of the peace. It is a small breach of the peace no doubt, but still a breach of the peace, and in my opinion the Magistrates were quite right in so holding, if they were satisfied that the facts proved established the averment that a breach of the peace had been committed.

LORD YOUNG.—This was a small breach of the peace in a sense. There was no violence of any kind, but I think these processions going about the streets are a nuisance to the lieges, and as it was proved to be so here when

[1] Bewglass v. Blair, Feb. 10, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 1 W. 574.
[2] Hutton v. Main, Nov. 5, 1891, 19 R. (Just. Cases) 5, 3 W. 41.
[3] Deakin v. Milne, Oct. 27, 1882, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 22, 5 Coup. 174.
[4] Ferguson v. Carnochan, July 8, 1889, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 93, 2 W. 278.

No. 1.

Oct. 25, 1895.
Whitchurch v. Millar.

there was a gathering,—and the same would be true even without it,—I am of opinion that the Magistrates were quite entitled to interpose and stop it, and if it was not instantly stopped, a prosecution was most legitimate. Should another prosecution prove necessary I hope that it will end very differently from a mere admonition. One may sympathise with this appellant, who no doubt thought he was doing his duty honestly, and was under the influence of people whose orders he could not very well resist, yet there is no other way of protecting the public, and public order in the streets of towns, than by imposing a suitable penalty if this form of nuisance is persevered in.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have no doubt about the relevancy of the complaint and the soundness of the conviction upon the facts stated to be proved. I do not want to say anything against this particular appellant. I daresay he was quite earnest and honest in his endeavours to do good, and I think it was more a mistake than a crime on his part, but it was a mistake which amounted to a breach of the peace. For my own part I think the Magistrates acted very discreetly in not imposing a fine, but simply pronouncing an admonition, because in the circumstances it was enough for this particular appellant, and may prevent him from repeating what he has done.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

YOUNG & ROXBURGH, W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.

Oct. 25, 1895.
Mackenzie v. M'Dougall.

ROBERT MACKENZIE, Complainer.—Johnston—Dewar.
JOHN M'DOUGALL (Procurator-Fiscal, Justice of Peace Court, Roxburghshire), Respondent.—Clark—Addison Smith.

Public-House—Breach of certificate—Sale of victuals outside of licensed premises—Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), schedule A.—A hotel licence, which authorises the sale in the hotel, "but not elsewhere, of victuals and of spirits," does not preclude the holder from selling victuals elsewhere than in the hotel.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Trayner.

ON 14th September 1895 Robert Mackenzie, holder of a certificate* to keep an inn at the Spread Eagle Inn, Kelso, was convicted in the Justice of Peace Court of Roxburghshire of a breach of his certificate, on the ground that he had sold victuals, consisting of sandwiches and pies, in a refreshment-tent in Inch Park, Kelso.

Mackenzie brought this bill of suspension against John M'Dougall, Procurator-fiscal to the Justices of the Peace for the county.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it to be quite plain that this conviction is bad. The Act of Parliament requires that a person must have a certificate for premises in which liquor is sold. He can, like any other citizen, sell victuals without any certificate. A person having an hotel licence receives a certificate to sell victuals and spirits, but the fact that victuals

* The Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), schedule A, provides a form of certificate for inns and hotels which authorises the holder "to keep an inn and hotel . . . for the sale in the said house, but not elsewhere, of victuals and of spirits . . . or other exciseable liquors.

No. 2.

Oct. 25, 1895. Mackenzie v. M'Dougall.

are mentioned in the certificate cannot by implication prevent the holder of the certificate from selling, elsewhere than on the licensed premises, articles for the sale of which no certificate is required. No licence is required by any man to sell a ham sandwich or a pie. I am therefore of opinion that the conviction should be suspended.

LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 3.

Oct. 25, 1895. Galbraith v. Disselduff.

WILLIAM GALBRAITH, Complainer.—Guy.
WILLIAM DISSELDUFF (Procurator-Fiscal, Justice of Peace Court, Dunoon), Respondent.—Graham.

Conviction—Several charge and general conviction—Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 92), sec. 1.—A complaint set forth that A, a carriage-hirer, and B his servant, did "cruelly beat, illtreat, overdrive, . . . or procure to be cruelly beaten, illtreated, overdriven," two horses "belonging to A, then under charge of B, and did cause the said animals to draw a brake laden with passengers, and the said B did unmercifully and unnecessarily lash them with the shaft of a whip, said animals being in a poor, weak, and emaciated condition, and completely exhausted, whereby said animals were subjected to pain and suffering, contrary to the Act 13 and 14 Victoria, caput 92, section 1."

The Justices found A and B "guilty of the contravention charged," and convicted them.

In a suspension by the master held that the conviction against him was bad, on the ground that as one of the acts charged as together constituting the contravention was attributed to the servant alone, the general conviction against the master was not valid.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

WILLIAM GALBRAITH, carriage-hirer, Kirn, and his servant John Ness, brake-driver, were charged in the Justice of Peace Court, Dunoon, with a contravention of the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850, in that they "did, on 16th July 1895, cruelly beat, illtreat, overdrive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, illtreated, overdriven, abused, or tortured, on the shore road between Kirn and Dunoon, two brown horses belonging to the said William Galbraith, then under charge of the said John Ness, and did cause the said animals to draw a brake laden with passengers, and the said John Ness did unmercifully and unnecessarily lash them with the shaft of a whip, said animals being in a poor, weak, and emaciated condition, and completely exhausted, whereby said animals were subjected to pain and suffering, contrary to the Act 13 and 14 Victoria, caput 92, section 1, whereby the said William Galbraith and John Ness are liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

The Justices found "William Galbraith and John Ness guilty of the contravention charged," and convicted them "of the contravention charged."

Galbraith brought this bill of suspension, and argued;—While there was specification of the modus against Ness there was none against the complainer. Where a statutory offence could be committed in various ways it was not enough to libel the statute and find that the offence had been committed in one or other of various possible ways.[1] The Magistrates should have specified the acts which made the complainer guilty of the contravention.

No. 3.

Oct. 25, 1895
Galbraith v. Disselduff.

Argued for the respondent;—"Illtreating or causing to be illtreated" was one offence under the statute, and not an alternative charge. Accordingly a general conviction was good.[2] O'Neills' case distinguished the case of De Banzie. It was not necessary to libel guilty knowledge.[3]

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the relevancy of this complaint is open to very serious question, but I refrain from dealing with that matter, because it appears to me that there is another ground, free from difficulty or doubt, on which the present complaint can be decided. The complainer and John Ness are charged together with a contravention of the statute referred to, but part of the acts libelled as amounting to such contravention is stated to have been the act of Ness alone. The conviction however is general, and convicts the complainer of the "contravention charged." The complainer is therefore convicted of something with which he was not charged; the conviction to that extent is without warrant. This is such a serious disconformity between the charge and the conviction that, in my opinion, the latter cannot be sustained.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. It is not improper to say that I regret the result, because I think it is probable that what the Magistrates meant to do was to convict the suspender of having sent out horses unfit for work, and with a servant having authority from him to treat them in such a way as would bring them to the end of the journey, as he in fact did. That offence might have been so libelled as to be a relevant charge, or a valid conviction might have followed even under the charge as made if that conviction had stated what particular facts the suspender was found guilty of. But I agree with Lord Trayner in thinking that it ought to appear clearly on the face of the conviction, taken by itself or in connection with the complaint, that the Magistrates have rightly apprehended the facts which they thought were proved, and upon which they could lawfully convict. I am not judicially convinced that the Magistrates here held facts to be proved which would warrant the conviction of the suspender—the master. The conviction of the servant has not been questioned.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in the judgment proposed by Lord Trayner. This complaint is clumsily framed. But if it had been necessary to decide the case on the question of relevancy I should be prepared to hold that the complaint was of very doubtful relevancy, but I think it may be read as if the words "said animals being in a poor, weak, and emaciated condition," &c., qualified the whole libel, and so applied to the case of the complainer. But I agree with Lord Trayner that this conviction, which convicts both the persons accused of the contravention charged, cannot possibly stand. I have no doubt that Galbraith was wrongly

[1] De Banzie v. Peebles, March 16, 1875, 3 Couper, 89, per Lord Young, pp. 96-7, 2 R. (Just. Cases) 22.

[2] O'Neills v. Campbell, July 18, 1883, 5 Couper, 305, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 76.

[3] Wilson v. Johnstone, May 28, 1874, 3 Couper, 8, 1 R. (Just. Cases) 16; Wright v. Rowan, Jan. 23, 1890, 2 White, 426, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 28.

No. 3.

Oct. 25, 1895. Galbraith v. Dinnelduff.

convicted of the whole offence "as charged," when part of the contravention was so expressed in the complaint as not to apply to him. If it was intended to charge that the complainer was a party to the alleged cruel beating of the horses, it would have been easy to frame the complaint so as to make this part of the charge apply to him also. But whoever framed the complaint chose a form which excluded the application of that part of the charge to the complainer.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Pass the bill; suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern."

GEORGE S. MUNRO, S.S.C.—W. S. HARRIS, L.A.—Agents.

No. 4.

Oct. 25, 1895. Fairfoul v. Somerville.

ARCHIBALD FAIRFOUL, Appellant.—Salvesen—A. S. D. Thomson.
GEORGE SOMERVILLE (Procurator-Fiscal, Burgh Court of Edinburgh), Respondent.—Comrie Thomson—Boyd.

Police—Street—Bye-law regulating omnibus traffic—Loitering—Relevancy.—A bye-law framed by the magistrates of a burgh for the regulation of omnibus traffic provided as follows:—"The driver of an omnibus shall not loiter therewith on the public streets, either when on the way to its stance, before starting, or at any other time." A driver was charged with a contravention of the bye-law in so far as he did on a certain date, with an omnibus of which he was driver, loiter on a certain public street. It was proved that the accused drove his omnibus at a slow walking pace four times along a street, stopping to take up passengers, before starting for his destination. The street was not crowded, and the omnibus caused no danger, obstruction, or inconvenience.

Held that the facts proved did not justify the conviction, even if the charge were relevant.

Question whether the charge was relevant.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

ARCHIBALD FAIRFOUL was charged under a complaint in the Burgh Court of Edinburgh with a contravention "of No. 16 * of the bye-laws made by the Magistrates of the City for the regulation of the Edinburgh omnibus traffic, in terms of the powers conferred on them by the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891,† in

* Bye-law No. 16 was in these terms,—"The driver of an omnibus shall not loiter therewith on the public streets, either when on the way to its stance, before starting, or at any other time."

† Section 65 of the Edinburgh Municipal Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, enacts,—"The Magistrates and Council are hereby authorised and empowered to make bye-laws for the prevention within the city of the plying or running of tramway cars, omnibuses, brakes, or other carriages for the public or common conveyance of passengers which are unlicensed, or which shall be in a state of disrepair or insecurity, or not adapted in all other respects for the public conveyance of passengers with safety, and for the prevention of any person not licensed in terms of the immediately preceding section from acting within the city as a driver or conductor of any such tramway car, omnibus, brake, or other carriage, and for the prevention within the city of overcrowding of tramway cars, omnibuses, brakes, and other carriages, and for regulating, except within the stations and the station premises of any railway company, the places at which the same shall stand, and all other matters tending to promote regularity and public convenience, and for regulating the times of starting on the streets of omnibuses, brakes, or other carriages, and in all cases under a penalty not exceeding for each

No. 4.

Oct. 25, 1895.
Fairfoul v. Somerville.

so far as, upon the 15th day of September 1895, he did with the omnibus Dunedin, No 91, of which he was the driver, loiter on the public street in Princes Street, Edinburgh."

The following objections to the complaint were stated,—"(1) It is irrelevant and incompetent, (2) there is a want of specification, and (3) it does not aver that in consequence of the loitering inconvenience or danger arose to the public, or that any traffic was obstructed or impeded."

The Magistrate repelled these objections, and after hearing evidence, convicted the accused of the contravention charged.

The accused craved a case, which was stated. It set forth that on the said 15th September 1895, at 11.10 a.m., the appellant drove the said omnibus four times along Princes Street at a slow walking pace, stopping to take up passengers on the way; and that he then left Princes Street at 11.55, and went southwards by North Bridge on his way to Roslin with seven passengers; that the street was not crowded; and that the said omnibus did not impede or obstruct the traffic on it, or endanger or inconvenience any person.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were,—"(1) Is the complaint competent or relevant? (2) Do the facts proved warrant such conviction?"

The appellant argued;—(1) The bye-law was ultra vires of the magistrates. Section 65 of the Act of 1891 did not confer power to frame such a bye-law. (2) The complaint was not relevant. It did not aver that the Sheriff had confirmed the bye-law. It did not aver obstruction or inconvenience.[1] In any case it was necessary to prove obstruction or inconvenience.

The respondent argued;—The bye-law was within the scope of the statutory powers of the magistrates. The complaint was relevant, and the conviction was warranted. It was unnecessary either to aver or prove obstruction. (1) The bye-law was silent as to obstruction, and the charge followed the bye-law. The policy of the bye-law was to forbid loitering whether in fact it resulted in obstruction or not. Obstruction was likely to arise from this habit, and accordingly the magistrates forbade it. This was within their right. There were many things forbidden and punished, not because they did, but because they might cause inconvenience, e.g., furious driving, or drunkenness and disorderly conduct. (2) Even if obstruction were of the essence of the offence it was present, in the sense that it was an unreasonable use of the street. The magistrates could not deny passage along the street, but they were entitled and bound to distribute to all an equal use of the street. The accused made an unreasonable use of the street. He used it not as a means of passage, but as a place of business. Unreasonable use amounted to obstruction.[2] offence £2 on the defaulting owners, or contractors, or lessees, or conductors, or drivers of such tramway cars, omnibuses, brakes, or other carriages, and the Magistrates and Council may vary and alter such bye-laws from time to time and under a like penalty for contravention . . . Provided further, that any bye-laws, and variations or alterations thereof, made by the Magistrates and Council under the powers of this section shall be subject to confirmation by the Sheriff. . . ."

---

[1] Leisk v. Galloway, November 12, 1884, 5 Couper, 497, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 5.

[2] Gerring v. Barfield, 28 Justice of Peace Cases, 615; De Caux v. Powley, 28 Justice of Peace Cases, 806.

No. 4.

Oct. 25, 1895.
Fairfoul v. Somerville.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complaint here proceeds on a bye-law which is stated to have been passed by the Magistrates of Edinburgh in virtue of statutory authority, and which has, as a matter of fact, been approved by the Sheriff, although that is not stated. I give no opinion whether the absence of that statement in the complaint makes the complaint irrelevant or not. But the complaint does not specify the way in which the bye-law has been infringed. It simply repeats the word "loiter" and adds nothing further. That word gives really no notice of the charge to be made against the accused. It gives him no notice of the modes of the particular offence at all. The offence is one which can be committed in a variety of ways, and there is no indication of the way in which it has been committed. My own inclination is to hold that this complaint is irrelevant. But apart from that, in the statement of facts found proved by the Magistrate there is no ground for a conviction. This man, who was driving one of the four-in-hand chars-à-bancs which start from Princes Street, drove several times up and down the street, picking up passengers prior to starting on his journey. The Magistrate found that nothing was done to obstruct the street. Nothing was found proved against the appellant but driving quietly along and stopping from time to time to pick up passengers. It is absurd to think that any driver who knew that loitering was forbidden should be expected to think that what he was then doing was covered by the word "loitering."

I am therefore of opinion that this conviction is bad, both upon the ground that the complaint is irrelevant as being without specification, and also upon the ground that the facts stated by the Magistrate to have been proved do not warrant a conviction even if it were held that the word "loiter" specified an offence.

LORD YOUNG.—I am not of opinion that the magistrates may not lawfully make a bye-law against loitering in the streets. I have no doubt that with regard to licensed carriages, such as cabs and omnibuses, the magistrates and the police may prevent their drivers loitering with them in the streets. I think the drivers of private carriages also may be prevented from impeding the traffic by loitering in the street—stopping to chat with other drivers, gossiping, and idling. If the charge here had been that the driver was idly stopping to chat or smoke with a friend, the police might have interfered and ordered him to get on; they might have told him that loitering was forbidden and that he was loitering, and if he had refused to comply, might have had him prosecuted quite properly. But the driver here was not loitering. He was going along the street picking up passengers, in the lawful performance of his lawful duty for which he was employed. I put this question for consideration, whether the magistrates would have power to prevent 'buses going along the streets more than once for the purpose of picking up passengers, and not in course of their journey from one place to another? Should a bye-law to that effect now be made, its legality will be tested when a case under it arises. But no such bye-law has yet been made. The only thing forbidden is loitering. The Magistrate has stated the case with great fairness and propriety. He adds, and very properly, that no inconvenience was caused by what this driver did. I am expressing no dis-approbation of what the magistrates have done in making this bye-law. I simply hold that here there has been no valid conviction under it. Omnibuses may without loitering be driven along Princes Street, not only for the convenience of people going from one end of the street to another, but also for the convenience of people going to Roslin or elsewhere to which omnibuses may lawfully take them.

No. 4.
Oct. 25, 1895.
Fairfoul v. Somerville.

LORD TRAYNER.—I confine myself strictly to answering the questions which have been put to us. These questions are (1) Is the complaint competent or relevant? (2) Do the facts proved warrant a conviction? I have great doubt as to the relevancy of the complaint. I have no doubt that the facts proved do not warrant the conviction.

THE COURT pronounced the following judgment:—"Answer the second question in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern."

HUTTON & JACK, Solicitors—THOMAS HUNTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 5.
Nov. 2, 1895.
Bremridge v. Hume.

RICHARD BREMRIDGE (Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868), Appellant.—Salvesen—T. B. Morison.
WILLIAM HUME, Respondent.—D. Dundas.

Statutory Offence—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 121), secs. 1 and 15—Chemist—"Scientific instrument maker and technical chemist" assumed as designation by person not on the register.—The Pharmacy Act, 1868, sec. 1, enacts that it shall be unlawful for any person "to assume or use the title 'chemist and druggist,' or chemist or druggist, or pharmacist, or dispensing chemist or druggist in any part of Great Britain unless such person shall be a pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be registered under this Act."

Held that the use of the title "scientific instrument maker and technical chemist" by a person who had not the statutory qualification was a contravention of the Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

WILLIAM HUME, 1 Lothian Street, Edinburgh, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh upon a complaint at the instance of Richard Bremridge, 17 Bloomsbury Square, London, Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868, in name and by authority of the council of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. The complaint set forth (1) that the accused was guilty of an offence within the meaning of the 1st and 15th sections * of the Pharmacy Act,

* The Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 121), enacts,—"Whereas it is expedient for the safety of the public that persons keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons, and persons known as chemists and druggists, should possess a competent practical knowledge of their business, and to that end that from and after the day herein named all persons not already engaged in such business should before commencing such business be duly examined as to their practical knowledge, and that a register should be kept as herein provided. . . ."

Section 1. "From and after the 31st day of December 1868 it shall be unlawful for any person to sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons, or to assume or use the title 'chemist and druggist,' or chemist or druggist, or pharmacist, or dispensing chemist or druggist, in any part of Great Britain unless such person be a pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be

No. 5.

Nov. 2, 1895.
Bremridge v. Hume.

1868, in so far as he "not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of the said Act. . . . on or about the 13th day of June 1895 did, unlawfully and contrary to the 1st and 15th sections of the said recited Act, take, use, and exhibit the name or title 'chemist,' in so far as he did use and exhibit, or caused to be used and exhibited, the name or title 'chemist' or 'technical chemist' on and in connection with a printed advertisement or price-list issued by him to the public, whereby he became liable in a penalty of £5 sterling."

The Sheriff-substitute (Sym) assoilzied the accused.

The complainer obtained a case. The following facts were stated:—"(1) The respondent is not on the register established under the Pharmacy Acts. (3) A circular or advertisement issued by the respondent at the time libelled designs him as a 'scientific instrument maker and technical chemist.' (4) It was admitted that the respondent has a thorough knowledge of chemistry. The respondent explained to me that he did not undertake to dispense drugs or compound prescriptions. His contention was that the word 'chemist' is capable of construction according to the circumstances and the context in which it is used, and that he used the term 'scientific instrument maker and technical chemist' with the view of distinguishing himself from a dispensing 'chemist.' He claimed a right to do so."

The question of law was,—"Did the respondent, by designing himself as a scientific instrument maker and technical chemist, infringe sections 1 and 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868?"

Argued for the appellant;—The accused had contravened the Act, which contained a universal prohibition against the use of the name "chemist." The qualification assumed did not save him.[1] The Act was passed in the interest of the public. Its object was not only to prevent mistakes, but to check and prevent crime. In the accused's shop the most dangerous poisons might be sold without trace of their source or destination. Such terms as "export and shipping chemist," "analytical chemist," and "botanical chemist," had been penalised in English County Courts.[2] The danger lay in the use of the word "chemist" over a shop where poisons in their pure state were sold,[1] and purchasers there would be served by a person who though a chemist had not the qualification required by the Act, and did not keep a register of poisons sold. It was not maintained that the registered under this Act, and conform to such regulations as to the keeping, dispensing, and selling of such poisons as may from time to time be prescribed by the Pharmaceutical Society with the consent of the Privy Council."

---

Section 15. "From and after the 31st day of December 1868 any person who shall sell or keep an open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons, or who shall take, use, or exhibit the name or title of chemist and druggist, or chemist or druggist, not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or chemist and druggist . . . shall for every such offence be liable to pay a penalty of £5."

[1] Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons v. Robinson, L. R. [1892], 1 Q. B. D. 557.

[2] The Pharmaceutical Society v. Wright, April 3, 1882, Q. B. D. (unreported). "Shipping Druggist"; the Pharmaceutical Society v. Kelsal, Nov. 10, 1882, Stockport County Court (Judge Hughes), "Analytical Chemist"; the Pharmaceutical Society v. Hudspith, Jan. 17, 1887, Durham County Court, "Botanic Chemist."

No. 5.

Nov. 2, 1895.
Bremridge v. Hume.

term chemist was only applicable to a person qualified under the Acts. It was enough to state that a retailer of poisons could not call himself chemist unless he fulfilled the provisions of the Act.

Argued for the respondent;—The prosecution proceeded on a misapprehension of the Act. The object of the Act was to guard the public from unqualified persons, but the accused, though not a pharmacist, was a skilled chemist. The question lay between the definitions of pharmacy and chemistry. He never had kept poisons suitable for prescriptions. His business was to supply chemicals for purposes pertaining to mechanical arts. His description of himself was no more than the truth, and he was entitled to the description, because it gave to his business its appropriate status.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—I have felt the decision of this case to be attended with difficulty, but I have come to be of opinion that the appeal should be sustained.

The statute which the respondent is charged with having contravened was passed "for the safety of the public," and forbade anyone keeping open shop for, inter alia, the retailing of poisons, or assuming or using the title of "chemist," unless qualified and registered as the statute provides. The respondent has assumed and uses, both as a sign over his shop door and on his trade circular or advertisement, the title of "technical chemist," but he maintains that the title of chemist so qualified, taken along with the fact that in direct connection therewith he designs himself as a "scientific instrument maker," is not within the statutory prohibition. I think it is. The respondent uses the title of "chemist," and that in connection with premises in which, according to his advertisement, poisons are sold in small quantities, and the public, for whose safety and protection the Act was passed, are more likely than not to regard the title "chemist" without paying any attention, or perhaps understanding, the qualification of "technical." That the prefixing of a qualifying adjective to the title "chemist" or "druggist" does not take the person using such title out of the statutory prohibition has been decided in England, where "botanical chemist" and "shipping druggist" have been treated as contraventions of the statute, the persons using these titles not having the statutory qualifications or right to assume the title of "chemist" or "druggist." Had these English decisions been to a contrary effect I would not have dissented from them; they would then, I must admit, have been more in accordance with the inclination of my own mind. I am, however, not questioning their soundness, and it is not desirable that an imperial statute should be interpreted differently in different parts of the kingdom. I am prepared to follow them, and decide accordingly against the respondent. In doing so, I am doing the respondent no wrong, or even putting him to any serious inconvenience, while I am, I think, only affording to the public the protection which the statute intended the public to have.

I think the question put to us should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I appreciate the difficulty which Lord Trayner has felt with regard to this case, and indeed I felt it so strongly that the inclination

No. 5.
Nov. 2, 1895.
Bremridge v. Hume.

of my own opinion would have been not to interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

I do not, however, dissent from the judgment proposed by Lord Trayner.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no vote in this Court unless there is a difference of opinion, and I do not understand that Lord Young dissents from the judgment of the Court. I may, however, be allowed to say that I entirely concur with the opinion of Lord Trayner. I think the case is fairly struck at by the Act, and even apart from the English decisions my opinion would have been to the same effect.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the question stated in the case in the affirmative: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge in respect of which the case has been stated: Find no expenses due, and decern."

P. MORISON, S.S.C.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6.
Nov. 2, 1895.
Bremridge v. Turnbull.

RICHARD BREMRIDGE (Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868), Complainer (Appellant).—Salvesen—T. B. Morison.
J. M. TURNBULL, Respondent.—A. J. Young—Trotter.

Statutory Offence—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 121), secs. 1 and 15—Keeping open shop for retailing poisons by unregistered person—Chemist—Photographic Chemist.—The Pharmacy Act, 1868, sec. 1, enacts, that it shall be unlawful for any person "to sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons . . . unless such person shall be a pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be registered under this Act."

A dealer in photographic materials was charged with an offence under the Act, in so far as he, not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist, did at his shop unlawfully "keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons."

The following facts were proved:—That the accused had not the statutory qualification; that he had a shop open to the public for the sale of photographic materials, including some of the scheduled poisons; that his assistants were instructed to sell poisons only to persons engaged in photography or to chemists; that his trade catalogue bore that the scheduled poisons were only to be sold in wholesale quantities, but specified prices per ounce and per lb.; that an assistant in the shop on one occasion sold one ounce of one of the scheduled poisons.

In an appeal upon a case stated held that the facts stated amounted to the offence of keeping open shop for the retailing of poisons.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Trayner.

J. M. TURNBULL, 6 Rose Street, Edinburgh, was served with a complaint in the Sheriff Court, Edinburgh, by Richard Bremridge, 17 Bloomsbury Square, London, Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868, in name and by authority of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, charging him with an offence within the meaning of sections 1 and 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868,* "in so far as on 27th May 1895, he, 'not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868,' did, at his shop, 6 Rose Street, 'unlawfully and contrary to' the said sections of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, 'keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons,' and did, inter

* Quoted supra, p. 9, note.

No. 6.

Nov. 2, 1895.
Bremridge v. Turnbull.

alios, sell by retail to Alexander Spence, residing at 133 High Street, Linlithgow, a poison, within the meaning of the said recited Act, to wit, a quantity of perchloride of mercury, being a preparation of 'corrosive sublimate,' whereby the respondent became liable in a penalty of £5 sterling."

Turnbull pleaded not guilty. Evidence was led, and the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) found the charge not proven. On the complainer's motion the Sheriff-substitute stated a case on appeal, which set forth the following facts:—"The respondent is not on the register of chemists established under the Pharmacy Acts, nor is any assistant in the shop after mentioned on said register. The respondent occupies and keeps a shop at 6 Rose Street, Edinburgh, which was open to the public on 27th May 1895, and other days during the period libelled. He is a dealer in the articles used in photography at the said shop. . . .

"Some of the articles used in photography are poisonous chemical substances, certain of which are scheduled as poisons in the Pharmacy Acts. A trade circular produced by the respondent (in which he is designed as 'photographic chemist') bears that he does not sell the poisons enumerated in the Pharmacy Acts except in wholesale quantities.* His assistants are instructed only to sell those poisons to persons engaged in photography or to chemists, and on some occasions other persons have been refused these poisons on offering to buy them. On 27th May, Alexander Spence, designed in the complaint, who is a qualified chemist, but was quite unknown to the respondent and his assistants, went to the respondent's shop. The respondent was absent. Spence was acting on the instructions of the Pharmaceutical Society. He asked an assistant in the shop for certain photographic 'plates,' which were worth 2s. 6d., and he also asked how corrosive sublimate was sold. He was told that it was sold at 3d. per ounce, which is the ordinary retail price of corrosive sublimate, and he said he would take one ounce. He was asked no further questions, and paid 2s. 6d. (two shillings and sixpence) for his purchases, including the said 3d. Corrosive sublimate is a poison mentioned in the schedule to the Pharmacy Act. It is a dangerous poison, even in very small quantities. Spence took the one ounce which he bought to the office of the Pharmaceutical Society, where it was analysed.

"The defence maintained to me upon the first charge was that the transaction which I have described in paragraph 2 was a 'wholesale' transaction, and did not therefore fall under the prohibition contained in the statutory provision libelled.

"I was of opinion that it was not a wholesale, but a retail transaction. But I was of opinion that while this transaction would have justified a prosecution of the assistant for the offence of 'selling poisons' without legal qualification, it did not constitute on the part of the respondent the offence of 'keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons' without legal qualification, which has been held to be a different offence.

"I therefore found the charge not proved."

---

* The trade circular containing a list of "photographic chemicals" which contained, inter alia, certain of the poisons mentioned in schedule A of the Act, had this note,—"All chemicals in this list coming under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, can only be supplied in wholesale quantities." The prices of the different articles were stated per ounce as well as per lb.

No. 6.

Nov. 2, 1895. Bremridge v. Turnbull.

The question of law was:—"(1) Did the facts which I have stated constitute on the part of the respondent the offence of keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons, contrary to sections 1 and 15 of the Pharmacy Act of 1868?"

Argued for the appellant;—One sale was enough to justify the charge.[1] A conviction of keeping open shop was competent without any sale.[2] Besides the sale, the catalogue produced proved that open shop was kept for retailing poisons. The transaction here was retail, not wholesale. Section 17 shewed that a wholesale transaction was a sale to a dealer who bought to resell; a retail transaction was a sale to a customer for his individual use. It was the treatment of the purchase by the purchaser which determined its character. Instructions to sell to particular classes of customers were immaterial. The customer might be an amateur, or he might assume a fictitious character.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff was final on facts, and the question of "open shop" was one of fact. One sale by an assistant against orders was not enough to justify conviction. The instructions were only to sell wholesale, and if these were obeyed the transactions were exempted from operation of the Act.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—With regard to this question, I differ from the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute, and would answer it in the affirmative. The shop in question was the respondent's shop, and it was certainly kept open, inter alia, for the sale of poisons in small quantities. That the actual sale in question was made by a shopman or servant does not affect the question. It was part of the shopman's duty or service to make such sales, and what he did within the ordinary scope of his employment must be regarded as the act of the respondent, his employer.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative, sustained the appeal, and reversed the determination of the inferior Judge.

P. MORISON, S.S.C.—CUTHBERT & MARCHBANK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 7.

Nov. 2, 1895. Laird v. Anderson.

ISABELLA LAIRD, Complainer.—Johnston.
WILLIAM FAIRWEATHER ANDERSON (Burgh Prosecutor, Dunbar), Respondent.—D. Dundas.

Public-House—Breach of certificate—Complaint—Inducia—Home Drummond Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58), sec. 23—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 6—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 515.—The Home Drummond Act, 1828, sec. 23, requires a complaint of breach of a publican's certificate to be served at least six free days before the diet of appearance. Under the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 6, all summary complaints must be served upon an inducia of not less than forty-eight hours. In terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 515, offences under the Public-

[1] Pharmaceutical Society v. Piper & Co., L. R., 1893, 1 Q. B. 686; Pharmaceutical Society v. Arnison, L. R., 1894, 2 Q. B. 720.

[2] Bremridge v. Tomlinson, 21 R. (Just. Cases) 46, 1 Adam, 393.

No. 7.

Nov. 2, 1895.
Laird v. Anderson.

Houses Acts for breach of certificate may be tried by police magistrates in the same way and manner in all respects as may be provided for the trial of police offences under any general or local Act in force where the offender resides, or where the offence has been committed.

Held that a complaint of breach of a publican's certificate brought under the Summary Procedure Act and the Burgh Police Act, 1892, must be served upon an inducice of six days in terms of the Home Drummond Act, 1828.

Complaint—Illegal Citation—Burgh Police Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 477.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 477, enacts,—"It shall not be competent to any party who shall appear to answer to any complaint to plead want of due citation or informality in the warrant, citation, or execution."

Where a person cited under the Burgh Police Act, 1892, upon an inducice of three days to answer to a complaint which required an inducice of six days, appeared and pleaded that she had not been duly cited, and was afterwards convicted, held that the citation being invalid the subsequent proceedings were inept.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

MRS ISABELLA LAIRD, publican, Belhaven, was served by William Fairweather Anderson, burgh prosecutor, Dunbar, with a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, and the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, charging her with a breach of certificate.

On 3d September 1895 the complaint was served with warrant by the magistrates to summon the accused to appear in answer to the complaint on the 7th September.

On 7th September the accused appeared and objected to the citation in respect that the Home Drummond Act, 1828, prescribed an inducice of six days.* The Magistrates (although this was opposed by Mrs Laird's agent), adjourned the diet till Saturday 14th September in order to consider the objection.

---

* The Home Drummond Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58), sec. 23, enacts,—"And upon complaint for breach of certificate being made, the Sheriff or bailie, or the justices to or before whom such complaint shall have been made shall grant a warrant to the officers of Court to summon the party complained against to appear at a time and place to be specified in such warrant and summons (such summons being served at least six free days before the diet of appearance) to attend the hearing of such complaint."

The Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 18, enacts,—"In the case of any person complained of for any offence against the recited Acts or this Act, excepting for breach of certificate, it shall be lawful for any Sheriff, or any one justice or magistrate, to or before whom such complaint shall have been presented, unless by the Act otherwise provided, to grant warrant for summoning the person complained of upon an inducice of not less than forty-eight hours to appear to answer such complaint at a time and place to be therein specified."

The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 6, enacts,—"On a summary complaint being laid before the Court, it shall be lawful for the Court to grant warrant to cite the respondent . . . to appear before the Court on inducice of not less than forty-eight hours."

The Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 515, enacts,—"All offences under or against the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Acts therein recited, or any of them, or of any Act or Acts amending or superseding the same, for any breach of or offence against the terms, provisions, or conditions of any certificate granted under the said Acts, or any of them, may be prosecuted and tried before and by any magistrate or magistrates of police of any burgh, officiating in any Court for the trial of

No. 7.

Nov. 2, 1895.
Laird v. Anderson.

On the 14th September the Magistrates again adjourned the diet to 21st September, and on that day they heard evidence, in respect of which they found the accused guilty of the contravention charged.

Mrs Laird brought this bill of suspension, and pleaded;—(2) The inducice on the summons was inadequate and contrary to law.

Argued for the complainer;—The inducice of the Act of 1828 had never been altered by subsequent statutes. Such a prosecution demanded fair notice and preparation for answer, for a third offence involved forfeiture. Nothing then but specific repeal would diminish the protection of accused persons. Summary trial of public-house offences, under section 26 of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, was "subject to the provisions and conditions provided in the said recited Acts or either of them." Section 18, which gave inducice of forty-eight hours, exempted complaints for breach of certificate. The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, section 6, prescribed inducice of forty-eight hours, but did not specially curtail that of the Act of 1828. Section 515 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, was silent as to inducice, so also was section 477. Thus the inducice here were too short, and the accused was not properly before the Court.

Argued for the respondent;—The Burgh Police Act, which allowed such complaints to be prosecuted in the same way as other police cases, was wide enough in its terms to apply to inducice. Besides, the accused had appeared, and, in terms of section 477, could not plead informal citation.

At advising,—

Lord Trayner.—The complainer objects to the validity of a conviction obtained against her, dated 21st September last, proceeding upon a complaint at the instance of the respondent, charging the complainer with a breach of her certificate as a publican, and consequently of a contravention of the Public-Houses Acts. She objects to the conviction on various grounds, and, inter alia, on the ground that she had not been duly cited to answer the complaint brought against her. The fact is that the complainer was cited on an inducice of forty-eight hours, while according to her contention she could only legally be called to answer to the complaint on an inducice of six days. This objection was stated to the Magistrate when the complaint was called before him. He does not from the minute of procedure appear to have dealt with the objection at all. He neither sustained nor repelled it, but simply adjourned the diet. This was irregular certainly. The objection once stated should have been disposed of one way or another. After a second adjournment (neither of the adjournments were at the request police offences under the provisions of any local or general Police Act, in the same way and manner in all respects as may be provided for the trial of police offences by any such local or general Police Act in force in the county, district, burgh, or place where the offender shall reside, or the offence shall have been committed, and such magistrate or magistrates shall have power to impose the penalties and punishments, and declare the forfeitures provided in that behalf by the said Public-Houses Acts, or any of them."

---

Section 477 provides,—"It shall not be competent to any party who shall appear to answer to any complaint to plead want of due citation or informality in the warrant, citation, or execution."

of the present complainer) the magistrate heard evidence and pronounced the judgment now complained of.

By the Act of 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 23, it is provided that anyone charged with the offence with which the present complainer was charged shall be summoned before the sheriff, bailie, or justices of the peace to answer thereto, "such summons being served at least six free days before the diet of appearance." It is not disputed, and at all events I think it clear, that if that statutory provision is still in force the present complainer was illegally brought before the Magistrate, and that never having been legally brought before him, the whole procedure subsequent to the first diet of compearance was inept. We have nothing here of the nature of waiver or acquiescence on the part of the complainer, because at the outset of the proceedings her objection was distinctly stated and never departed from. The adjournments of the diet, as I have said, were not made at her request or with her concurrence; they were made, so far as appears, ex proprio motu of the Magistrate, and in the first instance against the express objection of the complainer. The respondent, however, maintains that the citation objected to was quite regular, in respect the complaint against the present complainer was brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, by section 6 of which it is provided that, under the complaints there referred to, the person complained of may be cited to appear on an inducie of not less than forty-eight hours, which inducie was given in the present case. I am not prepared to sustain that contention. It appears to me that the section of the Summary Procedure Act just referred to was intended to provide for all complaints brought under that Act, the procedure in which was not specially provided for by some other statute, but was not intended to refute or supersede special directions given or provisions made by another statute with regard to the procedure to be followed in any complaint made or raised on account of a contravention thereof. In this connection it is important to observe that while by the Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862, the inducie on all complaints for any offence against that Act or the Act of 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, was fixed at not less than forty-eight hours, complaints for breach of certificate were specially excepted, and the inducie for such complaints consequently remained as originally fixed at not less than six free days. This shews that in any complaint for breach of certificate the six days' inducie was considered necessary or proper, and such complaint was in that respect to be treated differently from all other complaints based upon other contraventions of the Public-House Acts. I am therefore of opinion that the proper inducie not having been given in the case before us, the complainer was never legally convened before the Magistrate at all, and that the whole proceedings, including the conviction, were inept. As that is a sufficient ground for setting aside the conviction complained of, it is unnecessary to consider the other objections which have been stated to it.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 8.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Moffat v. Shaw.

ALEXANDER JAMES HARDY MOFFAT, Complainer.—Cullen.
JOHN SHAW (Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Kilbarchan), Respondent.—A. S. D. Thomson.

Sentence—Separation of competent portion of sentence from incompetent—Warrant to recover penalty by poinding—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), secs. 18 and 25.—The Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 18, enacts that persons guilty of the offences therein specified should be liable in a money penalty, and failing payment to imprisonment. Section 25 enacts that it shall be lawful for the Sheriff upon conviction for such offence to decern and adjudge the offender to pay the penalty incurred, with expenses, and to grant warrant for imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months until such penalty and expenses should be paid.

A conviction and sentence of a contravention of the above Act sentenced the accused to payment of a fine and expenses, and continued,—"And in default of immediate payment thereof, grants warrant for recovery of the said sums by poinding of his goods and effects, and summary sale thereof on the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding, without further notice or warrant, and appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within eight days from this date, under certification of imprisonment for the period of ten days in default of payment or recovery of the said sums, with the expenses of diligence, before the time allowed for such report."

In a suspension the prosecutor admitted that the warrant for poinding was ultra vires, but maintained that, quoad ultra, the sentence was valid and ought to be upheld.

The Court suspended the conviction simpliciter, holding that it was impossible to separate the warrant to poind from the remainder of the sentence so as to leave a sentence which was valid in terms of the Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Trayner.

ON 1st October 1895 Alexander James Hardy Moffat, residing at St George's Terrace, Bridge of Weir, was convicted in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, at the instance of the Inspector of Poor of the parish of Kilbarchan, of a contravention of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, the conviction and sentence being in the following terms:—"In respect of the judicial confession of the said Alexander James Hardy Moffat, convicts the said Alexander James Hardy Moffat of the offence charged, and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay the sum of ten shillings sterling of modified penalty, with the sum of twenty shillings of expenses, payable to the prosecutor, to be applied as law directs, and in default of immediate payment thereof, grants warrant for recovery of the said sums by poinding of his goods and effects, and summary sale thereof on the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding, without further notice or warrant, and appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within eight days from this date, under certification of imprisonment for the period of ten days in default of payment or recovery of the said sums, with the expenses of diligence, before the time allowed for such report."

Moffat brought a suspension, in which he pleaded;—The suspension sought should be granted in respect that the warrant to poind and sell contained in the sentence is illegal and incompetent.*

* The Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108), sec. 18, enacts that if any person refuses to allow the operation of vaccination to be performed in terms of the Act, or if the parent or other person having

No. 8.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Moffat v. Shaw.

Argued for the complainer;—The sentence was plainly incompetent as it stood, and it was not within the class of cases in which an incompetent sentence was held valid quoad such portion as was competent, on the ground that that portion was separable from the incompetent portion. The respondent was in this dilemma:—If the whole sentence from the words "and in default of immediate payment" to the end were held as deleted, then there remained only a sentence imposing a money penalty with expenses, and that was not the sentence which the Act required, and so was incompetent on that ground. It was nothing to the purpose that such a sentence might be less onerous than the statutory sentence; the duty of the Judge was to pronounce the sentence required by the Act, neither more nor less. If, on the other hand, only the words referring to poinding were deleted there would no doubt remain a sentence of imprisonment, but not the sentence of imprisonment which the Sheriff-substitute had imposed, for under his sentence imprisonment was conditional on the failure to recover by poinding, not only the penalty and the expenses of the conviction, but also the expenses of the diligence. Such a change would not be the deletion of an incompetent portion of a sentence, but the substitution of a new sentence for that actually imposed.

Argued for the respondent;—It was not disputed that quoad the warrant to poind, the sentence could not stand. It was settled, however, that where a sentence was in part valid and in part invalid the valid portion, if separable from the remainder, might stand, although the remainder was suspended.[1] That principle applied here. If the whole sentence from the words "and in default of immediate payment" were deleted, the sentence, so far as it went, became perfectly valid; no doubt there was no alternative of imprisonment, which the statute contemplated there should be, but it was not for the complainer to object to the absence of that. Further, by merely deleting all reference to poinding, there would remain a bare sentence of imprisonment, to which per se no objection could be stated.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—There is no doubt that in this case a mistake has been made by inserting in the sentence a warrant for the recovery of the penalty and expenses by the civil diligence of poinding and sale, which is not authorised by the statute founded on, and counsel for the respondent frankly admitted that unless he could separate the sentence into indepencharge of any child, refuses to allow such operation to be performed on the child, "he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding ten days."

---

Section 25 enacts that all penalties imposed by the Act may be recovered by summary complaint in writing to the Sheriff at the instance of the inspector of the poor, "and it shall be lawful for the Sheriff to convict the offender, and upon such conviction, to decern and adjudge the offender to pay the penalty incurred, as well as such expenses as the Sheriff shall think fit, and to grant warrant for imprisoning the offender until such penalty and expenses shall be paid: Provided always that such warrant shall specify the amount of such penalty and expenses, and shall also specify a period at the expiration of which the party shall be discharged, notwithstanding such penalty or expenses shall not have been paid, and shall in no case exceed two months."

[1] Snaddon v. Spence, June 30, 1862, 4 Irv. 200; Stuart v. Macniven, Feb. 27, 1891, 2 White, 627, 18 R. (Just. Cases) 36.

No. 8.

Jan. 8, 1896. Moffat v. Shaw.

dent parts the conviction could not stand. I am of opinion that this is not a case where we can uphold one part of the Sheriff's judgment while we quash the other as unwarranted. The Sheriff here has a statutory duty to perform. The complaint proceeds upon a certain statute, and that statute lays down the course to be followed when the accused has been convicted of an offence. The Statute 26 and 27 Vict. c. 108, sec. 18, after providing that the penalty for such offence shall be a fine not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment imprisonment for not more ten days, in a subsequent section (sec. 25) provides that it shall be lawful to the Sheriff, upon conviction, "to decern and adjudge the offender to pay the penalty incurred as well as such expenses as the Sheriff shall think fit, and to grant warrant for imprisoning the offender until such penalty and expenses shall be paid: Provided always that such warrant shall specify the amount of such penalty and expenses, and shall also specify a period at the expiration of which the party shall be discharged, notwithstanding such penalty or expenses shall not have been paid, and shall in no case exceed two months." There are thus two things which the Sheriff's sentence must do; it must name the amount of the penalty and expenses to be paid, and a time during which the accused may be imprisoned on failure to pay these sums. It may be that the Sheriff in his discretion may make the sums to be paid and the term of imprisonment almost illusory, but he must pronounce a sentence with those two elements in it.

The only remaining question then is, whether we can find such a sentence here separable from that part of the judgment which grants warrant of poinding and sale. For I have no doubt whatever that if in a sentence which contains one part which is legal and competent there is further a part which it was outwith the power of the Sheriff to pronounce, then we have it in our power to uphold the competent part, and quash the part which was ultra vires of the Sheriff. That has been decided in a variety of cases, and I require only to refer to one in which the Sheriff, in sentencing a man found guilty of the crime of perjury, pronounced a sentence of imprisonment, and added a decerniture of infamy which a Sheriff could not by law pronounce. In that case this Court held that it could competently quash the sentence of infamy, and leave that of imprisonment standing.[1] In the present case the judgment of the Sheriff convicts the accused and sentences him to pay a fine of 10s. and 20s. of expenses, and then follows the part which it is maintained is separable, viz., "and in default of immediate payment thereof, grants warrant for recovery of the said sums by poinding of his goods and effects, and summary sale thereof on the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding without further notice or warrant, and appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within eight days from this date." Then follows the warrant for imprisonment in these terms,—"Under certification of imprisonment for the period of ten days in default of payment or recovery of the said sums, with the expenses of diligence, before the time allowed for such report." Now, here the default in payment of the penalty and expenses of [1] See Roberts v. Henderson, Oct. 25, 1882, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 5, 5 Coup. 118.

No. 8.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Moffat v. Shaw.

process is coupled with default in payment of the expenses of diligence, and the imprisonment is coupled with failure to pay all these before the time allowed for reporting the execution of the diligence. The part of the sentence relating to imprisonment cannot therefore be fairly read as separable from that relating to the poinding. It may be possible to form a sentence which would read grammatically if we were to strike out all words referring to the poinding, but that is not enough. It is a mere accident that we can thus get a grammatical sentence, and what we do get would not be the sentence of imprisonment pronounced by the Sheriff. These two parts of the Sheriff's sentence are so mixed up together that it is not for us to pick out the one from the other. They must therefore stand or fall together, and as that would leave a sentence which does not contain all the statutory requirements, I move your Lordships to quash the conviction.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. The objection taken is clearly one of substance, and not merely of form. In the enforcement of the penalty the statute requires that the more humane and more effective alternative of imprisonment for a short period should be adopted in preference to the civil remedy of poinding, which might be ruinous to a poor man. The policy of the Legislature is illustrated by the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, whereby power is given to the Sheriff or Magistrate to modify the penalty, and to prescribe payment by instalments, the intention being that the Sheriff should not impose on a working-man a higher penalty than he would be able to pay without unnecessary hardship to his family. Now, when the statute authorises imprisonment as the only remedy for wilful refusal to pay the penalty, excluding the civil process of poinding and sale, which might result in the breaking-up of the defender's home, the defender is very well entitled to come here and object to the validity of a warrant for poinding. The whole conviction and sentence in this case therefore falls, because I am unable to see how we can separate the warrant for poinding from the parts of the sentence which are accordant with the statute.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. I only desire in addition to emphasise the point that the warrant in this case is distinctly in excess of that authorised by the statute. The accused is not only decerned to pay the fine and expenses of process in terms of the statute, but is also found liable in the expenses of a diligence, which the statute has never authorised to be used, and of the expenses of which it therefore says nothing. I agree that the unwarrantable part of the sentence is not separable from the rest.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Pass the bill, suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter: Find the complainer entitled to expenses, both in this Court and in the inferior Court," &c.

DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 9.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Simpson v. Proctor.

WILLIAM SIMPSON, Appellant.—Clyde.
GEORGE PROCTOR (Burgh Prosecutor, Keith), Respondent.—Ingram.

Public Health—Slaughter-houses—Place of deposit for carcases of horses—Licence—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 285.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 285, enacts,—"It shall not be lawful to use any place within the burgh for the slaughtering of horses, or as a place of deposit for the carcases of the animals, unless and until every such place is licensed by the Commissioners."

The proprietor of premises within a burgh, which were not licensed in terms of the above section, appealed against a conviction of having used the premises as a place of deposit for the carcase of a horse, in contravention of the section. It was proved that the appellant carried on the business of horse slaughterer in premises beyond the boundaries of the burgh. On the occasion libelled the carcase of a horse belonging to the appellant had been conveyed into the burgh from a farm about twenty-three miles distant, and was left for the night in his unlicensed premises within the burgh. Next morning the carcase was taken to the appellant's premises outside the burgh. The carcase was so deposited with the knowledge of the appellant, and in accordance with his general instructions. The carcases of other horses had on previous dates been so deposited when carried a long way, or when it was late.

The Court sustained the appeal, holding that the facts stated as proved did not in law justify a conviction.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren) that a different result might have been reached if it had been proved that the appellant used the premises within the burgh as a place where carcases were kept for a considerable time or in considerable numbers.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Trayner.

ON 28th October 1895 William Simpson, manure manufacturer, Douglasbrae, near Keith, was charged in the Police Court at Keith on a complaint at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, setting forth that the accused "did, on the 23d and 24th days of October 1895, use a close at the rear of his premises in Fife Street, Fife-Keith, aforesaid, as a place of deposit for the carcase of a horse, said place not being licensed by the Commissioners of Police for the burgh of Keith," contrary to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 285.*

Simpson pleaded not guilty, but was convicted, and was dismissed with an admonition.

He obtained a case. The case set forth the following facts as proved:—"(1) That the appellant was manager of William Simpson & Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862, who carry on the business of horse slaughterers at their licensed premises at Douglasbrae,† a place near Keith, but beyond the boundaries

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 278 to 287, are headed collectively "Slaughter-houses," and section 285 is in these terms:—"It shall not be lawful to use any place within the burgh for the slaughtering of horses, or as a place of deposit for the carcases of the animals, unless and until every such place is licensed by the Commissioners, who are hereby authorised to give and recall such licence at pleasure, and it shall not be lawful to carry or convey within the burgh any dead horse unless in a covered cart or waggon, or unless the dead carcase be sufficiently covered; and any person who shall offend against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10, and a further penalty not exceeding £2 for every day on which such offence shall continue."

† These premises were licensed under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92).

No. 9.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Simpson v. Proctor.

of the burgh of Keith; that on 23d October 1895 a dead horse belonging to the said William Simpson & Company, Limited, was conveyed from the farm of Balnoon, Forgue, a distance of twenty-three miles, by George Morrison, carter in the employment of the said William Simpson & Company, Limited, and residing at Fife Street, Fife-Keith, in a cart belonging to the said William Simpson & Company, Limited, and having a cover thereon, to the premises in Fife Street, Fife-Keith, belonging to the said Limited Company, and deposited within a cart-shed in a close there, and kept there in said cart from 8 P.M. on said 23d October until 7 A.M. the next morning, when it was removed to the Douglasbrae premises.

"(2) That the said dead horse was deposited with the knowledge of the appellant, and in accordance with the general instructions given by the appellant, as manager of said Limited Company, to the said George Morrison.

"(3) That the carcases of other horses had, on previous dates, been so deposited, when carried a long way or when late.

"(4) That the said premises in Fife Street, Fife-Keith, are situated within the burgh of Keith, and are not licensed for the slaughtering of horses or the deposit of their carcases."

The following was the question of law stated:—"Whether the facts stated as proved constitute an offence, and justify the conviction, on a right view of the law applicable to them?"

Argued for the appellant;—The section did not apply to the facts here found proved. "Place of deposit" for the carcases of horses meant a place habitually used for the purpose of depositing the carcases of horses in numbers at a time. All that had been proved was that on the occasion in question, and on some previous occasions, the appellant had used the premises within the burgh as a place for leaving carcases of horses which had been carried a long way, or when it was late. The carcases were truly in transitu, and the branch of the section which required to be complied with was that relating to the carriage of dead horses, not that relating to places of deposit. It was not suggested that leaving the carcase for the night in the premises within the burgh constituted a public nuisance, but if that question had been raised it would be a question under the Public Health Act.

Argued for the respondent;—It might be conceded that an isolated instance of leaving the carcase of a horse in a place within the burgh would not constitute that place a place of deposit in the meaning of the Act; but the case here proved was something very different. The facts shewed that the appellant was in the habit of leaving the carcases of horses at this place within the burgh whenever it suited his convenience to do so. It was, in short, a regular adjunct of his other establishment, and as such was a place of deposit within the meaning of the Act. The statute ought to be liberally construed, for it was in the public interest that places where dead horses were habitually left should be under police control.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal against a conviction following on a complaint by which the appellant is charged with using a close at the rear of his premises in the burgh of Keith as a place of deposit for the carcase of a horse, said place not being licensed by the Police Commissioners, contrary to section 285 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892. The case is brought here under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, and it does not shew any very material interest in the parties concerned, as the appellant, although convicted of the contravention with which he was charged, was dismissed with an admonition. Neither is there any general question of law submitted for our consideration. The only question stated is,—"Whether the facts stated as proved constitute an offence, and justify the conviction, on a right view of the law applicable to them?" I suppose that means that we are to put ourselves in the position of the magistrates and say whether their decision was right. I should like to reserve my opinion on the question whether magistrates are bound to state a case for the Appeal Court when the only question is whether the conviction was properly arrived at upon the evidence. But such a case is often stated, and here the parties are agreed in desiring our judgment.

No. 9.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Simpson v. Proctor.

The point in the case is, whether, under the provision in the Burgh Police Act, to which I am about to refer, the temporary stoppage of a carcase of a horse at an unlicensed place constitutes a deposit of the carcase. The clause, it should be observed, occurs in a subdivision of the Act of Parliament which is headed "Slaughter-houses." Among the clauses thus headed is the 285th section, which provides that "it shall not be lawful to use any place within the burgh for the slaughtering of horses, or as a place of deposit for the carcases of the animals, unless and until every such place is licensed by the Commissioners, who are hereby authorised to give and recall such licence at pleasure, and it shall not be lawful to carry or convey within the burgh any dead horse unless in a covered cart or waggon, or unless the said carcase be sufficiently covered." The section goes on to provide the penalty for contravention. Now, I think that the place referred to in that section is a place in which animals are to be placed either when they have been slaughtered, or when they are brought there to be slaughtered, or to be disposed of as slaughtered animals are usually treated. It is clear that what is meant is a place of deposit which is used as an adjunct to the slaughter-house. The section I have just read deals with the question of the conveyance of dead horses, so that we have both cases dealt with, the case of conveyance and the case of deposit. In the latter case a licence is required, in the former all that is necessary is that the cart or the carcase should be covered. There is no other restriction applicable to the case of transit.

Now, on the facts as stated here, the carcase was on its way from the farm where the horse died to a manure establishment, and the deposit in Keith was merely for a temporary purpose, because it was too late in the evening to proceed further. It does not, in my judgment, affect the question that the same thing had been done before. It would, however, affect my judgment very materially if it were proved that the appellant was using a place within the burgh as a place where animals were kept for a considerable time, or in considerable numbers—if, in short, the appellant was using a place within the town as a place of deposit or adjunct to his slaughter-house. Nothing that we decide will affect such a case.

But I do not understand that the facts here stated were intended to raise such a case, but rather to raise the question whether it is lawful to leave a dead horse, while in transit, in a place that is unlicensed. On the facts as stated I think that the conviction cannot be sustained.

No. 9.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Simpson v. Proctor.

It has, indeed, been suggested that the enactment ought to be interpreted liberally in order to further the object of the Act, which is the maintenance of the public health. But in construing a statute which contains 518 sections I cannot readily assume that anything has been left out for the sake of brevity which we are entitled to supply, and as the offence charged does not come within the words of the statute I think the conviction ought to be quashed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordship in holding that this appeal ought to be sustained. I do not think that the section on which the complaint is founded is at all applicable to the facts stated to us here.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the question in the case in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses, which modify to ten guineas," &c.

CHARLES GEORGE, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MUSTARD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 10.

Jan. 8, 1896.
M'Vean v. Jameson.

MALCOLM M'VEAN, Appellant.—Abel.
ANDREW JAMESON, Respondent.—Cook.

Procedure—Appeal—Case stated—Competency—Time—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3.—Applications under section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, to the inferior Judge to state a case for appeal, must be made within the three days provided by that section, even where the last of the three days is a Sunday.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Trayner.

ON Thursday 24th October 1895 Malcolm M'Vean, ploughman, Ballagan, Strathblane, was, on the complaint of Andrew Jameson of Leddriegreen, convicted by the Sheriff-substitute at Stirling (Buntine), of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68) on the lands of Leddriegreen, and fined 20s. with expenses.

On Monday 28th October M'Vean applied to the Sheriff-substitute to state a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875. A case was stated, but under protest that it was incompetent on the ground that the application to the Sheriff-substitute to state a case had not been made within three days of the conviction in terms of section 3 of the Act.*

* The Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3, enacts,—"On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst, by himself or his agent applying in writing within three days after such determination to the inferior Judge to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination, for the opinion thereon of a superior Court of law, as hereinafter provided; and on any such application being made, the following provisions shall have effect:—

"1. The appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated and delivered to him unless within the said three days he shall—(1) Lodge in the hands of the Clerk of Court a bond with sufficient cautioner for answering and abiding by the judgment of the superior Court in the appeal, and paying the costs should any be awarded by that Court, or otherwise, in the discretion

No. 10.

Jan. 8, 1896. M'Vean v. Jameson.

At the hearing on the appeal the respondent insisted in the objection to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The application to have a case stated was made more than three days after the determination of the Sheriff-substitute, and therefore was too late. In point of fact the bond of caution had also been lodged too late, as it was not lodged until 2d November, but the respondent did not insist in that objection, as the bond of caution had been received on the understanding that it would be regarded as timeous if the Court were of opinion that the notice was timeous. It was settled in England, on the construction of similar statutes, that Sunday was to be computed as one of the days for giving notice, even although it was the last day.[1] In Scotland too it had been held that Sunday was to be counted in the matter of consignation, if at least it was not the last of the three days, for if it was the last it rather appeared that consignation on the following Monday would be in time, consignation being an act requiring the concurrence of the Clerk of Court.[2] Sending an application was different; that a party could do of his own motion, and he might use the post on Sunday, which would be a sufficient compliance with the Act.[3] When the last of the days of grace fell on a Sunday, a bill was due and payable on the Saturday preceding.[4]

Argued for the appellant;—The application for a case stated was timeous here. The statute required three things to be done, viz.,—sending an application to the Sheriff for a case, finding caution or consigning in the hands of the Clerk of Court, and paying the Clerk's fees. The respondent practically admitted that the two latter conditions would be timeously fulfilled if performed on the Monday, and the same rule ought to apply to the sending of the application to have a case stated.[5]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The competency of this appeal turns upon the question whether if the last of three days allowed by statute for performing a statutory act be a Sunday, and the act itself might have been performed by the litigant either upon the Saturday or upon the Sunday, the requirement of the statute is met by the performance of the act upon the Monday.

Where a document requires to be lodged in the hands of the Clerk of Court at his office, it is matter of decision that where the last day allowed for the lodging happened to fall on Sunday, then it was sufficient if it were done on the Monday. But on the other hand abundant authority was quoted from the bar indicating that where a mere notice requires to be given, as in this case, a Sunday falling within the days within which notice must be given is to be counted, and it is no answer to the objection of "no of the inferior Judge, shall consign in the hands of the Clerk of Court such sum as may be fixed by the inferior Judge to meet the penalty awarded, if any, and the said costs of the superior Court; (2) pay the Clerk of Court his fees for preparing the case."

---

Then followed other provisions not necessary to be here quoted.

[1] Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, 1844, 7 Jur. 396; Peacock v. The Queen, 1858, 4 C. B. N. S.—(Scott's Reps.) 264; Rowberry v. Morgan, 1854, 9 Excheq.—(Wels., Hurls., and Gord.) 730.

[2] Hutton v. Garland, June 13, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 60, 5 Coup. 274.

[3] Charleson v. Duffes, June 10, 1881, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 34, 4 Coup. 470.

[4] Byles on Bills, 15th ed. 276.

[5] Russell v. Russell, Nov. 12, 1874, 2 R. 82; Craig v. Jex-Blake, March 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 715, 43 Scot. Jur. 363.

No. 10.

Jan. 8, 1896.
M'Vean v. Jameson.

notice" to say that the last day was a Sunday, and that notice was given on the Monday. Counsel for the appellant, however, pressed upon us that the notice of appeal required in cases like the present is to be treated as part and parcel of a set of requirements which the statute says shall be performed within three days, and that some of these requirements could not be performed on Sunday; that the lodging of caution and paying the fees of the Clerk of Court were to be performed simultaneously with the giving of the notice of appeal, and had been held to be timeously made if made on the Monday. Now, it may be quite reasonable that the lodging of caution and paying of fees on the Monday should be held to be sufficient compliance with the statute, for neither of these acts can be completed by the litigant without the co-operation of the official of Court, which cannot be obtained on Sunday. But I am unable to see that the same rule can be applied to the giving of notice of appeal, which requires no formality, and which, so far as the litigant is concerned, may be completed by the posting of a notice in the post-office on Saturday or Sunday.

It therefore seems to be quite plain that if the statute says notice shall be given within three days, and these days expire on Sunday, the notice is not duly given by being handed to the sheriff-clerk on the Monday following. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal is incompetent, and must be dismissed.

LORD M'LAREN.—When some step of judicial procedure has to be performed by the litigant within a definite number of days fixed by statute, and the last day is a Sunday, our decisions have sanctioned the completion of the step on the Monday, where the step is one which requires the co-operation of the Clerk of Court or other official, as the giving in of a report or document of any kind. These decisions would cover the necessity of finding security and paying the fees of Court. But where the act is something which the litigant can do at his own hand—where he has it in his power to complete the act so far as his own share in it is concerned without the co-operation of a second party, as in the case of the notice required—I see no reason why Sunday should be discounted. If the litigant wishes to have the full time allowed for deliberation, he may still have that, because the post-office is open to him on Sunday, and again, if he has scruples, and objects to posting a letter on Sunday, he has the option of giving his notice on the Saturday. I think that the decisions in reference to notice of dishonour of bills of exchange are in point, and they lead to the conclusion I have stated.

I am therefore of opinion that we must sustain the objection to the competency of this appeal so far as founded on the notice of appeal not having been given in due time.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on an objection stated to the timeousness of the application made to the inferior Judge to state a case, sustain said objection, dismiss the appeal, and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses," &c.

J. A. CAIRNS, S.S.C.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 11.

Jan. 8, 1896. Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate.

WILLIAM KENNEDY, Complainer.—Guy.
HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—C. N. Johnston, A.-D.

Proof.—At the trial of a butcher before a Sheriff and a jury for reset of theft of sheep, the agent for the accused proposed to prove that the man who had stolen the sheep libelled had sold other stolen sheep to other butchers who had bought in bona fide ignorance that the sheep had been stolen. In a suspension held that the Sheriff had rightly disallowed this line of evidence.

Theft—Reset—Conviction of reset on a charge of theft—Specification—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 59.—The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 59, enacts,—"Under an indictment for . . . theft . . . a person accused may be convicted of reset."

A person was tried before a Sheriff and a jury on an indictment which set forth that the accused did, "between 6th and 12th October 1895, from a field or fields on the farm of Marchhill, in the parish and county of Dumfries, belonging to John Blackley, cattle-dealer, residing there, steal" three sheep.

The jury returned this verdict,—"Find the accused guilty of reset of theft."

In a suspension, held that the conviction was not bad for want of specification.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Trayner.

ON 2d December 1895 William Kennedy, 6 Queensberry Street, Dumfries, was tried in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries before the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) and a jury, on an indictment at the instance of Her Majesty's Advocate, the charge against the accused being "(1) that you did, on 28th September 1895, in and near the burgh of Lochmaben, in the county of Dumfries, from a flock of sheep then under the charge of, and being driven by, John Burnie junior, presently a prisoner in the prison of Maxwelltown, steal two half-bred lambs; and (2) between 6th and 12th October 1895, from a field or fields on the farm of Marchhill, in the parish and county of Dumfries, belonging to John Blackley, cattle-dealer, residing there, steal a bred lamb, two cheviot ewes, and a cross-bred lamb."

The following verdict was returned:—"The jury find the first charge not proven, and upon the second charge find the accused guilty of reset of theft."

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced a sentence of six months' imprisonment.

Kennedy brought a suspension against the Lord Advocate, and Charles Steuart Phyn, the procurator-fiscal.

The complainer stated that John Burnie junior, mentioned in the indictment, had been convicted on his own confession of the theft of sheep; that the complainer "bought the animals with the theft of which he was charged from the said John Burnie junior in bona fide and in the full belief, for which he had reasonable ground, that they were the lawful property of the said John Burnie junior. On each occasion, before buying the sheep, he asked Burnie if they were his own, or if he had authority to sell them. A reply in the affirmative was given on each occasion, and this was not disproved by the prosecution at the trial. . . . . Two of the sheep which the said John Burnie junior pleaded guilty to stealing had been offered by him for sale, and had been sold by him to" A B, a butcher whom the complainer named and designed. "The said John Burnie junior had pleaded guilty to the theft of the animals, with the theft of which the complainer was in the said indictment charged."

No. 11.

Jan. 8, 1896.
Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate.

"The first witness examined by the respondent Mr Phyn for the prosecution was the said John Burnie junior. The complainer's agent proposed to prove that the said John Burnie junior had been in the habit of stealing sheep and other animals and selling them to butchers as his own. In particular he proposed to put questions to the said John Burnie junior with a view to eliciting this evidence. In particular he asked the said John Burnie junior the following questions:—'Did you sell two black faced ewes to' A B? and 'Did you tell him at that time that these ewes were your own property?' The respondent Mr Phyn objected to the questions and to this line of evidence, and the Sheriff-substitute wrongously and illegally sustained the objection."

The complainer further stated,—"The respondent Mr Phyn at the close of the evidence requested the Sheriff-substitute to charge the jury that it was competent for them to give a verdict of reset of theft. This the Sheriff-substitute did," and the jury returned the verdict above quoted. "Notwithstanding that reset of theft was not charged in the indictment, the verdict did not specify in what way or at what time and place the complainer had committed the said crime, or what things or articles he had been guilty of resetting."

The complainer pleaded;—The sentence complained of should be suspended and liberation granted, with expenses, in respect of (1) the refusal of the said Sheriff-substitute to allow competent evidence in exculpation; and (2) the verdict being disconform to the indictment and wanting in necessary specification.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The questions which had been disallowed were competent with the view of shewing that the complainer had bought the sheep in ignorance that they had been stolen, which was certainly a complete defence to a charge of reset. To prove that other butchers had in complete bona fides bought sheep from Burnie, which he had stolen, might not go very far to establish the complainer's innocence, but it was a relevant piece of evidence, and a conviction would be suspended if a competent question had been disallowed, although the Court might think that the answer might not have influenced the jury.[1] In any case the questions were competent as going to the credibility of the witness Burnie. (2) Prior to the passing of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887,* a conviction of reset upon a charge of theft was bad, and that Act in no way altered the rule that either in the indictment or in the conviction there must be a specification of the time, place, and manner of the offence. Here there was no specification at all.

The respondents were not called upon on the first point. On the second they argued that the indictment and the verdict read together contained a sufficient specification of the offence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two points in this case. The first point,

---

[1] Allison's Practice, ii. pp. 28-29, and case of Ferguson v. Lindsay, there cited.

* The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 59, enacts,—"Under an indictment for robbery, or for theft, or for breach of trust and embezzlement, or for falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, a person accused may be convicted of reset."

No. 11.

Jan. 8, 1896. Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate.

with regard to the rejection of evidence, is in certain respects peculiar. The questions which it was proposed to put could not affect the credibility of the witness, because the witness was admittedly a thief. There was thus no question of character involved, and what it was proposed to do was to prove that the witness had been in the habit of stealing sheep and selling them to butchers as his own. I am inclined to think that in general I should allow a party to put the question to a witness whether he had been convicted of a crime, but I should not allow a party to bring evidence to contradict the answer which the witness gave, because it is a well-established rule that when you ask questions of a witness in order to damage his character and therefore his credibility, you cannot bring extraneous evidence to prove that his answers to these questions were untrue. The reason of this is plain. Were it otherwise, then instead of one trial you might have four or five to ascertain the guilt or innocence of witnesses of specific crimes. In this case, however, the question would have brought the accused no further forward in his defence even if he had got an answer in the affirmative from the witness, and I have therefore no doubt that this ground of suspension must be repelled.

The second point raised was, that while the prisoner was charged with theft, he was convicted of reset of theft. This course was admittedly a competent one for the jury to take, and the Judge directed them quite properly that if they found that the prisoner had obtained the sheep knowingly from one who had stolen them, they could find him guilty of reset of theft. Some observations had been made on the form of the verdict. Now, I think that caution ought to be exercised in these cases as to the form of the verdict, because the charge is one of theft and the conviction one of reset. But here I think the verdict is quite sufficient under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. What the prisoner is charged with is the theft of certain sheep; what he is convicted of is reset of theft. You may read the indictment in the light of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, as a charge that he did reset these sheep, well knowing them to be stolen, and I think the course taken by the jury was perfectly competent, and that no exception can be taken to the verdict as recorded. I therefore move your Lordships to refuse the suspension.

Lord M'Laren.—The first objection to this conviction is, that a question which the agent for the panel proposed to ask one of the witnesses for the Crown was disallowed. I think it is impossible to read the statement of what took place without seeing that the evidence which it was proposed to obtain was that the witness had been in the habit of stealing sheep and selling them to butchers as his own. That being the object of the question, I am of opinion that the question was properly disallowed. If, however, it is said that the object of the question was to affect the credibility of the witness, I think there are two answers to be made to that. The first is, that if you read the statement of the complainer fairly it is clear that that was not the intention of the question as put. The second answer is, that, in my opinion at least, the credibility of the witness could not be affected by it. If, indeed, the witness had prevaricated as to his being a thief, the question might have been allowed. But in this case, where it was admitted he was a thief, I think the interrogation of the witness with respect to previous acts of theft was rightly disallowed.

No. 11.

Jan. 8, 1896. Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate.

On the second question I agree with your Lordship. When the effect of the verdict is to convict the prisoner of a crime of a lesser degree than that with which he is charged, I agree that it would be improper to find him guilty as libelled. It is also true that where the charge is one of theft, a verdict of reset must be in some way applied to the particular facts. A better verdict might have been to find the prisoner guilty of reset of theft, in that he received the sheep libelled knowing them to be stolen. Nevertheless, I think that the verdict as recorded, taken along with the complaint, applies the finding of the jury to the facts of the case with sufficient clearness. The test is whether the verdict as recorded is a sufficient minute of the finding of the jury to enable the Judge to pronounce sentence, and the clerk of Court to draw up the conviction. On both points I concur in holding that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with your Lordships. I think the first objection necessarily falls, because the question which it was proposed to put was quite irrelevant. As regards the second objection, I hold that the verdict was a competent and sufficient answer to the question put by the indictment, that is to say, by the indictment read in the light of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. I agree that we should refuse the suspension, though I should like to say that I think that caution is necessary in the framing of verdicts in such cases.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the bill, and decern: Find the respondents entitled to expenses," &c.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 12.

Jan. 9, 1896. Dingwall v. Davidson.

ARTHUR DINGWALL, Complainer.—W. Thomson.
ALEXANDER DAVIDSON (Procurator-Fiscal to the Justice of Peace Court, Dumfries), Respondent.—Younger.

Sentence—Conviction—Expenses—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), Schedule K, Form 3.—A conviction and sentence in the form of Schedule K, No. 3, of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, suspended, on the ground that it adjudged the accused, in default of immediate payment of the penalty imposed, to be imprisoned for fourteen days, "unless the said penalty and expenses shall be sooner paid," while no award of expenses had been pronounced against the accused.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Trayner.

ON 31st October 1895 Arthur Dingwall, horse-slaughterer, Moss-park, Dumfries, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court, Dumfries, on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused, on a date and at a place specified, did cruelly ill-treat a horse, "in contravention of the 1st section of the Act of Parliament 13 and 14 Victoria, chapter 92, entituled an 'Act for the more effectual prevention of cruelty to animals in Scotland,' whereby the said" accused is "liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and failing payment to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland)

No. 12. Jan. 9, 1896. Dingwall v. Davidson.

Act, 1881."* The complaint did not contain a prayer for expenses.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted.

The conviction was in the following terms:—"At Maxwelltown, the 31st day of October 1895 years.—The Justices, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict the said Arthur Dingwall of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudge the said Arthur Dingwall to forfeit and pay the sum of two pounds of penalty, and in default of immediate payment thereof adjudge him to be imprisoned in the prison of Maxwelltown for the period of fourteen days from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said penalty and expenses shall be sooner paid, and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend Arthur Dingwall and convey him to the said prison, and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him accordingly."

Dingwall paid the fine, and thereafter brought a suspension, pleading, inter alia,—"The question of whether or not the complainer is to suffer imprisonment depends upon his paying expenses which have not been asked for nor found due, and which have not been ascertained."†

Argued for the complainer;—The Justices had no power to find expenses due—certainly no statutory power. Section 1 of the Pre-

---

* The Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict cap. 92), sec. 1, enacts that "any person who shall from and after the passing of this Act cruelly beat, ill-treat, overdrive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, ill-treated, overdriven, abused, or tortured, any animal, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall for every such offence be liable in a penalty not exceeding £5."

† The Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92), sec. 8, enacts,—"In every case of a conviction under this Act, when the sum imposed as a penalty, together with costs (if any) awarded by any magistrate for or in respect of any offence against the provisions of this Act, shall not be paid immediately upon the conviction, or within such time as the convicting magistrate shall in the exercise of his discretion appoint and limit, it shall be lawful for such magistrate, and he is hereby required, to adjudge the offender to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two calendar months unless payment be sooner made."

The Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53) enacts (sec. 18, subsec. 3),—"In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament under which the accused is or shall be liable to forfeit a penalty, and in default of payment thereof to be imprisoned for a period limited to a certain time, at the expiration of which he shall be entitled to liberation, although the penalty has not been paid, the judgment of the Court shall be in the form No. 3 of Schedule K."

Form No. 3 of Schedule K is as follows:—"The justices [or justice, or sheriff, or magistrate], in respect of the judicial confession of the said J. K. [or of the evidence adduced], convict the said J. K. of the contravention [or offence] charged [or state to what extent he is guilty], and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay the sum of £ of penalty [or of modified penalty, where there is power to modify], [with the sum of £ of expenses, where expenses may be awarded]; and in default of immediate payment thereof [or, if time be allowed, say, within days from this date], adjudge him to be imprisoned in the prison of for the period of from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said sum [or sums] shall be sooner paid, and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend him and convey him to the said prison, and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him accordingly."

vention of Cruelty to Animals Act did not mention expenses, and section 8 assumed a power but did not confer it. But assuming that the Justices had such a power they had not here exercised it. They had not found the complainer liable in expenses, and yet according to the terms of the conviction he became liable to imprisonment unless he paid an indeterminate sum in name of expenses, which had not been found due. If he had gone to prison he could not have been released by payment of the penalty merely; the governor of the prison could only walk by his warrant; he was neither bound nor entitled to go behind it.

Argued for the respondent;—This was a case of mere clerical blunder—the blunder of not striking a pen through the printed words "and expenses" in the form of conviction used by the Justices. Such a blunder did not vitiate the conviction.[1] The complainer had suffered no prejudice, as he had paid the fine; but even if he had gone to prison and had then wished to be released on payment of the penalty, the reference to expenses would have caused no difficulty. The governor of the prison would have seen that it was a plain blunder. The true reading was "said penalty" and "said expenses," and it was clear on the face of the conviction that there were no "said expenses."

LORD TRAYNER.—A variety of objections have been taken to this conviction, with most of which I do not think it necessary to deal, because in my opinion the objection founded on the terms of the conviction with regard to the expenses is sufficient for the decision of the case. The finding of the Justices is to adjudge the accused to pay a fine of £2, "and in default of immediate payment thereof, adjudge him to be imprisoned in the prison of Maxwelltown for the period of fourteen days from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said penalty and expenses shall be sooner paid." Now, I think that the validity of that finding must be regarded as at the time at which it was pronounced, and that it is not affected by anything which afterwards took place. The statute under which it was pronounced (the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act) provides in very distinct terms that any person found guilty of a contravention of the first section thereof shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5. Under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, imprisonment is made competent on default in payment of the fine. But neither in the complaint is there any prayer for expenses, nor is there any authority for such a prayer in the statutes. Whether the magistrates had an inherent power to award expenses I do not stop to inquire, for if they had they did not exercise it. They found the prisoner liable in a penalty of £2, without any mention of expenses, and they sentenced him to be imprisoned for fourteen days unless the said penalty "and expenses" were sooner paid. That is a warrant to the keeper of the prison to detain the complainer until he has paid the penalty and expenses,—that is, until he has done something which the magistrates had no power to ordain him to do. I think that is a sufficient ground for granting this bill of suspension. It may be said that this is a mere matter of form, but in these cases where personal liberty is concerned form is substance. We cannot too jealously guard against judgments or interlocutors of [1] Gallie v. Ferguson, Nov. 21, 1883, 11 R. (Just. Cases) 13, 5 Coup. 365.

No. 12.
Jan. 9, 1896.
Dingwall v. Davidson.

inferior Courts which interfere with the liberty of the lieges or ordain them to be incarcerated in prison. I am therefore for granting the prayer of this note.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and only wish to add a sentence to prevent this judgment from being regarded as a precedent in cases under another class of penal statutes. If a statute imposes a penalty, and then authorises, as an alternative, a warrant for imprisonment, it would be quite within the scope of precedent to separate the conviction into two parts—the sentence and the warrant of imprisonment for enforcing the sentence—and to sustain the sentence, even if the warrant was radically defective. Here the sentence is perfectly good; the only mistake is that the magistrates ordain the prisoner to be kept in prison until he pays the penalty and expenses, when, as a matter of fact, no expenses had been found due. But in this case I agree with Lord Trayner that although the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act ordains no special course of procedure, yet the prosecution is under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, which contains a warrant for imprisonment as a necessary part of the conviction. The conviction would not be good without such a warrant, although if the fine is paid it may turn out to be merely a matter of form. The objection is certainly very critical, but it has been held, both here and in England, that where personal liberty is concerned form is substance, and I think this is a case for applying that principle.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. I agree with Lord M'Laren that the warrant for imprisonment is not separable from the rest of the conviction. It is difficult to suspend a conviction upon a matter of form, but on the whole I agree that this warrant is essentially illegal and that the conviction cannot stand.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter: Find the complainer entitled to expenses, which modify to ten guineas."

WHIGHAM & COWAN, S.S.C.—JOHN DOBIE, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 13.
Jan. 9, 1896.
Oliver v. London.

THOMAS PAUL OLIVER, Appellant.—Johnston—Clyde.
ALEXANDER LOUDON (Procurator-Fiscal for Justice of Peace Court, Ayr), Respondent.—W. Campbell—Hunter.

Public-House—Hotel Certificate—Contravention—Guest of bona fide Traveller—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35).—A hotelkeeper supplied two glasses of liquor on a Sunday to a bona fide traveller for the refreshment of two friends of the bona fide traveller, who were themselves neither bona fide travellers nor lodgers in the hotel. The hotelkeeper knew that the liquor was to be consumed by the friends. It was paid for by the bona fide traveller.

Held that the hotelkeeper had not committed a contravention of his certificate.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Trayner.

ON 21st October 1895 Thomas P. Oliver, hotelkeeper, Royal Hotel, Main Street, Prestwick, Ayrshire, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court at Ayr, on a complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, which set forth that the accused, "who holds a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors in said hotel, did on Sunday, 18th August 1895, sell or give out therefrom one half glass of whisky to William Dawson, coachman, residing at Orangefield Cottage, Prestwick, and one glass of beer to James Brisbane, cabdriver, residing at Main Street, Prestwick, aforesaid, the same not being for the accommodation of lodgers or travellers, contrary to his said certificate and the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862." *

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1896.
Oliver v. Loudon.

The accused was convicted and fined £1, 1s.

He obtained a case.

The case stated:—"It was proved that on the Sunday afternoon in question, the day being good, George Highland, coachman, Coodham, Ayrshire, who was a former fellow-servant of the appellant at Auchincruive, and had been on intimate friendly terms with him for ten years, walked from Coodham, which is six miles distant from Prestwick, with the express purpose of visiting the appellant and also calling at Orangefield, five miles from Coodham and one mile from Prestwick, to see the said William Dawson, also a friend of the appellant and Highland. Highland arrived at Orangefield about three o'clock, and after spending the afternoon with Dawson, the two walked to the Royal Hotel, Prestwick, a mile distant from Dawson's house, arriving there about half-past seven o'clock p.m., when the appellant entertained them to supper and refreshments as his friends and guests. After spending the evening with the appellant, Highland, about half-past nine o'clock, asked the appellant to get a pony and trap to take them home, at a posting establishment adjoining the Royal Hotel, belonging to Mr John D. Gemmell, posting-master, for whom hiring orders are left at the Royal Hotel. The appellant saw the said James Brisbane, the man in charge of the posting establishment, and gave him the order for the conveyance to Orangefield and Coodham. Brisbane, who had been driving about almost the whole day, having been at Mauchline, about ten miles distant, up to half-past six o'clock, had just come into the stables from a hire at Golf Park, Prestwick, where he had been engaged from seven o'clock, and he told the appellant he would let him know when the trap was ready. Brisbane got the trap ready in a short time and went into the hotel to intimate he was ready, when Highland, who had known Brisbane for a long time, and had been made aware that he had been driving about all day, asked if he would take a refreshment, and also offered a refreshment to Dawson, which they accepted. Accordingly Highland

---

* The Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 2, enacts that the forms of certificates contained in schedule (A) to the Act annexed should come in place of the forms in prior use.

Schedule (A) No. 1, being the "form of certificate for inns and hotels," authorises the person named in the certificate to keep the inn and hotel specified for the sale of exciseable liquor under, inter alia, the following conditions, viz:—That he "do not keep open house or permit or suffer any drinking on any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning, or after eleven of the clock at night of any day, with the exception of refreshment to travellers, or to persons requiring to lodge in the said house or premises, and do not keep open his house for the sale of exciseable liquors, or permit or suffer any drinking therein, or on the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out the same on Sunday except for the accommodation of lodgers and travellers."

No. 13.
Jan. 9, 1896.
Oliver v. London.

ordered and paid for a half glass of whisky for himself, a small whisky for Dawson, and a glass of beer for Brisbane, and the liquor was consumed in the presence of the policeman, James Kelly, who, in plain clothes, had followed Brisbane into the hotel. The appellant, who was thereupon charged with a breach of his licence certificate, replied that he bona fide thought he was within his rights, and did not think what he had done was wrong, seeing that Highland was his guest and a bona fide traveller."

The following questions of law were stated:—"(1) Whether Highland, who was a bona fide traveller, and entitled to a refreshment at said hotel for himself on the Sunday in question, but who was not a lodger therein, was entitled to entertain to exciseable liquors Dawson and Brisbane, who were not bona fide travellers or lodgers in said hotel? (2) Whether, in the circumstances above stated, the appellant was guilty of a contravention of his certificate?"

Argued for the appellant;—The holder of a hotel licence did not commit a breach of his certificate by supplying liquor to a lodger in his hotel on a Sunday, or after the hours of closing, although he knew that the liquor was for guests of the lodger who were not themselves lodgers or bona fide travellers.[1] The same principle applied to liquor supplied to the friends of a bona fide traveller. A hotelkeeper was entitled to sell a reasonable quantity of liquor to a bona fide traveller, and the Court had declined to say that two quart bottles of whisky was an unreasonable quantity to supply to two bona fide travellers.[2] It must be borne in mind that a sale of whisky by a hotelkeeper was just an ordinary contract of sale, which gave the seller no right to control the buyer in the use made of the thing sold. It came to this, then, if the conviction was good, that where a bona fide traveller bought say a glass of whisky as if for himself and then gave it to a friend who was not a bona fide traveller, there was no breach of certificate if the hotelkeeper was ignorant that the whisky was intended for the friend, but if the hotelkeeper knew that the whisky was for the friend, then he was bound, in compliance with his certificate, to refuse to supply it. Such a construction would reduce the Act to an absurdity by opening the door to endless evasion. The true view was that the hotelkeeper had nothing to do with the purpose for which the traveller bought the liquor, and had only to see that the quantity supplied was no more than was reasonable. The Act expressed no distinction between lodgers at a hotel and travellers, and no distinction could be drawn in fact; both were guests at the hotel, and if a lodger at a hotel might entertain his friends with a reasonable quantity of liquor, so also might a traveller. It was in accordance with the ordinary usages of people, and was therefore reasonable, for a traveller to give liquor in such circumstances as were proved in the present case; entertaining a whole village was another matter—few people did that.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant was prohibited by the terms of his certificate from selling or giving out liquor on Sundays, "except for the accommodation of lodgers and travellers." That

---

[1] Gemmell v. Black, Oct. 27, 1882, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 17, 5 Coup. 150; Murray v. Macdougall, Feb. 7, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 5 Coup. 215; Boyd v. M'Jannet, May 21, 1879, 6 R. (Just. Cases) 43, 4 Coup. 239; Pine v. Barnes, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. Div. 221.

[2] Welsh v. Stewart, May 28, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 61, 1 White, 125.

No. 13.
Jan. 9, 1896.
Oliver v. Loudon.

meant for the lodger's or traveller's own personal use, and not for the use of his friends. There was no case in Scotland in which it had been decided that a hotelkeeper might, after hours or on Sunday, sell liquor to a lodger in the hotel or a traveller, when such liquor was to be consumed by one who was neither lodger in the hotel nor traveller. Further, a traveller was in a different position from a lodger in a hotel. The lodger made the hotel his home for the time—it might even be his only home—and it was reasonable that he should be able to entertain his friends on Sundays or after the hours of closing; to a traveller these considerations did not apply. All that he could reasonably expect to get was personal refreshment on his journey. Were it otherwise a whole village might get liquor on Sunday by the simple process of getting a friend to come from some distance and buy it for them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There can be no question that the man who bought the liquor in the present case was a bona fide traveller. Now, in the Act of Parliament bona fide travellers and lodgers are put in the same class, and no distinction is drawn between their rights so far as the statute is concerned. It has been decided that a lodger is entitled bona fide to entertain his friends in the hotel where he is lodging,—that is to say, he has been held to be entitled to buy liquor which he intends to use by giving to his friends, who might not be entitled under the statute to buy it for their own use. Now, in this case an endeavour is made to draw a distinction between the accommodation allowed by statute to a bona fide traveller and that allowed to a lodger. I am unable to see any ground, either under the statute or in reason, for such a distinction. A bona fide traveller comes to a hotel and requires accommodation for a day or part of a day, and he is entitled, as refreshment or accommodation, to have liquor served to him just as a lodger is; he is entitled to order what liquor he requires, and to use that liquor as he thinks proper, subject always to this, that he must not merely be in a plot to do that which would not be within the expression "bona fide." That is a question of fact in each case to be dealt with by the magistrate, and does not arise here. I see no danger that can arise of any such evasion of the Act being legalised—as was suggested by the respondent's counsel—in holding that a bona fide traveller who bona fide purchases liquor in a hotel for the purpose of giving it to his guests is in no different position from a lodger. It is, of course, the duty of the magistrate to consider the facts, and if the facts are not consistent with bona fide service of a traveller, to convict. I am therefore of opinion that the conviction must be quashed.

LORD M'LAREN.—The appeal which we are considering appears to me in every way a suitable case to be brought before us, because it raises a question of the construction of the Public-House Statute of 1862, or rather of the meaning of the certificate which is incorporated with the statute, and forms part of it. Everything that can be stated in support of the conviction has been well put before us, but I am clearly of opinion that the conviction on the facts stated cannot be sustained.

The statute, while prohibiting generally, for reasons of public policy, the keeping of open house on Sunday, has introduced an exception, also for public convenience, in favour of persons who are lodgers or bona fide travellers needing refreshment or accommodation at a hotel. It seems to me impossible to draw a distinction between the case of a lodger and that of a traveller who makes the hotel a temporary resting-place. It is merely a question of degree. One passes from the case of a man who hires his apartments by the week to the case of a person who takes a bedroom and stays for a single night, and then there comes the case of the man who orders his room, not being sure whether he will be able to proceed on his journey or will have to pass the night in the hotel. We have the man who comes for dinner, and the man who comes to take a glass of beer. No line can be drawn separating the various modes in which hotel entertainment may be given into two classes. Accordingly, the words of the certificate, as I read them, draw no such distinction, but the terms "traveller" and "lodger" are used in the same collocation, and everything that can be predicated of the one is applicable to the other.

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1896.
Oliver v. Loudon.

Now, when the certificate is expressed so as to enable the hotelkeeper to supply liquor for the refreshment or the accommodation of an inmate of the hotel, I think that "accommodation," in the fair sense and meaning of the word, includes the giving of refreshments to friends. It is difficult to see what other meaning can be attached to it, and the reason for allowing that is obvious. If the traveller is entitled for his own accommodation to order any quantity of liquor he pleases, it would be very unjust to the hotelkeeper, who is obliged by the conditions of his licence to sell, if he should be made responsible as for breach of certificate because the person to whom he sold the liquor allowed a friend to share it with him, the hotelkeeper having no power to prevent him. It is quite plain that the one exception necessarily drew along with it the other. The law cannot require the keeper of licensed premises to supply liquor to inmates without necessarily relieving him of responsibility as to how that liquor is to be consumed. Of course, I am not here considering a case of evasion, because I entertain not the smallest doubt that in such a case the magistrates will be entitled to convict. In the present case there is no reason to doubt—the fact is stated in the case—that the liquor was paid for by the traveller.

The appellant was entitled to enter into the contract of sale—indeed, he was in a manner bound to do so, as being keeper of a public place of entertainment, and it seems to be quite immaterial whether the liquor supplied was consumed wholly by the traveller, or was in part consumed by persons whom he chose to treat as his friends.

I am therefore of opinion that this conviction must fall.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. It seems to me that the question turns on whether the appellant was entitled to sell liquor to Highland. Now, I not only think that he was entitled to sell, but that he was bound to sell to Highland as a bona fide traveller. Highland was there in the exercise of rights as bona fide traveller, and as such was entitled to order what refreshment he desired, which the hotelkeeper, as keeper of a public place of entertainment, was bound to supply him; but when the hotelkeeper had sold to Highland what Highland was entitled to order, I regard the hotelkeeper's interest in and connection with the sale as at an end, and he had no responsibility for the manner in which the traveller, who had lawfully bought refreshment, disposed of it. With your Lordships, I desire distinctly to state that in coming to this conclusion I do not give any countenance whatever to a case of a traveller getting drink in a way merely intended to evade the statute under cover of being a bona fide traveller. There is no such suggestion in the present case, and I concur that the conviction must be quashed.

No. 13.

Jan. 9, 1896.

Oliver v. London.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the affirmative, and the second in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses, which modify to ten guineas," &c.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 14.

Jan. 9, 1896.

Bonnar v. Walker.

JOHN BONNAR, Appellant.—Salvesen—T. B. Morison.
WILLIAM WALKER (Burgh Prosecutor, Paisley), Respondent.—Dundas—James Clark.

Police—Street Betting—Assembling on street for purpose of betting—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 393.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 393, enacts, that "if any two or more persons assemble together in any street or open place within the burgh for the purpose of engaging in lotteries, betting, or gambling, each of such persons shall be liable" in a penalty.

A person convicted of a contravention of this enactment appealed on a case which stated—that the appellant was a bookmaker; that on the occasion specified in the complaint he was walking up and down one of the streets of the burgh; that a young man, whose name was not disclosed, "joined the appellant and handed him a piece of white paper. The appellant looked at it and put it" into his pocket. "The young man then handed him two or three pieces of money, apparently silver, which the appellant also put in his pocket"; that the appellant was apprehended and the young man disappeared; that on being searched there was found on the appellant's person fifty-four "betting lines," telegrams, a sporting paper, a note-book containing the names of horses, and about £28 in money; and that what took place between the appellant and the young man "was in accordance with the mode in which street betting is carried on."

The Court quashed the conviction, holding that the facts proved did not amount to assembling on the street for the purpose of betting.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that the two or more persons contemplated as assembling together are persons who are identified as being together for the prosecution of the same purpose, viz., the making gain out of the public.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Trayner.

ON 25th November 1895 John Bonnar, clerk, residing in Well Street, Paisley, was charged in the Police Court at Paisley, on a complaint at the instance of the burgh prosecutor, setting forth that the accused, "upon the 23d day of November 1895, did assemble with a man, to the complainer at present unknown, in High Street, within the burgh of Paisley, for the purpose of betting, contrary to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, particularly section 393 thereof." *

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 393, enacts,—"If any two or more persons assemble together in any street or open place within the burgh for the purpose of engaging in lotteries, betting, or gaming, each of such persons shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

No. 14.

Jan. 9, 1896.
Bonnar v. Walker.

Bonnar objected to the relevancy of the complaint, and the objection having been repelled, pleaded not guilty. He was convicted of the contravention charged and fined 40s., with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The facts stated in the case were:—"The appellant is known in Paisley as a bookmaker, and has been so known for years. On Saturday, the 23d of November last, he had been walking several times up and down High Street of Paisley (i.e., westward and eastward) with another bookmaker named George Cathcart, and on one of their walks eastward (i.e., towards the Cross) the appellant stopped at twenty minutes to two o'clock P.M. in High Street, at the western corner of Storie Street, which opens off High Street southward. Cathcart passed on. A young man, twenty-one or twenty-two years of age, whose name was not disclosed during the trial, joined the appellant and handed him a piece of white paper. The appellant looked at it, and put it in his left trousers pocket. The young man then handed him two or three pieces of money, apparently silver, which the appellant also put in his pocket. On seeing this two police-constables, who had been watching from a house window opposite, went to the street. They saw the appellant before them going eastward. The young man had disappeared. The constables followed the appellant eastward in High Street. They then apprehended him at the door of the Globe Hotel, charging him with betting in High Street, and requiring him to go with them to the police-office. Cathcart was near, and the appellant shouted to him to go and tell the old man. This referred to the appellant's father, who was near, and is also known as a bookmaker. Neither on apprehension nor in the police-office did the appellant make any reference to his position, or offer any explanation, except saying on apprehension, 'Every dog shall have his day.' On reaching the police-office, and being searched there at ten minutes to two o'clock, there were found on the appellant's person the following articles and moneys, viz.:—Fifty-four betting lines (these were in his left trousers pocket), a Sporting Chronicle, ten telegrams (three of them addressed Bonnar, Paisley—seven of them old and three of the date of the apprehension), a note-book containing names of horses, a balance-sheet and a pencil, £15 in notes, £2, 10s. in gold, and £11, 3s. 5½d. in silver and copper. A Manchester race was run on the day in question, and among the lines referred to were a number referring to fifteen out of eighteen horses named for that race. On 23d November 1895, and previous to the appellant's apprehension, a bundle of lines and some money were handed to him in High Street, opposite the Drill Hall, about 300 yards west, by a man named John Robertson, a labourer. What was sworn to as having taken place between the appellant and the young man was in accordance with the mode in which street betting is carried on."

The following were the questions of law:—"(1) Was the complaint relevant? (2) Did the facts proved as above stated warrant the conviction?"

Argued for the appellant;—It might be that the complaint was relevant, but at all events the facts found proved did not justify a conviction. These facts were in substance that the appellant and another man had met on the street for a moment, and had entered into a transaction of some sort. The magistrate, no doubt, must have been of opinion that it was a betting transaction, for he had convicted, but there was no sufficient evidence that that was the nature of the transaction; it might have had nothing to do with betting, or it might have been the payment of a bet already made. Assuming, however, that what took place was a betting transaction, the conviction could be justified only if the statute prohibited all betting on the street. But if two friends happened to meet on a street and there made a bet on some matter of chance, could it be suggested that they had contravened the Act? and if they had not done so, wherein did the appellant's case differ? It was true that the magistrate had found that the appellant was a bookmaker, but the Act said nothing about bookmakers. What it prohibited was the assembly of any two or more persons on a street for the purpose of betting. In no reasonable meaning of the language could the facts here found proved be described as the assembly of two persons for the purpose of betting. If the Legislature had intended to prohibit all betting on the streets, it could very easily have said so.

No. 14.

Jan. 9, 1896.

Bonnar v. Walker.

Argued for the respondent;—If nothing more had been proved than that two persons had accidentally met on the street, and there made a bet, it might be conceded that they would not have contravened the Act. But a great deal more had been proved. The appellant was by profession a betting man, and was certainly on the street on the occasion libelled for the purpose of betting. If, then, anyone came up to him for the purpose of making a bet with him, there was an assembly of two persons for the purpose of betting within the meaning of the Act; whether in any given case the persons met for the purpose of betting was a question of fact for the magistrate, and the Court would not interfere with his determination if there was evidence sufficient in law to support it. Here there was such evidence. No doubt the meeting was of very short duration, and there was no direct evidence as to what precisely took place between the two. But it was just the kind of evidence to be expected in such cases. If it was not sufficient to justify a conviction it would be practically impossible to get convictions under the Act at all.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this is a case in which there was not evidence entitling the magistrate to pronounce the decision which he did. It is true, as Mr Dundas said, that in cases of this kind it might be difficult to get evidence, but that is no reason for convicting in a case in which there is not legal evidence to justify a conviction. In this particular case all that was proved was that the accused was in the street, and that a young man came up to him, handed him a bit of paper, and then handed him some money, which he put into his pocket. It was not proved that they had any conversation whatever, but it was said that what passed was a betting transaction. Let it be assumed that it was. Was it an assembling in the street for the purposes of lotteries, betting, or gaming? That it might have been a meeting on the street the whole essence of which was a betting transaction is clear; but it is also clear, and it was admitted in argument, that two persons may meet in the street and there have a betting transaction, and yet not "assemble" in the sense of the statute for that purpose. The whole thing might have taken only a moment to transact. Let us suppose that this young man had made up his mind to have a bet on a particular race, and being on his way to the office of the appellant, for the purpose of handing him the paper and the money, had met him in the street, and there handed him a paper and money, could anyone say that that was an assembly in the street for the purposes of lotteries, betting, and gaming? I do not think that they could, unless it is to be held—as it certainly was not contended here—that every betting transaction in a street constituted an assembly in the street between the two persons who exchanged the bet. It is true that there is evidence here to justify the magistrate in holding that one of the parties to this transaction is a man whose business is betting, but I do not see how this can make any difference in the colour which the facts have unless a bet in the street between two persons, neither of whom is proved to be engaged in the business of betting, constitutes an assembly in the street for the purpose of betting. I think that the statute must have been intended to meet something different from that. As to the propriety of allowing any betting at all in the street, or of allowing any betting at all in society, I say nothing. The Legislature has not thought proper to interfere absolutely with the right of the subject if he chooses to make a bet. Betting is not illegal, although the Legislature has said that bets cannot be enforced in a Court of law. But for excellent reasons the Legislature has enacted that certain modes of carrying on betting transactions should be illegal, and here the statute says that the assembly of two or more persons in a street for the purposes of betting shall be illegal. I think that in construing such a statute as this we must read it in a reasonable sense, and hold that by "assembly" something more is meant than the meeting of two people on the street—casual it may be—and the momentary exchange of a bet between them. I am for quashing the conviction.

No. 14.
Jan. 9, 1896.
Bonnar v. Walker.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that we cannot answer the first question in the negative, because the complaint appears to me to be relevant. I agree with the view which your Lordship has announced with reference to the second question, but I should like to say that I do so entirely upon the construction of the section of the Burgh Police Act founded on. We know, of course, that there are persons who make it their business to take the money of the public on account of bets. These persons are to a certain extent tolerated by law, but it may be a very proper thing that, if such persons go about the streets soliciting bets, they should be made liable to penalties. There are Acts of Parliament specially directed against betting-houses, and I rather think that it has been proposed in Parliament—although probably on account of technical difficulties the proposal has not been carried into effect—to extend these Acts to the effect of prohibiting betting altogether in public places. If I could come to the conclusion that the 393d section of the Burgh Police Act is directed against the practice of a single person going about the streets soliciting bets, I should hesitate to say that there is not, on the facts stated, evidence sufficient to support the conviction, because it is proved that the man is a betting-man by trade, and there is proof of that in the papers which were found in his pocket; further, the transfer of money and a paper from the one to the other, unexplained by any exculpatory evidence, would, I think, if the statute applies to the case, be sufficient to support the conviction. It would be a matter of impression whether the magistrate was right in holding that the offence of being in the street for the purpose of betting had been proved, and I should have difficulty in saying that he might not reach that conclusion on the facts stated. But when I look at the language of the clause I find that the clause contemplates the case of two or more persons conspiring together for the purpose of drawing the public into "lotteries, betting, or gaming." I cannot attach any other meaning to the words "if any two or more persons assemble together" in the street for such purposes. In a certain very remote sense it may be said that a man who gives his money on the street to a betting-agent is in the street for the purpose of betting, but he is certainly not there for the purpose of betting in the same sense as the betting-agent is there. It seems to me that the two or more persons whom the statute contemplates as assembling together are persons who are identified as being together for the same purpose,—that is to say, for the prosecution of the same purpose—the making gain out of the public. I should therefore think it unsafe, and contrary to the principles of construction of penal statutes, to hold that the person imposed upon—whose money is taken for a bet—is to be treated as one of an assembly of two or more persons for the purpose of betting. He is the person who suffers from the practice which the statute is supposed to condemn. I think, on the facts as stated, that the man who paid the money, even supposing it was on account of a new bet, was not there for the purpose of betting in the sense of the statute, but was going on his ordinary business, and was taken advantage of by the betting-man. My opinion is that the conviction is not supported by the statute.

No. 14.

Jan. 9, 1896.
Bonnar v. Walker.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have very great doubt whether the provision of the statute upon which this complaint is based applies or is intended to apply to the particular kind of case that is set forth in the species facti before us. I cannot say, however, that I have given the construction of the statute such consideration as to enable me to express a deliberate opinion upon that point. But I have a very distinct opinion upon the other point, and it is to the effect, that in all the facts found proved by the magistrate there is nothing to warrant a conviction. I think that there is nothing in the evidence leading necessarily to the conclusion that these two persons met on the street for the purpose of betting; on the contrary, I think that the evidence is quite consistent, in every item and particular, with the transaction between these two persons being something other than a betting transaction. I agree, therefore, that the second question ought to be answered in the negative.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Answer the second question in the case in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern," &c.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Carlin v. Malloch.

JOHN CARLIN, Complainer.—Macaulay Smith.
JAMES MACGREGOR MALLOCH (Burgh Prosecutor, Govan), Respondent.—Shaw—Cullen.

Complaint—Indecent Exposure—Specification—Relevancy. — A person was charged upon a complaint which set forth that "he did . . . on a boat in the River Clyde . . . wilfully, indecently, and in a shameless manner expose his person" to a person designed. The accused was convicted of the "crime charged."

No. 15.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Carlin v. Malloch.

In a suspension the Court set aside the conviction on the ground that neither the complaint nor the conviction shewed the facts upon which the charge was rested.

Procedure—Verbal Citation—Person with known address—Oppression.—Observed per cur. that when a person charged with a police offence has a known place of residence, it is oppressive to bring him before a magistrate without serving upon him a copy of the complaint (unless he is apprehended in flagrante delicto).

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

ON 10th December 1895 John Carlin, boatman, Govan, was charged in the Police Court, Govan, at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, upon a complaint which set forth that he "did, on the seventh day of December 1895, on a boat in the River Clyde, between Govan Ferry and Highland Lane Ferry, in the burgh of Govan, wilfully, indecently, and in a shameless manner, expose his person to Mary O'Dwyer, wife of Thomas O'Dwyer, labourer, residing in Albert Street, Govan." No statute was referred to.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led he was convicted, the conviction bearing,—"The Magistrate, in respect of evidence adduced, finds the accused guilty of the crime charged."

Carlin brought a bill of suspension.

The complainer stated that on 7th December he was in his boat 60 feet from the Govan side of the Clyde, when he stood up to pass urine, with his face to the Partick side, 80 yards distant; that hearing a voice from the Govan side he turned round, but could see no one; that on 10th December a policeman visited him at his house and verbally requested him to appear at the Police Court upon the following day. The policeman stated that all he knew was that a woman had some complaint against him. "No notice was given to him that he was to be placed at the bar charged with any offence."

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The complaint was irrelevant. There was no specification of the manner in which the complainer was alleged to have indecently exposed his person,[1] or as to what part of his person he had indecently exposed. (2) The conviction was bad. The complainer had a known place of residence, and a warrant for his apprehension should have been issued, or a copy of the complaint should have been served upon him.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The complaint was framed in the language used to describe the offence in subsection 1 of section 380 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55). It was quite sufficient to specify generally the offence, leaving the actual facts to appear in the evidence adduced at the trial. (2) The answer to the objection to the regularity of the proceedings was that the accused appeared and stated no objection to the mode of citation.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the view which I take of this case it is not necessary to decide the question which has been raised as to the competency of the procedure adopted. But I should like to make the observation that it appears to me a rather oppressive and far from praiseworthy proceeding to tell a law-abiding citizen against whom an information is lodged to come to the Police Court, and then bring him up on a criminal charge, without

[1] M'Kenzie v. Whyte, Nov. 14, 1864, 4 Irvine, 570.
[2] Stewart v. Lang, Nov. 23, 1894, 1 Adam, 493, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 9.

No. 15.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Carlin v. Malloch.

either a complaint or a warrant. In these cases anything which even savours of oppression should be carefully avoided.

But I do not need to go into that in this case. Here what the accused was charged with was "that he did, on the seventh day of December 1895, on a boat in the River Clyde, between Govan Ferry and Highland Lane Ferry, in the burgh of Govan, wilfully, indecently, and in a shameless manner, expose his person to Mary Smith or O'Dwyer." There is in that no specification whatever of the manner in which he exposed his person, and it was conceded in argument that this offence might be committed in different ways—different, that is, not only as to the manner, but as to the heinousness of the act. Here we have merely a general statement that he exposed his person. It may be, as was pointed out by Lord Young in the course of the argument, that in some cases where the complaint is very generally expressed, the terms of the conviction may shew what is the actual offence which, in the opinion of the convicting magistrate, has been committed, and in such cases the conviction may be sustained, as we would not subject a Police Court complaint to the same strict criticism which we apply to a High Court indictment. But in this case we have no specification of the offence which was committed, either in the complaint or in the conviction. And it is most necessary in such cases as this, where a conviction may be destructive to a man's whole future, that the nature of the offence charged should be exactly stated.

I have therefore no difficulty in holding that we have here no relevant complaint. It is not sufficient to use the general words of the statute; some specification of the offence is necessary, so that we may be enabled to judge whether the Magistrate was right in holding that the facts amounted to indecent exposure.

LORD YOUNG.—The complainer is designed as a boatman, residing in Sharpe Street, Govan. He is a householder, and therefore the police, knowing his residence, ought, I think, to have taken the course usual in cases where the accused has a known residence, of serving him with a copy of the complaint. I do not say that that is the only proper course. If a man is apprehended in the street, taken in the act of committing an offence, he may be brought up in a summary manner without the service of a complaint. There was here, however, no reason for omitting service.

Then, when the accused appeared, and the complaint was read over to him, he was only told that he was charged with wilfully and indecently exposing his person in the presence of Mrs O'Dwyer. There is no information as to what distance separated them when he did so. According to his own statement it was sixty feet; according to the information of the police it was less than half that distance. But even thirty feet is a considerable distance, especially with intervening water.

I agree with your Lordship in holding that as a rule it is necessary to have, either in the complaint or in the conviction, or in the two taken together, a statement of the facts which the convicting Magistrate has held to constitute the crime for which he inflicts punishment. There is nothing here to tell us what the accused actually did. There may be a variety of ways of exposing the person, and some of them may be punishable and others not, and in the absence of information it is impossible to feel confident, and therefore it is unsafe to assume, that the Magistrate necessarily took the right view of what constitutes a criminal offence. He may have been right, but the statement here does not enable us to judge whether he was or not.

No. 15.

Feb. 7, 1896. Carlin v. Malloch.

I therefore concur in thinking that the conviction is bad, because it convicts the accused of an offence, but does not enable us to decide whether or not what he did constituted that offence or merited punishment. And when a conviction leaves it in doubt whether the accused has really committed a punishable offence, suspension is an allowable remedy.

For these reasons I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the conviction should be set aside.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I only wish to add, with somewhat more emphasis than your Lordships, my disapproval of the proceedings of the police in this case. I think it is oppressive in a case where the accused is not taken red-handed or in flagrante delicto, and where he is a man who has a residence which is well known to the authorities, to apprehend him and bring him up before the Magistrates without first serving upon him a copy of the complaint.

THE COURT suspended the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter.

ROBERTSON & WALLACE, S.S.C.—MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 16.

Feb. 7, 1896. Cameron v. Buchan.

WILLIAM CAMERON, Appellant.—Johnston—Salvesen.
WILLIAM BUCHAN (Procurator-Fiscal for Peeblesshire), Respondent.—Shaw—Baxter.

Public-House—"Hawking spirits"—Relevancy of complaint—Specification—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 16 and 37.—A complaint charged the accused with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and particularly section 16 thereof,* in so far as upon a date and at a place specified "he did hawk one pint of spirits to" A B.

Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect it did not state whether the offence was committed by selling spirits, or by offering spirits for sale.

Public-House—"Hawking spirits"—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 16.—A hotelkeeper was charged with a contravention of section 16 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, in so far as he did, on 23d November 1895, hawk one pint of spirits to A B. It was proved that the accused, on 22d November, called at A B's house and solicited an order for spirits; that A B gave him an order for one pint of rum, and that this was delivered to him next day, 23d November, by the accused upon the public road.

Held that the facts proved did not support the charge of hawking.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

ON 3d January 1896 William Cameron, hotelkeeper, Biggar, was

* The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 16, enacted,—"Every person hawking spirits or other exciseable liquors shall thereby be guilty of an offence. . . ."

Section 37.—". . . The word 'hawking' shall mean and include trafficking in or about the streets, highways, or other places. . . ."

"The expression 'trafficking' shall mean and include bartering, selling, dealing in, trading in, exposing, or offering for sale."

No. 16.
Feb. 7, 1896.
Cameron v. Buchan.

charged in the Justice of Peace Court upon a complaint which, inter alia, set forth that he "has contravened the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, more particularly section 16th thereof, in so far as he did, on the 23d day of November 1895, on the public road leading from Broughton to Tweedsmuir, between Mossfennan Lodge and No. 1 hut on the railway works of the Edinburgh and District Water Trust,—(First) Hawk one pint of spirits (namely, rum or other exciseable liquor) to James Greig, foreman, residing at No. 1 hut aforesaid."—[Here followed six similar charges.]

In regard to the above charge the Justices found it proved:—"That the appellant, on 22d November 1895, called at the railway works near No. 1 hut on James Greig, before designed, and asked him to give an order for liquor—that Greig ordered a pint of rum and got it delivered to him next day by the appellant on the public road near Mossfennan Lodge—and that it was delivered in conformity with the order and then paid for."

"In regard to all the counts.—That a waggonette, in charge of the appellant, and containing the supplies delivered on the 23d, was kept standing on that occasion on the public road for about two hours, between the said hut No. 1 and the pay hut near Mossfennan Lodge. That the appellant, either when obtaining orders or executing them, inquired specially the names of the persons who so ordered or received liquor. That it was not proved that the appellant had with him on the 23d any more liquor than that actually delivered, though it was proved, as above stated, that he had more than had been ordered."

The Justices in respect of the evidence adduced convicted the accused.

Cameron obtained a case, which set forth the facts proved as stated above.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"(2) Whether the facts stated as proved constitute an offence and justify the conviction on a right view of the law applicable to them?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The complaint was irrelevant from want of specification. The bare use of the word "hawk" was not sufficient. Under section 37 of the Act of 1862 "hawking" meant "trafficking," and "trafficking" had several meanings, and the appellant was entitled to know of which of these he was accused.[1] (2) What the appellant had done here was not "hawking," but merely the legitimate exercise of his trade. He was quite entitled to solicit orders and to execute them next day. The section of the Act under which the conviction was obtained in the English case of Pletts v. Campbell[2] was unlike section 16 of the Act of 1862.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) "Hawk" exciseable liquors denoted one offence, and was the statutory word. The complaint therefore was not wanting in specification. (2) The appellant was practically hawking spirits as a pedlar, and the Legislature intended to check this practice.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I must say I think that this is a kind of case in which, where a charge is to be made under a statute such as this of [1] Carr v. Neilson, Jan. 23, 1894, 1 Adam, 351, 21 R. (Just. Cases) 29.

[2] Pletts v. Campbell, 1895, L. R., 2 Q. B. 229.
[3] Pletts v. Campbell, 1895, L. R., 2 Q. B. 229; Stallard v. Marks, 1878, 3 Q. B. D. 412.

No. 16.
Feb. 7, 1896.
Cameron v. Buchan.

"hawking," there should be some specification of what the offence is which is charged. There are undoubtedly cases, and one or two of them were referred to in the course of the debate, in which several things may be held just to be descriptions of the same thing committed in different ways, and in these cases it has been held that it is not necessary for the prosecutor to specify which he charges, but that he may state alternative ways, leaving it to come out upon the facts in which alternative way the accused committed the crime, and the conviction would not require to specify which alternative the accused was convicted of, they not being truly alternative charges. But the alternatives here are, on the face of them, true alternatives, and there is no need to point out more than this, that most undoubtedly a "completed sale" and an "offering for sale" are necessarily two very distinct things.

I think the real question here is, however, whether what is stated to us as having been proved amounts to the offence of hawking at all. I put it to counsel for the prosecutor in the course of the argument, whether in every case where a respectable dealer in exciseable liquors, licensed to sell them, gets orders at the houses of his customers and executes these orders, he is in the view of the prosecutor liable as for an offence; and counsel admitted that his argument must bring it up to that if the quantity of liquor ordered and supplied were a retail quantity.

Now, I cannot conceive for one moment that any Act of Parliament was intended to effect so extraordinary and oppressive a result as that, which would in fact prevent any licensed grocer, say in Princes Street, from receiving an order for two or three bottles of beer at the house of his customer and delivering them next day or that afternoon. On the face of it the word "hawking" does not indicate anything of that kind. We know what in ordinary language the word "hawking" implies—that the man who does it carries his goods with him, either in a sack or in a box of some kind, or in a vehicle, and offers those goods for sale as being the wares which he carries with him for sale. Thus, for example, any person who carried a jar of whisky with him, and went about from cottage to cottage offering to sell people a gill of whisky out of the jar, would unquestionably be hawking spirits. But I cannot say that any definition of hawking that I ever heard of should lead to this result, that where people are living scattered all over a countryside, they are never to obtain a supply by sending an order for it unless they send that order in writing, and have the liquor delivered to them absolutely inside licensed premises. If customers give an order, which of course may be given verbally, I should be inclined to hold that the sale was effected by the order being received by the proprietor of the establishment within the premises. Such an order for whisky or beer may be delivered to the licensed dealer by his servant, who has gone his rounds for the convenience of the customers, and of course in such a case convenience of the customers is in the interest of the dealer, because if he did not deliver liquor for the convenience of his customers they would go to someone else with their custom. It seems to me most extravagant to hold that a transaction such as that falls within the provision of the statute that a person hawking liquor shall be liable as for an offence.

LORD YOUNG.—There are seven charges, or as they are called here counts,

No. 16.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Cameron v. Buchan.

in this complaint, but I am of opinion that we cannot distinguish between them—that the whole seven must be dealt with in the same way and disposed of upon the same grounds. It is therefore sufficient to take one, and I take the first. The charge is that the respondent in the Court below, the appellant here, "did on 23d November hawk one pint of spirits (namely, rum, or other excisable liquor) to James Greig, foreman, residing at No. 1 hut aforesaid,"—and going back to the "aforesaid," it appears to be No. 1 hut on the railway works of the Edinburgh and District Water Trust. Now, the Justices informed us that what they found proved with reference to this is that the appellant on 22d November 1895,—that is, the day before the date of the charge,—called at the railway works near No. 1 hut on James Greig, before designed, and asked him to give an order for liquor, that is to say, solicited an order for liquor; that Greig ordered a pint of rum, and got it delivered to him next day—that is, the day on which the hawking is alleged to have been committed by the appellant—on the public road near Mossfennan Lodge, and that it was delivered in conformity with the order and then paid for. The questions which we have to determine are—first, whether the charge which I have read, of hawking, is relevant; and second, whether these facts, which the Justices tell us they found proved, or proved to their satisfaction, substantiate that charge.

Now, upon the first question I am disposed to agree with your Lordship that it is not sufficient to say that at a certain time and place a party did "hawk" a pint of rum. I think it is at least more satisfactory that it should be stated wherein the hawking consisted. On the facts which the Justices found proved, they were of opinion that the hawking consisted in delivering the spirits, a completed sale of which had been made the day before. Now, in order to judge of the case and the law applicable to the facts, I think it very desirable that it should be stated in the complaint wherein the prosecutor alleges that the hawking, which he charges as an offence, consisted. Here there was a sale on the 22d—for I need hardly point out that, according to every rule of law, if a man solicits an order for any commodity whatever, and gets an order, and accepts it, that is a completed sale as between him and the party with whom he deals. If a pint of rum, or any amount of rum, or any quantity of any other saleable commodity, is ordered, and the order is executed at an agreed-on price, or at the market price, that is a sale of the article. I do not need to consider here whether the sale of this rum amounted to hawking, because that is not charged. The hawking alleged here is upon the following day, when the sale was implemented by the seller delivering the article sold to the buyer.

Now, I do not think that is hawking. I am not considering any case of transgression of the licensing laws, or transgression of certificates to a publican or public-house keeper, and therefore I lay all that out of view. I am merely considering this—whether a party selling anything at a customer's residence, whether inside or at the door, is a hawker, necessarily a hawker, completing a contract of sale, by soliciting and obtaining and accepting an order. Now, I do not think that is hawking; but as I have said, we do not need to consider that here, for he is not charged with selling. It is the delivery, upon a subsequent occasion, of the goods which had, I must assume,—for the contrary is not alleged or charged,—been quite legitimately sold the day before, or the week before.

No. 16.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Cameron v. Buchan.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. I do not think the facts which the Justices have held proved amount to hawking, or indeed anything like hawking. Therefore I think the conviction should be set aside.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—BUCHAN & BUCHAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17.

Feb. 7, 1896.*
Green v. Leith.

JOHN GREEN, Complainer.—Ure—Clyde.
ROBERT S. W. LEITH (Procurator-Fiscal of Caithness-shire), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Ferguson, A.-D.

Fishing—Sea-Fishing—Beam-Trawling—Fishery Board—Statute—Bye-law—Ultra vires—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 7.—The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 7, enacts, that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness-shire, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law."

Held that under this section the Fishery Board had merely a discretionary power to prohibit trawling in particular areas within the line specified, and therefore that a bye-law issued by the board prohibiting trawling throughout the whole area within the line was ultra vires.

Fishing—Sea-Fishing—Fishery Board—Statute—Bye-law—Complaint—Penalty—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 7—Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 10.—The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 1, prohibits the use of beam-trawling or otter-trawling within three miles of any part of the coast of Scotland. Section 7 enacts (subsection 1) that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness-shire, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire"; and (subsection 2) that any person fishing in contravention of such bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence.

In 1892 the Fishery Board issued a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the limits specified, and setting forth that any person acting in contravention of the bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence.

The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, sec. 10, repealed sec. 7, subsec. 2, of the Act of 1889, and substituted for the penalties there provided a fine not exceeding £100, and failing payment imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days.

A person was convicted of a contravention of the bye-law on a complaint which set forth that the accused was liable in a penalty not exceeding £100, and failing payment to imprisonment, and prayed for the imposition of the penalties provided by the Act of 1895.

Held, in a suspension, that whether the penalty ought to have been specified in the bye-law or not, as it was in fact specified, and as the complaint was founded on the bye-law, the conviction fell to be quashed, as the penalty prayed for was in excess of that specified in the bye-law.

* Decided Jan. 7, 1896.

No. 17.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Green v. Leith.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kincairney.

ON 5th December 1895 John Green, master of the steam-trawler "Countess," was charged in the Sheriff Court at Wick, on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused "did on 12th October 1895, at a part of the sea off the coast of Caithness, in Scotland, with Lothbeg Point bearing north 85 degrees west, and Donald Mountain bearing north 52 degrees west, and distant from Clythness eleven miles or thereby, and within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, he being then the person actually in command of the said steam-trawler, and not in the service or possessing the written authority of the Fishery Board for Scotland, use the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling for taking sea fish in contravention of bye-law No. 10 made by the said Fishery Board for Scotland under the powers conferred on the board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885, the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1890, dated at Edinburgh, 27th September 1892, confirmed by Her Majesty's Secretary for Scotland, 22d November 1892, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette of 25th November 1892, an extract from the said Edinburgh Gazette being produced herewith; whereby the said John Green is liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding £100, in terms of section 10 (4) of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, and failing immediate payment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, or to such penalty and imprisonment as your Lordship may fix in terms of the 6th section of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."

The complaint prayed the Sheriff to convict the accused of the contravention charged, and "to adjudge him to suffer the penalty provided by the said Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, section 10 (4)."

Green stated the following preliminary objections to the relevancy of the complaint:—

"1. That the provisions of section 7 of the Act of 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), are inconsistent with, repugnant to, and are repealed by the provisions of subsections 1, 2, and 3 of section 10 of the Act of 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42).

"2. That in any event the penalties prescribed in subsection 4 of section 10 of the Act of 1895 are not exigible for an offence against section 7 of the Act of 1889.

"3. That in view that bye-law No. 10 specifically prescribes the penalties for an offence under section 7 of the Act of 1889, this (a) renders the bye-law invalid; or (b) prevents the exaction of the penalties prescribed by subsection 4 of section 10 of the Act of 1895."

The Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) repelled the objections, and Green then pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined £50, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment.

He brought a suspension.

The bye-law in question and the material portions of the statutes founded on are quoted in the immediately succeeding report of the cases of Wilson v. Rust and Wilson v. Mackenzie, and the report of the arguments there shews sufficiently the nature of the arguments in the present case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat complicated case, but the consideration of two of the points which have been argued before us will, I think, be sufficient for our decision on the validity of this conviction.

No. 17.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Green v. Leith.

In this case the prosecution was founded upon a bye-law passed by the Fishery Board upon the narrative of powers conferred on them by the Statute 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23, and conviction was pronounced in respect that the accused had been proved to have used a beam or otter-trawl within the area defined by that bye-law. Now, under that bye-law, in the third section of it, intimation was given by the public authority which had the right to make the bye-law, that any person acting in contravention of it should be liable, on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, to a fine not exceeding £5 for the first offence. That is the penalty as laid down in the bye-law, which having been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland became, if valid, equivalent to an Act of Parliament, and no part of that bye-law has been repealed or set aside by any subsequent statute or legally enacted bye-law. But under an Act of Parliament passed in 1895, that clause of the Act of 1889 under which the bye-law itself was passed by the Fishery Board, and which authorised a penalty of the same amount as that set forth in the bye-law, was repealed, and the words of subsection 4 of section 10 of the Act of 1895 are to be read as coming in place of subsection 2 of section 7 of the Act of 1889, to this effect, that the magistrate finding a panel guilty of a contravention of a bye-law passed in terms of subsection 1 of section 7 of the 1889 Act, may sentence him to pay a penalty of £100 with the alternative of sixty days' imprisonment. It is true that the complaint referred in terms to the amending section of the Act of 1895, and prayed for the larger penalty thereby provided, but that does not, in my opinion, obviate the objection taken by the complainer here, that under the bye-law it is expressly provided that any person guilty of contravening it shall be liable in a penalty not exceeding £5 and to nothing more for a first offence. That it would have been competent for the Fishery Board to have made a new bye-law, either giving effect to the penalty laid down in the Act of 1895, or omitting any reference to a penalty, may quite well be; but where a prosecution is brought under a bye-law which has never been repealed, and which expressly intimated to those who might offend against it that the penalty to which they would be liable was of a certain amount, that the prosecutor should found on that bye-law and conclude for a greater penalty than is therein expressly set forth, would, I am of opinion, lead to great oppression, and is therefore quite inadmissible. In the case of a statutory offence the gravity of the crime is measured by the amount of the penalty which the Legislature has enacted may be imposed on the party found guilty, and to libel a contravention of a bye-law, which bye-law has been so expressed as to certiorate an offender what he was liable to suffer, and then to tell the accused that he is to be punished in an entirely different degree under a subsequent Act of Parliament, would, I think, lead to grave oppression.

That would be sufficient for the decision of this case, but there is another question raised which seems equally clear, and that is, that where authority is given by an Act of Parliament to a public body, within an area defined by the Act of Parliament, to prohibit an otherwise legal act in an area or areas to be defined by the bye-law passed in conformity with the powers so conferred, it is not a proper or competent exercise of such powers for that public body to pass a bye-law prohibiting the act within the whole area

No. 17.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Green v. Leith.

defined by the statute conferring the powers. Power to prohibit within certain areas to be defined by the bye-law, means that they may select such area or areas within the locality named by statute, but that in doing so they must use their discretion, and apply their minds as to what areas are to be included within the prohibition, and what areas left free within the locality over which their powers extend. It is not a proper exercise of such a power to prohibit the act within the whole locality. I would have come to this view even if we had no precedent to go upon, but I am of opinion that the Rothesay[1] case quoted to us is in point. There the magistrates, in the exercise of a precisely similar power affecting the closing of public-houses in a given locality, in form no doubt selected an area within that locality, but in fact by fixing the boundary of that area so as to include the whole parts of the locality to which the statute actually could apply in a practical sense they made a bye-law affecting the whole locality, and the House of Lords held that to be an illegal exercise of the powers conferred.

Upon these two grounds I think this suspension must be sustained, and therefore I shall not give any opinion on the other and more complicated questions raised.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a conviction under a complaint which charges a contravention of a bye-law made in 1892 by the Fishery Board for Scotland, and no other offence is charged except a contravention of that bye-law. We have the bye-law before us, and its operative provisions are the second and third. The second professes to define an area in terms of powers conferred on the Fishery Board by Act of Parliament. The third section proceeds to impose a fine not exceeding £5 for the first offence, and £20 for a second or subsequent offence. It appears to me that, on the two grounds which your Lordship has stated, the bye-law is not in terms of the Act of Parliament. It is just as difficult to maintain the second section as the third, though the objections to them are necessarily different. The objection to the second section is, that while the power vested in the Fishery Board was a power to prohibit beam-trawling within selected parts of a larger district, the Fishery Board has not in fact made the selection prescribed by the statute, but has declared the whole district over which their powers extended to be subject to absolute prohibition. It appears to me that the case is in all respects similar to the objection taken to the order of the magistrates in the Rothesay[1] case, and the reasoning of Lord Cairns is applicable to this case, because the principle is that a power to make exceptions to a general law in relation to selected areas cannot be extended so as to bring the entire district or territory within the exception. If, indeed, this had been a power given to an individual, or it might be to a public body, for the regulation of internal affairs of the individual or body corporate, any exercise of the power within and up to the statutory limits would have been legal; but it cannot be questioned that the power given to the Fishery Board is a power to be exercised for public objects motived by considerations of utility, and depending on facts to be ascertained. It is plainly implied that the Board is to consider what are the areas within this large district of open [1] Macbeth v. Ashley, June 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 708, April 17, 1874, 1 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 17.
Feb. 7, 1896.
Green v. Leith.

sea in which beam-trawling would be prejudicial to the industry of fishing. It would also be for the Fishery Board's consideration how far a general prohibition could be made effectual in view of the claims which might be made by the subjects of other states to exercise the right of fishing in the open sea. These are delicate and possibly conflicting considerations which the Fishery Board was bound to take into account, and which are altogether ignored in the bye-law, which, as I have said, amounts to a universal prohibition of beam-trawling within the entire district. I think that is a bad exercise of their discretionary power, and consequently that the prohibition is altogether null.

But even if the prohibition had been properly made in the exercise of the statutory powers, I am of opinion that the Fishery Board had no power to enforce their prohibition by a penalty, and am not aware that Parliament has ever delegated the power of declaring penalties for new offences to local authorities or subordinate departments. No case of that kind has been cited, and I know of none. Parliament has always prescribed the penalty for the contravention of its legislative provisions, and the present statute is no exception to the rule. The Statute of 1889 itself makes the contravention of the bye-law a penal offence, defines the penalty by the 2d subsection of section 7, and leaves nothing to be done by the Fishery Board except to enforce the penal provision by a prosecution if they think proper. In the Act of 1895 Parliament declared that the penalty instead of being £5 should be £100, and if the Fishery Board had left the penalty clause alone, the new statute would of course have taken effect upon the bye-law. But as the board had chosen to make a penalty clause, the result is that persons charged with a contravention of the bye-law are in this dilemma—that when they are referred to the bye-law the penalty is £5, but when they are referred to the statute the penalty is £100. I do not think that an accused person can be convicted upon an indictment, the conclusions of which are, as they are in this case, altogether ambiguous. The result is, in my opinion, that the bye-law of 1892, not being in terms of the statute, is ineffective, and that no conviction can follow upon it, and therefore that the suspension must be sustained and the conviction quashed.

Lord Kincairney.—I concur, and have little to add. This is a prosecution for breach of a certain bye-law made by the Fishery Board under powers conferred by the Act 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23, 1889, the third clause of which limits the penalties for contravention of it to £5 for the first offence, and £20 for any subsequent offence—yet the conviction complained of imposes a penalty of £50. Now, the specification of a penalty may not be appropriate in such a bye-law; and no doubt it would be incompetent to impose by a bye-law a penalty which the statute has not authorised. But it is not so clear that such a bye-law may not effectually limit the penalty for a breach of it to a definite amount, if within the amount authorised by the statute; and I cannot hold that a prosecutor can be heard to plead that any part of a bye-law on which his complaint is founded can be disregarded as ultra vires or held pro non scripto. Hence I think that this bye-law, if authoritative at all, must be held, for the purposes of this suspension, to fix the maximum penalty for contravention, unless it has been altered, revoked,

No. 17.

Feb. 7, 1896.
Green v. Leith.

or repealed. It has not been altered or revoked by the Fishery Board. It retains all the authority which the Fishery Board did or could confer on it. We have not been informed that it has been expressly repealed or altered by Act of Parliament. It is true that by a subsection of the Fisheries Regulation Act of 1895 it is provided that a person contravening a bye-law referred to in that Act,—that is to say, a bye-law to be made under authority of that Act,—shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £100, and that by a singular method of legislation this subsection has been lifted bodily and placed in the Act of 1889 in room of subsection 2 of section 7 of that Act; so that it is in the anomalous position of being a subsection in both Acts, although it cannot mean the same thing in the one Act as in the other. But while subsection 2 of section 7 of the Act of 1889 is repealed, the bye-law is not repealed, which presumably it would have been if that had been intended; and I think that the Act of 1895 and the bye-law must be read together, and read consistently, if that be possible; and I rather think it is possible, although it may not be easy, to read them consistently, and for this reason, that the maximum penalty mentioned in the bye-law is within the maximum penalty authorised by the statute; and if that be so, the bye-law remains the authoritative expression of the maximum penalty for contravention if it be authoritative at all. However that may be, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that if a bye-law such as this announces a maximum penalty for a breach of it, that penalty cannot be exceeded in a conviction.

On the second and more important point my opinion is not so confident; still on that point also I concur with your Lordships, and in the reasons which your Lordships have given. I think that the bye-law founded on has not been made in the due exercise of the power and discretion conferred on the Fishery Board by the first subsection of section 7 of the Act of 1889. That subsection does not prohibit trawling over the very extensive space within the line mentioned,—a space which includes the Moray Firth, but extends very far beyond what can properly be considered as a firth, and includes parts of the ocean at a great distance from the shore,—but only in an area or areas within that space to be defined by bye-laws, and it seems to me that what the Board had to do was to define areas along the coast within that extensive space, having regard to local conditions, in a manner which may be held to be exemplified by the schedule appended to the Act. In the cases scheduled the Legislature has itself defined the areas over which the Act is to operate. In regard to the much larger space described in section 7, it has not done so, but has left it to the Fishery Board to divide that space into similar areas.

The former ground of judgment is, however, sufficient to warrant us in quashing this conviction.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the bill and heard counsel for the parties, pass the bill, suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern: Find the complainer entitled to expenses both in this Court and in the inferior Court," &c.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 18.
Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

CHARLES WILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Aberdeenshire), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Ferguson, A.-D.
WILLIAM RUST, Respondent.—Ure—Clyde.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

CHARLES WILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Aberdeenshire), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Ferguson, A.-D.
ANDREW MACKENZIE, Respondent.—Ure—Clyde.

Fishing—Sea-Fishing—Beam-Trawling—Fishery Board—Statute—Bye-law—Ultra vires—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 7.—The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 7, enacts that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness-shire, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law."

Held (by a majority of a Court of seven Judges, diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord M'Laren) that it was within the powers of the Fishery Board under this section to issue a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling in the entire area within the line specified.

Macbeth v. Ashley, June 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 708, April 17, 1874, 1 R. (H. L.) 14, distinguished.

Green v. Leith, Jan. 7, 1896, supra, p. 50, overruled.

Fishing—Sea-Fishing—Fishery Board—Statute—Bye-law—Complaint—Penalty—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 7—Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 10.—The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 1, prohibits the use of beam-trawling or otter-trawling within three miles of any part of the coast of Scotland. Sec. 7 enacts (subsec. 1) that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness-shire, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire"; and (subsec. 2) that any person fishing in contravention of such bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence.

In 1892 the Fishery Board issued a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the limits specified, and setting forth that any person acting in contravention of the bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence.

The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, sec. 10, subsec. 1, enacts that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling shall not be used in any area or areas under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty within thirteen miles of the Scottish coast"; and subsecs. 4 and 5 repeal sec. 7, subsec. 2, of the Act of 1889, and substitute for the penalties there provided a fine not exceeding £100, and failing payment imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days.

Held (1) that the portion of the bye-law relating to penalties ought not to have been included in the bye-law, and was to be regarded as nothing more than a superfluous intimation by the Fishery Board of the statutory penalties incurred by a contravention of the bye-law at the date when the bye-law was framed; (2) that the bye-law, in so far as it prohibited beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the line from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point, remained in force notwithstanding the passing of the Act of 1895; and (3) that after the passing of the Act of 1895 the penalties incurred on conviction of a contravention of the bye-law were those specified in that Act, and not those specified in the Act of 1889.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinnear.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Kyllachy.

Therefore (1) where a complaint set forth that the accused was liable to a penalty not exceeding £100, and, failing payment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, and prayed for the imposition of the penalty provided by the Act of 1895, held that the complaint was well laid; but (2) where a complaint set forth that the accused had incurred a penalty not exceeding £5, and prayed for the imposition of the penalty provided by the bye-law and by the Acts of 1889 and 1895, held that the complaint was incompetent.

Green v. Leith, Jan. 7, 1896, supra, p. 50, overruled.

IN February 1896 William Rust, master of the steam-trawler "Pride of the Humber," and Andrew Mackenzie, master of the steam-trawler "Maggie Walker," were charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen on separate complaints at the instance of Charles Wilson, W.S., procurator-fiscal, setting forth that they had been guilty of a contravention of bye-law No. 10 made by the Fishery Board for Scotland under the Sea Fisheries and Herring Fishery Acts.*

In Rust's case the complaint set forth,—"That William Rust, master or skipper on board the steam-trawler 'Pride of the Humber,' No. 231, of Hull, at present in Aberdeen, did, on 25th January 1896, at a part of the sea off the coast of Caithness, in Scotland, seven and a-half miles or thereby south-east-by-south of Ord of Caithness, by cross bearings Clythness bearing north-east-by-north and Ord of Caithness north-west-by-north, and within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, he being then the person actually in command of the said steam-trawler, and not in the service or possessing the written authority of the

---

* Bye-law No. 10, dated 27th September 1892, and confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland 22d November 1892, was in the following terms:—

"Bye-law (No. 10) made by the Fishery Board for Scotland under the powers conferred on the Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885, the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890.

"(I.) The bye-law (No. 8) made by the Fishery Board for Scotland, under date 19th July 1890, and confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland on 19th November 1890, is hereby revoked.

"(II.) Whereas by the Act 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23, being the aforesaid Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, it is enacted that the Fishery Board for Scotland may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined 'in such bye-law,' it is hereby declared that the foregoing provision shall apply to the whole of the area above specified.

"(III.) Within the aforesaid area as above defined no person, unless in the service or possessing the written authority of the said Fishery Board for Scotland under the hand of the secretary thereof, shall at any time, from the date when this bye-law shall come into force, use any beam-trawl or otter-trawl for taking sea fish; and any person acting in contravention of this bye-law shall be liable, on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, to a fine not exceeding £5 for the first offence, and not exceeding £20 for the second or any subsequent offence; and every net set or attempted to be set in contravention of the present bye-law shall be forfeited, and may be seized and destroyed, or otherwise disposed of by any superintendent of the herring fishery or other officers employed in the execution of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts, all in terms of the said Acts.

"(IV.) This bye-law shall come into force from and after the date of its confirmation by the Secretary for Scotland."

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896. Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

Fishery Board for Scotland, use the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling for taking sea fish, in contravention of bye-law No. 10, made by the said Fishery Board for Scotland, under the powers conferred on the Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885, the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1890, dated at Edinburgh 27th September 1892, confirmed by Her Majesty's Secretary for Scotland 22d November 1892, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette of 25th November 1892, a copy of the said Edinburgh Gazette being produced herewith; whereby the said William Rust is liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding £100, in terms of section 10 (4) of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, and failing immediate payment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, or to such penalty and imprisonment as your Lordship may fix, in terms of the sixth section of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."

The complaint prayed the Sheriff to convict the accused of the contravention charged, and to adjudge him to suffer "the penalty provided by the said Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, section 10 (4)."

In Mackenzie's case the complaint was mutatis mutandis in the same terms, except that it concluded,—"whereby the said Andrew Mackenzie is liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding £5, in terms of the said bye-law and of section 10, subsection (4), of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, as substituted for section 7, subsection (2), of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, or to such penalty as your Lordship may fix, in terms of the sixth section of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881"; and prayed the Sheriff to adjudge the accused to suffer "the penalty provided by the said bye-law, and by the said Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the said Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, section 10 (4)."

Rust's case was called on 6th February, when he stated the following objections to the relevancy and competency of the complaint, viz.:—

"1. That the bye-law founded on is invalid in respect it is ultra vires of the Fishery Board and not a legal exercise of their discretion under section 7, subsection 1, of the Act of 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), in so far as it professes to prohibit beam-trawling within the whole area of sea enclosed by a line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point.*

---

* The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 6, enacts,—"(1) It shall not be lawful to use the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling within three miles of low-water mark of any part of the coast of Scotland, nor within the waters specified in the schedule hereto annexed, save only between such points on the coast or within such other defined areas as may from time to time be permitted by bye-laws of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and subject to any conditions or regulations made by those bye-laws. . . ."

Sec. 7 enacts,—"(1) The Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law, and may from time to time make, alter, and revoke bye-laws for the purposes of this section, but no such bye-law shall be of any validity until it has been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland. (2) Any person who uses any such method of fishing in contravention of

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.

Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

"2. That the provisions of section 7 of the Act of 1889 are inconsistent with, repugnant to, and are repealed by the provisions of subsections 1, 2, and 3 of section 10 of the Act of 1895.

"3. That the complaint is illegal and incompetent in respect it concludes for penalties which are not authorised by the bye-law alleged to have been contravened.

"4. That in any event the penalties prescribed by subsection 4 of section 10 of the Act of 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42) are not exigible for an offence against section 7 of the Act of 1889.

"5. That in view that bye-law No. 10 specifically prescribes the penalties for an offence under section 7 of the Act of 1889, this (a) any such bye-law shall be liable, on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, to a fine not exceeding five pounds for the first offence, and not exceeding twenty pounds for the second or any subsequent offence; and every net set, or attempted to be set, in contravention of any such bye-law may be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of as in the sixth section of this Act mentioned."

---

The Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 10, enacts,—"(1) The Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling shall not be used in any area or areas under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty, within thirteen miles of the Scottish coast, to be defined in such bye-law, and may from time to time make, alter, and revoke bye-laws for the purposes of this section. Provided that the powers conferred in this section shall not be exercised in respect to any areas under Her Majesty's jurisdiction lying opposite to any part of the coasts of England, Ireland, or the Isle of Man, within thirteen miles thereof. (2) No bye-law under this section shall be confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland until he shall have directed a local inquiry to be held in the district adjoining the part of the sea to be included in the bye-law; at which inquiry all persons interested shall be heard, whether resident in the district or not; and notice of such inquiry shall be sent to all committees of sea-fishery districts in the United Kingdom. (3) Provided that no area of sea with the said limit of thirteen miles shall be deemed to be under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty for the purposes of this section unless the powers conferred thereby shall have been accepted as binding upon their own subjects with respect to such area by all the States signatories of the North Sea Convention, 1882. (4) Any person who uses any such method of fishing in contravention of any such bye-law shall be liable on conviction, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, and failing immediate payment of the fine to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or arrestment, if no imprisonment has followed on the conviction; and every net set, or attempted to be set, in contravention of any such bye-law may be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of by any superintendent of the herring fishery or other officers employed in the execution of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts. Provided always that, if no conviction shall follow, any net so seized shall be forthwith returned, and due compensation made for any loss or damage occasioned thereto by such seizure. (5) Subsection two of section seven of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, is hereby repealed, and the provisions of the foregoing subsection shall be and are hereby substituted therefor. (6) Failing payment by a certain date named in the conviction of the fine imposed upon the person or persons convicted, decree therefor may be pronounced against the owner or owners of the offending vessel or boat, and upon such decree being pronounced the person or persons convicted shall be relieved therefrom and from all penalties attaching thereto."

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896. Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

renders the bye-law invalid; or (b) prevents the exaction of the penalties prescribed by subsection 4 of section 10 of the Act of 1895.

"6. That the bye-law founded on is illegal and invalid in respect that the penalties and provisions in it are not in conformity with, or authorised by, the statutory provisions upon which it is professed to be based.

"7. That in any event there is now no penalty clause applicable to contravention of a bye-law made in terms of section 7, subsection 1, of the 1889 Act.

"8. That the bye-law founded on being based, or partly based, upon statutory provisions which have been repealed, is illegal and invalid."

Mackenzie's case was called on 4th February, when he stated objections to the relevancy and competency of the complaint, of which 1 to 6 were practically identical with objections 1, 2, 5 to 8 respectively, of those stated by Rust, and the last was in these terms:—"7. That the complaint is irrelevant and incompetent, in respect it concludes for a penalty which is not authorised by statute."

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), holding that the cases were ruled by the judgment in Green v. Leith, 7th January 1896, supra, p. 50, sustained the first and third objections stated by Rust, and the first objection stated by Mackenzie, and dismissed the complaints as irrelevant and incompetent.

At the request of the Procurator-fiscal the Sheriff-substitute stated cases under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, the questions of law in each case being (1) Whether the objections [or objection] ought to have been sustained? and (2) Whether the complaint was relevant and competent?

The cases were heard before a full bench.

Argued for the appellant;—Green v. Leith[1] was wrongly decided, and fell to be overruled. The appellant submitted in the first place that the Fishery Board had power under section 7, subsection 1, of the Act of 1889 to prohibit beam-trawling within the whole of the Moray Firth. Apart from that subsection the lieges were entitled to trawl anywhere in the Scottish seas, provided they did not trawl within the three-mile limit. The Legislature had decided that in addition to the latter prohibition there should be, where the public interest required it, a possible prohibition in every part of the whole of the Moray Firth. By section 7 the Fishery Board were empowered by bye-law to prohibit trawling within a line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point. The power thus given was a wide one. So long as they kept within that line they might protect one part and discontiguous parts or the whole of the Firth. This general power of absolute exclusion within the prescribed line was in no way restricted by the words of the section, "in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law." The meaning of these words was obvious. The Board might in their discretion decide to exclude trawling only partially, and in that case the bye-law was to define the area or areas to which the exclusion was meant to apply. It was to be assumed that the Board had made the bye-law only after careful inquiry, and if this was within their powers, then the Court could not review it. The Rothesay[2] case founded upon by the respondents was decided on

[1] Supra, p. 50.

[2] Macbeth v. Ashley, June 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 708, 45 Scot. Jur. 440, affd. April 17, 1874, 1 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.
Wilson v. Mackenzie.

a construction of a different statute, and dealt with a different scheme of administration. The principle of the case was that a power to make exceptions to a general law in relation to selected areas could not be extended so as to bring the entire district or territory within the exception. The magistrates of the burgh of Rothesay, having the power to make an exception to the general rule of closing public-houses within the burgh, under the guise of the exception abolished the general rule, and the Court held that they had acted ultra vires. Here the general rule was that the waters outside the three-mile limit round the whole coast of Scotland were free to trawlers. The exception was that the Moray Firth might be closed either wholly or in particular areas. It was obvious that here the exception could not "swallow up the rule."[1] Cadenhead v. Smart[2] was equally inapplicable. There the magistrates were clearly legislating beyond their powers.

In the second place, the appellant submitted that the respondents' second objection to the competency of the bye-law was ill founded. It was said that the bye-law was inoperative because it concluded for a penalty which had been repealed by the Act of 1895 (section 10), and that no other penalty could be enforced than that set forth in the bye-law. But the bye-law should properly have said nothing about the penalty which was fixed by the Acts. Mention of the penalty was mere surplusage. The most that could be said was that the bye-law had appended to it a statement of the law which was correct at the time it was passed but was not edited up to date. It could not be pleaded that the bye-law was misleading, for ignorantia juris neminem excusat.

In the third place, as regarded both complaints, the appellant submitted that they were well laid. In Rust's case the complaint rightly asked for the £100 penalty, because that was the penalty prescribed by the Act of 1895, which repealed subsection 2 of section 7 of the Act of 1889, the penalty clause then applicable to a contravention of the bye-law passed under the 1st subsection of that section. In Mackenzie's case the complaint was also well laid, because the only objection to it was that it craved a £5 penalty, when it would have been competent to ask for £100.

Argued for the respondents;—Green v. Leith[3] was well decided. (1) In framing the bye-law in question, the Fishery Board had exceeded their powers. Under subsection 1 of section 7 of the Act of 1889, the board were empowered to select such single or separate area within the limits designated as they thought it expedient to close to the trawler. This area was to be defined in the bye-law. There was nothing in the wording of the section to indicate that the Legislature intended to give a power of absolute exclusion in these waters. Indeed, it was clear that the board must leave some part of the Moray Firth open to trawlers. Cadenhead v. Smart[2] and the Rothesay case[1] were directly in point. In the latter case the magistrates had power by statute to close public-houses in exceptional cases at earlier hours than generally established, and they exercised their power in such a manner as to subject all the public-houses in the [1] Macbeth v. Ashley, April 17, 1874, 1 R. (H. L) 14, per Lord Chancellor Cairns, p. 18.

[2] Cadenhead v. Smart, Oct. 22, 1894, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 1.
[3] Supra, p. 50.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

burgh to those exceptional hours, thus subverting the rule under the guise of the exception. There the unit of jurisdiction was the burgh of Rothesay, just as here it was the Moray Firth within the line established by statute.

But (2) the bye-law was not operative. It specified a £5 penalty, for which section 10 of the Act of 1895 had substituted a £100 penalty. It was vain for the prosecutor to maintain that the mention in the bye-law of the penalty was mere surplusage. The bye-law was the code by which the trawler knew he had to conduct his business, and to it alone he looked for the penalty attaching to a contravention of the bye-law.

As the complaint in Rust's case charged a contravention of the bye-law, and concluded for the penalty of £100, which was in excess of the bye-law upon which it proceeded, it could not be sustained. In Mackenzie's case the complaint was also bad, because it concluded for £5, whereas the only existing penalty clause was contained in section 10 of the Act of 1895, which fixed it at £100.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The first question raised by these cases is whether the Fishery Board had power to prohibit beam-trawling within the whole of what, for shortness, may be called the Moray Firth. This question depends on the construction of the first subsection of the seventh section of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889.

The manifest and admitted effect of that subsection is to mark out the whole of the Moray Firth as the subject of exceptional legislation from that affecting the generality of the Scottish seas. So far as the Scottish seas generally were concerned, the scheme of legislation was that there was to be an absolute statutory prohibition of beam-trawling within three miles of land, but that beyond the three-mile limit no board or other authority could interfere with the freedom of fishing. In the Moray Firth, on the contrary, there was to be, plus the general three-mile prohibition, a subjection of the whole sea, or to put it so as to avoid all controversy, a subjection of every part of the whole sea, to the determination of the Fishery Board as to whether beam-trawling should be allowed there.

From the frame of the section it is to be inferred that the reason why Parliament declined itself to go further by way of definition of the limits of prohibition of trawling was that it desired that an expert and local body, —to wit the Fishery Board,—should proceed to ascertain in detail to what extent what I may call the suspected district stood in need of the exercise of the enacted remedy. To my thinking this is the result of the subsection in question, viewed as a whole. But if a closer examination of the subsection be adopted, the same result is yielded. It is, of course, not a good plan of ascertaining the meaning of an enactment to first of all take it bit by bit and consider the effect of each bit. The true method is to read it as a whole and then test the conclusion arrived at by considering the proper effect of each part in relation to the whole. But having read the whole of this subsection, I think that the true meaning is that the Legislature gave to the Fishery Board carte blanche to prohibit beam-trawling, wherever public interest required it, so long as they did not go outside the line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point. Examining the sub-

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

section analytically I find that it begins by empowering the Fishery Board to prohibit beam-trawling within the limits which I have stated. So far all is clear. But then the statute says that the Board must specify the area or areas of prohibition. Now, I think that the fair reading of these words is simply that the Board must make clear in their bye-law the geographical limits of whatever prohibition they may resolve on, so that the lieges may be in no doubt as to what is legal and what is illegal. The Board must keep inside the line from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point, but keeping within that line, they may proclaim (to use a convenient phrase) any district that they deem to require this restriction. In this view they might have proclaimed one part or two discontiguous parts of the Moray Firth, but they might also proclaim the whole. The whole, just as much as any part, is an area, and it is an area lying within, because no part of it is outside, the prescribed line of boundary. I observe, upon the word "area," that it suggests no antithesis to the whole. It is a neutral term, equally applicable to whole as to part. The only limitation is expressed, not by the word area, but by the geographical limit, on one side of which the area is to be found.

The case of Macbeth v. Ashley[1] has been referred to in support of the opposite conclusion. It is to be remarked, however, that that decision was given on a construction of a different enactment, dealing with a different scheme of administration, and expressed in different language. Under the Licensing Act which was there under consideration, no one licensing jurisdiction was singled out and designated as requiring exceptional treatment from the rest. Each licensing authority was directed to grant licences allowing liquor to be sold within what may be called the normal hours, but was permitted to consider whether within its jurisdiction some particular locality required exceptional hours. The Court of Session and the House of Lords held that the words "particular locality within" the burgh were words plainly distinguishing a part of the burgh from the whole. This conclusion, which seems entirely in consonance with the words used, was held to be largely supported by the pains taken by the Legislature in selecting these words as an improvement on the language of a previous statute which more readily admitted of the other construction. I do not think, therefore, that the Rothesay case establishes or illustrates any principle which can control or affect the construction of the words of this Herring Fishery Act, according to their natural meaning, as deduced from an examination of that statute.

I conclude, then, that the Fishery Board had power to prohibit beam-trawling within the whole of the Moray Firth. The next question is, whether the issue of the "Bye-law No. 10" was a valid exercise of that power, or is operative now, the objection stated being that the bye-law purports to enact a penalty which, in consequence of a subsequent statute, is not the penalty now in force.

In my opinion, the bye-law did not require to say anything about penalties, and ought not to have done so. Section 7, by its first subsection, authorises the Board to do one thing, and one thing only, and that

[1] 11 Macph. 708, and 1 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

is to issue a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling within a certain defined area or areas. It delegated nothing about penalties to the Fishery Board; on the contrary, it at once proceeded, by the second subsection, itself to enact the penalties which should attach to the contravention of any bye-law of the Board. Accordingly the penalties attach, not in virtue of anything the Fishery Board says about them, but in virtue of what Parliament says about them. The Fishery Board had no power to impose penalties, and they had equally little power, by anything they might publish, to affect or abate statutory penalties. The part of their bye-law which relates to penalties has no effect whatever, for the Board could neither make nor mar penalties. It is quite possible that any Court which convicts of a contravention might in its discretion mitigate the penalty to be imposed on someone who could make out that he did not know of the alteration of the penalty, and was misled by the bye-law; but this is all the effect which this misplaced announcement can have.

The remaining question is, what penalty, if any, is now exigible for the contravention of a bye-law duly made under subsection 1 of section 7 of the Act of 1889? I cannot profess to entertain doubt upon this point. The Act of 1895 repeals the second subsection of section 7 of the Act of 1889, and enacts that in substitution for it there shall be read a provision enacting a penalty of £100. Well now, unless we have been wrong in assuming, as all parties have done, that the penalty clause of 1889 (section 7, subsection 2) applied to a contravention of the bye-law provided in section 7, subsection 1, then I do not see how we can possibly hold that a penalty clause which is to be substituted for that of 1889 does not equally apply, unless in some other part of the Act of 1895 we find a repeal of that first subsection.

The argument advanced by the respondents' counsel, that the provision of the new thirteen-mile limit in the Act of 1895 abrogates the enactment about the Moray Firth, seems to me absolutely untenable. The statutes are to be read together—where any part of the former Act is set aside, this is done by repeal or express substitution; and the Moray Firth clause is not inconsistent with the general thirteen-mile limit, any more than it was with the old three-mile limit.

The conclusion which I come to on the whole matter is that the Moray Firth has been well closed against beam-trawling, and that the offence of trawling within the prohibited waters renders the offender liable to a penalty of £100. The complaint in the case of Rust was therefore well laid, and the appeal should be sustained. In the case of Mackenzie the complaint was not well laid, as it seeks to enforce penalties under an enactment which has been repealed. In Rust's case, therefore, the first question of law should be answered in the negative, as regards both objections sustained by the Sheriff, and the second in the affirmative. In Mackenzie's case both questions ought to be answered in the negative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is, I think, most satisfactory that this question, important in itself, and which has a very special interest for a large portion of our industrial community, should have received the consideration of a full bench, the more so as I understand that the opinion which has just been expressed is that of all the Judges who did not hear the former case, and must be held to correct a decision which was arrived at by a smaller number. It would have been most undesirable that a matter on which it must now be held that the former judgment was ill founded should have been left to stand decided by an ordinary quorum of the Court. Although, therefore, I feel unable to concur in the judgment proposed in the case of Rust, which corresponds to the case formerly dealt with,—the case of Green[1]—I am glad that there was opportunity for reconsidering the matter, so that it might be, as it will be now, finally and authoritatively decided.

The statute which has to be considered in this case is one not for regulating procedure in regard to any matters in relation to acts in themselves of a criminal nature. It deals with a certain lawful industry, open to be prosecuted in the exercise of the ordinary rights of the citizens to fish in the waters of the sea. It has been thought expedient to restrict that liberty, and to forbid its exercise in certain parts of the sea around our coasts, the restriction being enforced by such fishing being made a criminal offence punishable by fine and imprisonment. The general rule is liberty, the exception is created by the statute and remitted to the Fishery Board for practical ascertainment. When liberty in the exercise of a lawful calling is to be curtailed by exceptional legislation, and heavy penalties, enforceable against the subject by the alternative of imprisonment, are to be imposed to ensure obedience to the new and restrictive law, it is only bare justice that the restrictive provisions should be construed as favourably to the liberty of the subject as their terms may admit of.

In this particular case, the provision which is being dealt with is one which creates an essential difference between the restrictions imposed upon the same industry in one part of the sea opposite our coast, and those which are imposed in other parts of the sea. For while elsewhere the restriction upon beam-trawling is limited to the territorial waters and certain scheduled waters of limited extent, the provision under consideration enables a public body, the Fishery Board, to impose restrictions within a part of the sea of vast extent, and extending far out into the practically open ocean for a very considerable number of miles, with the necessary result that if the Board of Fisheries exercises its power to any substantial extent, the lawful industry of beam-trawling is interfered with to a much more serious extent than can be the case throughout the other water surrounding Scotland. This, of course, must be submitted to, as the Legislature has in its wisdom seen fit so to enact. But such a case is one above all others in which, unless of necessary construction of clear words, an interpretation should not be given which will bring about a maximum of restriction on liberty.

Now, the words of the clause which your Lordship has quoted, if they were intended to express what is contended for here by the appellant, seem to me to be very ill chosen. It is to me difficult to conceive that any parliamentary draughtsman, who had to express the intention to give power to the Fishery Board to shut up the whole extent of the Moray Firth against the trawlers, should have used the form of words which is found in this clause. Reading the clause, as it must be read, without

[1] Supra, p. 50.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

regard to mere printers' punctuation, it seems to me to be a clause giving power to the Fishery Board to select such single area or such separate areas within the waters designated as they may think it expedient for the purpose of the Act to close to the trawler, and that it does not suggest the idea that anything beyond selection is intended. If it was intended to give a power which would enable the administering body to suppress trawling altogether in the whole of this part of the sea—to leave no part of this vast tract to the industry to be restricted, and thus to close this large part of the coast of Scotland to the industry altogether—it would have been easy so to express the clause. It almost looks as if pains had been taken to avoid the use of simple and clear words, on the assumption that this was intended. We are accustomed in parliamentary and legal language to such expressions as "in whole or in part," or to have a whole stated and the limiting words "or any part thereof" added. Such expressions are clear, intelligible, and unambiguous, and in ordinary form. Here the expressions used are novel and, in my judgment, ill adapted to express the idea that power was given to stop the industry of beam-trawling in all and every part of the Moray Firth. If the words will bear that meaning, it would I think be difficult to choose words which, while capable of being so read, could obscure their intent more.

I am bound now, contrary to my own view, to yield and to admit that they can be so read, seeing that it is the opinion of the large majority of this Bench that they should be so read. But I am unable altogether to assent to the view that they are not open to another construction—the construction which brings their effect more into harmony with the legislation in the matter of beam-trawling which is applied to the rest of the country. I cannot assent to the view which was put forward by the Solicitor-General, that because it might be difficult to mark off areas which would be sufficient, and carry out the desire of the Legislature, therefore large areas which did not require to be forbidden to the trawler should be closed to him, and that the Legislature intended that the great Moray Firth should be closed altogether to trawl-fishing because of any such difficulties. I must assume that Parliament did not desire to stop beam-trawling in any area in which it could not be injurious to those interests which they desired to protect, and that they did not intend that any area should be closed merely because leaving it open might raise difficulties as to the evidence necessary to prove an offence in some other area, and I see nothing strained or artificial in a construction of the words which restricts them to the defining of areas within the tract designated in the sense of selected areas by which the other interests shall be protected without the restricted industry being absolutely suppressed.

As I stated in the former case, I arrived at the conclusion which was then expressed on my own view as to how the words of the Act might be construed; but if they may be so construed then it is plain that they must be so construed. For an Act converting what is in itself lawful into a crime in particular circumstances must be read in the most restricted sense its words are capable of bearing. I must add that the Rothesay case—Ashley v. Macbeth[1]—seemed to me to be in point. No

[1] 1 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

doubt the word "particular" occurs in the Act in that case, but I do not think that the view of the Lord Chancellor proceeded on any hypercritical dealing with the words. It proceeded upon a broad principle, which I think is applicable to this case, that where a power is given to a public authority to exercise a discriminating judgment, and to deal exceptionally to what is the general law, that power is not legitimately exercised by making it practically to apply to the whole area within which the discriminating power is to be exercised. At the same time I feel bound to say that I feel there is considerable force in the view your Lordship has expressed in criticism of the applicability of that case as a precedent. Still I think it is in any view valuable as indicating that restrictive legislation is to be strictly and critically dealt with, and in that view of it its applicability to this case is not in my view doubtful.

The other point regarding the subsection of the bye-law which professes to impose a penalty of £5 is not of much consequence, as of course any difficulty can easily be got rid of by the rescinding of the subsection, and I confess I am at a loss to understand why this has not been done, instead of raising another case to try the question—the question thus being whether they may not go on to prosecute for very high penalties, while they still keep in their bye-law a provision inconsistent with such penalty being exacted. But I must say that my view is, that where a body has conferred upon it what are practically statutory powers, as is done in this matter by empowering the Fishery Board to do that which in ordinary circumstances could only be done by Act of Parliament, anything which it enacts or professes to enact cannot be held to be mere surplusage in a question of public prosecution, if it tends to mislead in essential particulars those who may become liable to prosecution. In such a case as this it is practically the Fishery Board who are the prosecutors, as the procurator-fiscal necessarily takes up these cases to enforce and carry out what appertains to this Government Department. And if steps are taken by such a Department, which practically tend to entrap members of the public, by misrepresenting the Department's powers and giving notices which are misleading, such a course may make it an injustice to deal with a person accused upon a different footing than that which has been imposed upon him by the responsible public body. I doubt if such an objection can in every case be dealt with by enforcing the maxim that everyone is bound to know the law. It is an equally sound maxim that there can be no justice where those in places of authority mislead the citizen as to his position. But it is unnecessary to deal with that matter, for the reason which I have stated already. It is plainly the only fair course for the Fishery Board to have any bye-law which it has published at once rescinded when such bye-law is contrary to an Act of Parliament subsequently passed.

I concur with your Lordship in thinking that in the case of Mackenzie, there being no statutory authority for the penalty there concluded for, the appeal should be dismissed. In the case of Rust I must dissent from the judgment which is proposed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord Justice-General for the reasons his Lordship has given.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

I by no means dissent from the view which was expressed in Green's[1] case, that the Legislature has not conferred upon the Fishery Board an arbitrary discretion to prohibit trawling in any part of the Moray Firth they please, but has imposed upon them a duty to discriminate, and to prohibit trawling in the waters which have been brought within their discretion in so far only as in their judgment such prohibition may be expedient or necessary for the purposes for which their statutory powers are conferred. But we must assume that a board to which Parliament has committed such very important functions has done its duty, and that the bye-law in question is not an arbitrary prohibition, but is the expression of the deliberate judgment of the proper authority on all the conflicting considerations which it was proper to take into account, and which, of course, are much better known to the Fishery Board which framed the bye-law, and to the Minister who confirmed it, than they can possibly be to this Court. The only question for us to consider is whether the bye-law when it is brought into comparison with the Act of Parliament is or is not in excess of the powers of the Board. The only limit which Parliament has laid upon the exercise of those powers in so far as regards the area over which they extended is defined by a line drawn from Duncansby Head in Caithness to Rattray Point in Aberdeenshire. I am unable to find anything in the clause from which to infer that the area to be defined by the Board is in no event to exhaust the entire area within the line drawn by the Act, and in every event to leave some undefined stretch of water within the line free and open to trawlers. The Act allows two alternatives to the Board. They may either define several separate and distinct areas within the line, and in that case some part of the Firth—more or less in extent—will necessarily be excluded from the definition, and will therefore be open water, or else they may define the entire area, and in that case, which is the alternative the Board has adopted, there is no limit to the area they may define, except the line from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point. If the area they have defined goes beyond that line they have exceeded their powers. If it is within the line it is not for this Court to consider whether it does or does not exclude water which, as a question of sound policy, ought not to have been closed, or which cannot be effectually closed against trawlers. But it is manifest that it does not at any point transgress the line laid down by the Act, and therefore it is within the power conferred upon the Board.

I agree that when new powers are conferred by Parliament upon an executive board or on a local authority to make ordinances for any public purpose, it is not enough to say that the letter of such ordinances does not violate the strict language of the empowering enactment if in substance it is contrary to the expressed intention of the statute. The case of Macbeth v. Ashley[1] is a valuable illustration of that principle. But then in that case Parliament had laid down a general rule for licensing magistrates, and had authorised them to depart from it only in particular cases, where a different and exceptional arrangement might be required. It was held to be a violation of the statute that magistrates, under colour of making specific regulations for particular cases, but without in fact giving any con-

[1] Supra p. 50.

[1] 11 Macph. 708, and 1 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 18.
Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.
Wilson v. Mackenzie.

sideration to the special circumstances which might differentiate one case from another, should apply to the entire district under their control the treatment which Parliament meant to be exceptional, to the practical abrogation of the general rule. I cannot see that that decision is applicable to the present case. Parliament has marked out a specific area for exceptional treatment at the discretion of the Fishery Board. They are not required to lay down any general rule. But they are to determine the limits within the area marked out by Parliament to which the exceptional treatment should be confined. I find nothing in this Act to suggest that their definition is to cover a part or parts only of the area apparently submitted to their discretion as a whole.

On the second point I agree with the Lord Justice-General, and have nothing to add.

LORD M'LAREN.—After giving my best consideration to the case I cannot say that the reasons which were given in the judgment in Green v. Leith[1] for refusing effect to the bye-law of the Fishery Board have been displaced.

I assent to the proposition that the Moray Firth is marked out in the recent statute as the subject of exceptional treatment with respect to the mode of fishing; but the question remains, what is the extent of the exceptional powers which were given to the Fishery Board for the regulation of trawling?

Now, the 6th section of the Act (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23) prohibits beam-trawling within three miles of the low-water mark on any part of the Scottish coast, and also within certain waters specified in a schedule to the Act, and if it had been intended that trawling should be prohibited within the whole range of the Moray Firth, the natural way of doing this would have been to schedule the Moray Firth, defining it, if necessary, by a line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point. Again, it would have been very easy to give the power which is supposed to be given, by empowering the Fishery Board to prohibit trawling within the Moray Firth or any part thereof. But this would have been a much stronger interference with a lawful industry than what is contemplated in the 6th section; and it is not to be assumed that Parliament would have approved of the prohibition of trawling in this large tract of open sea, especially when it is considered that the prohibition could only be enforced against British ships.

Coming now to the power actually given to the Fishery Board, under the 7th section of the Act, it appears to me that this power is carefully limited so as to exclude the supposition that the entire area might be prohibited. The section in fact marks out a double limitation of the powers of the Fishery Board. It is first said that the bye-law may direct that beam-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point; and then there is the further limitation "in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law." The prohibition then is to apply to a defined area or defined areas within the specified line, that is, within the Moray Firth as marked out by a line drawn through two points. Now, I

[1] Supra, p. 50.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

am unable to admit that the Moray Firth can be within itself; or, to put the case more generally, that an area to be defined within another area can be coincident with the larger area. On the contrary, I conceive that the words I have quoted are limiting words, and that under this power the Fishery Board must leave some part of the Moray Firth open to the trawling industry.

I grant that a power may be given in such terms that it may be exercised up to the limit; but then we are dealing with the intention of the Legislature in the particular case, and it seems to me that the expression "area or areas to be defined in such bye-law" must have been chosen with the intention of excluding such a comprehensive order as we are considering, and with the design of imposing on the Fishery Board the duty of defining the particular areas from which trawlers were to be excluded.

In my opinion in Green v. Leith[1] I stated that my interpretation of the statute was independent of anything that could be deduced from previous decisions; and therefore it is not displaced by shewing that the judgment of Lord Cairns in the Rothesay case includes elements that are not present in this case. At the same time I may say that I regard the opinion of that great lawyer as equivalent to a protest against the undue extension of statutory powers by local authorities or public boards. My opinion, of course, is given with all necessary reserve, because I understand that a majority of the Court is of opinion that the bye-law is within the scope of the statutory definition.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur so entirely in all that your Lordship in the chair has said that any opinion separately expressed by me must needs be more or less repetition. But as the question before us is one of public importance and interest I may state briefly the view which I take of it.

By the Act of 1889, section 7, the Fishery Board were authorised, by bye-law issued by them, to direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling should not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point "in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law." In pursuance of this authority the bye-law No. 10 now in question was duly issued, by which the Fishery Board prohibited trawling "in the whole of the area above specified." It is objected to this bye-law that it exceeds the power conferred by the statute in respect that it has prohibited trawling within the whole area, whereas the statute (as is contended) only contemplated and authorised such prohibition in part thereof —"any area or areas"—defined by the bye-law. I agree in thinking that this contention cannot be sustained. The fair reading of the statutory provision, as it appears to me, is that the Fishery Board may, if it thinks fit, direct that trawling is not to be allowed within the prescribed line at all, and that accordingly a bye-law to that effect was within their competency. The absolute exclusion of trawling within the prescribed line was, I think, the primary purpose of the statutory provision, provided always that the Fishery Board was of opinion that such absolute exclusion was the proper course to adopt. The words "in any area or areas to be

[1] Supra, p. 50.

No. 18.
Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.
Wilson v. Mackenzie.

defined in such bye-law" were not restrictions on the general power which the earlier words, in my opinion, conferred, but were merely meant to point out the duty of the Fishery Board in the event of their coming to the conclusion that trawling was not to be absolutely, but only partially, excluded within the prescribed line. In the case of partial prohibition it was right that the bye-law should define the area or areas to which it was meant to apply, as otherwise it would be impossible for those persons engaged in trawling to know when and where they were violating the bye-law, or when and where they were within the permission to trawl. If the earlier part of the clause authorised, as I think it did, the prohibition of trawling over the whole area within the prescribed line, I cannot read the words which immediately follow as limiting that general power; to do so would be to read one part of the clause as to some extent inconsistent with the other. But such a construction as I have adopted admits of the whole clause being read in harmony. The power to exclude absolutely is given, but if not absolute but partial prohibition were resolved on, then the parts to which the prohibition applied were to be defined. I think the bye-law in question was in all respects conform to the terms and requirements of the Act.

It is said that the terms of the statute imply that the prohibition of trawling should not extend over the whole prescribed area, not only because of the words "in any area or areas," &c., but because the prohibition is to refer to an area "within" the line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point; and that anything within another is necessarily less than that other. Your Lordship has already pointed out that if the words of the statute are to be so critically examined, they do or may describe the whole area, it being certainly an area not outside of the prescribed line, and therefore within it. But I think it may also be said that the word "within" was not intended to indicate limitation, so much as to afford description, and its use, in the immediate connection in which it is used, appears to me to make this plain. There is a line drawn from one well-known point to another, both on the coast. When trawling is prohibited within that line, I think it means trawling between that line and the coast, the water coastward from the line being within or inside of the line, and the water seaward being not within but outside the line.

If I am right in the view I have expressed, the distinction between this case and the case of Ashley v. Macbeth[1] (founded on by the respondents) is obvious. In Ashley's case there was no general power of early closing conferred upon the magistrates. The general rule as to closing was prescribed by statute, and magistrates were only authorised in any "particular locality" to alter the statutory provision. The statute afforded the rule—the magistrates might make exception to it. In this case, the statute leaves the general rule to be laid down by the Fishery Board, requiring only that whatever the Board shall determine in reference to the application of that rule shall be made clear in any order they may issue.

It is said, however, that the bye-law in question has ceased to be operative because the section of the Act of 1889 under the authority of [1] 11 Macph. 708, 1 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 18.

Feb. 29, 1896.
Wilson v. Rust.

Wilson v. Mackenzie.

which it was issued, has been repealed. That is a mistake. The first subsection of the 7th clause of the Act of 1889, by which the Board are authorised to issue bye-laws, has not been repealed either directly or by implication. The second subsection of that clause has been repealed, but that subsection deals only with the penalty incurred by a contravention of the bye-law, not with the bye-law itself; and in place of the subsection so repealed another clause has been enacted.

And this brings me to notice the only other objection maintained by the respondents to the bye-law which requires attention. In the bye-law we are dealing with there was a clause intimating that anyone contravening the same would be liable in a penalty not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for any subsequent offence. That was a correct statement of the statutory penalty as the law stood at the date when the bye-law was issued, but is incorrect as the law now stands. The penalty now incurred by a contravention of the bye-law is a sum not exceeding £100. In these circumstances the respondents maintain that the bye-law is inoperative, because the only penalty mentioned in the bye-law having been repealed, the bye-law contains no sanction, and that under this bye-law no other penalty could be concluded for or enforced except that which the bye-law has set forth.

This argument proceeds upon the view that the intimation of the penalty to be incurred by contravention of the bye-law is a part (and indeed essential part) of the bye-law itself. This, however, is not so. The Fishery Board had no authority to make any bye-law about the penalty. That was fixed by statute in 1889 as it was again by the statute in 1895. The clause in the bye-law regarding the amount of the penalty was of no authority; it was nothing more than a mere notice of what the statute had then fixed, and was no more a part of the bye-law than if it had been appended as a note to the bye-law, or been published separately from it. The altogether unauthorised statement about the penalty did not invalidate the bye-law as authorised by statute. As I have said, it was no part of the bye-law.

Nor is the bye-law without sanction. The Act of 1895 repealing the formerly existing penalty clause has enacted another which is "substituted therefor." We have therefore a good bye-law with a statutory sanction, and for a contravention of the one the other may be concluded for and enforced.

The result of my opinion is that the complaint against the respondent Rust is both competent and relevant, and that the objections taken thereto should have been repelled. The complaint against Mackenzie was, I think, incompetent, as it concluded for a penalty other than the statutory penalty.

LORD ADAM and LORD KYLLACHY concurred in the opinion of the LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.

THE following interlocutors were pronounced:—

In the case of Rust—"Answer the first question in the case in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative:

Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge: Find no expenses due." No. 18.

In the case of Mackenzie—"Answer both questions in the case in the negative: Dismiss the appeal, and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses," &c. Feb. 29, 1896. Wilson v. Rust. Wilson v. Mackenzie.

CROWN AGENT—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS GEORGE TEESDALE, Complainer.—Salvesen—W. Thomson. HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—C. N. Johnston, A.-D. No. 19. Mar. 17, 1896. Teesdale v. H. M. Advocate.

Conviction—Verdict—Alternative charge and general conviction—Post-Office Offence—Stealing or secreting letters—Post-Office Offences Acts Consolidation Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 26.—The 26th section of the Post-Office Offences Acts Consolidation Act, 1837, enacts "that every person employed under the Post-Office who shall steal, or shall for any purpose whatever embezzle, secrete, or destroy, a post letter" shall be guilty of a high crime and offence.

Held that the alternative statements in this enactment were not statements of proper alternative offences, but were only specifications of different modes in which the statutory offence might be committed, and therefore that a general verdict of guilty as libelled on an indictment setting forth that the accused did "steal or secrete a post letter," contrary to the Act, was a good verdict.

ON 15th November 1895, Thomas George Teesdale, lately telegraph messenger in the post-office at Dalbeattie, was tried in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright before the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) and a jury, on an indictment at the instance of the Lord Advocate, the charge against the accused being "that on the 12th day of August 1895, being employed under the Post-Office, you did, in the Post-Office at Dalbeattie aforesaid, steal or secrete a post letter containing a postal order for 10s. 6d., contrary to the Act 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 36, sec. 26." * HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. M'Laren. Lord Kincairney.

The jury returned this verdict:—"The jury, by a majority, find the panel guilty as libelled, but strongly recommend him to the leniency of the Court on account of his age and the temptation thrown in his way by easy access to the post letters, and his previous good character."

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced a sentence of imprisonment for two calendar months.

Teesdale brought a bill of suspension and liberation against the Lord Advocate and the procurator-fiscal, and was liberated ad interim on caution.

He pleaded;—The charge in the indictment being an alternative one and the conviction being a general one, the complainer is entitled to have the sentence quashed, and to liberation.

After hearing the parties,[1] the Court made avizandum on 7th January 1896.

---

* The Post-Office Offences Acts Consolidation Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 26, enacts—"And be it enacted, that every person employed under the Post-Office who shall steal, or shall for any purpose whatever embezzle, secrete, or destroy, a post letter, shall in England and Ireland be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and shall" be punishable as therein stated.

[1] Authorities cited by the Complainer.—Murray v. M'Dougall, Feb. 7,

No. 19. At advising,—

Mar. 17, 1896. Teesdale v. H. M. Advocate.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case before us relates to the department of the Post-Office, in regard to which the Legislature has passed highly penal enactments for the protection of the public against dishonesty on the part of the officials employed. Every such case is of great importance, both because of the obvious necessity of safeguarding the public against criminal interference with correspondence, for the transmission of which Parliament has given a monopoly to the department, and also because of the severity of the punishments which have been authorised to prevent such criminal interference. It is therefore important that any legal decision to be given upon any substantial question relating to the carrying out of the Post-Office Acts should be given only after most mature and careful consideration. When the present case was heard it was thought desirable that the practice in similar cases should be looked into before it was decided, and accordingly this has been done; and along with your Lordships I have anxiously considered both the argument and the precedents, and it is satisfactory to know that the conclusion at which I arrived concurs with that of both your Lordships upon your own consideration of the case, and has been confirmed by final consultation. It is the same conclusion which seemed to me to be the right one at the close of the debate, and although a somewhat unusually long time has been allowed to elapse since that debate, I do not think that this is cause for regret in the circumstances, for the reason I have already stated.

It is by section 26 of the Post-Office Statute enacted,—"That every person employed under the Post-Office who shall steal, or shall for any purpose whatever embezzle, secrete, or destroy, a post letter shall . . . be guilty . . . of a high crime and offence," punishable as there stated.

The present question really is whether these different statements are truly alternative to one another, so that a charge setting forth that the accused did "steal" or "secrete," being in the form of the words alternative, a general verdict of guilty is bad, and a sentence following upon it must be quashed. That such is the law in regard to any case in which a general verdict is returned where what are truly alternative charges are made is beyond doubt. If a person was accused, say of theft or alternatively of reset under the old form of indictment, a general verdict of guilty as libelled would have been inept, for it would be impossible to know of which of two crimes the accused was convicted, and he could not logically be convicted of two inconsistent crimes upon the same species facti; and accordingly under the old form of indictment a charge which set forth such words as these:—You did wickedly and feloniously steal and theftuously away take, or did reset and receive the said watch, well knowing the same to have been stolen—would have been hopelessly irrelevant and inconsistent with 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, 5 Coup. 215; Reaney v. Maddevar, Nov. 22, 1883, 5 Coup. 367; Bell v. M'Phee, July 18, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 78, 5 Coup. 312. Authorities cited by the Respondents.—O'Neill v. Campbell, July 18, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 76, 5 Coup. 305; Macnaughton v. Maddevar, Nov. 12, 1884, 5 Coup. 509; Maxwell v. Marsland, Jan. 28, 1889, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 48, 2 White, 176.

---

No. 19.

Mar. 17, 1896.
Teesdale v. H. M. Advocate.

established practice, as stating practically in one charge two different crimes which could not be proved by proof of the same facts. Where the prosecutor was uncertain whether his evidence would substantiate theft or reset he was under the necessity of stating the alternatives in separate charges prefacing the second alternative by the words "or otherwise." It was this setting forth of complete alternative charges which led to indictments being often drawn out to inordinate length in order to meet the contingency of the evidence tending to prove one kind of crime of dishonesty rather than another, an inconvenience which was obviated by the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887, under which a verdict may be returned on an indictment for one kind of dishonest appropriation, of guilt of another crime of dishonesty, as, for example, a conviction of reset where the charge is one of theft. But for that enactment, indictments stating alternatives specifically would still be necessary, and the alternatives would require to be set forth in separate charges. Now, when we look at the practice which has been followed in cases under the Post-Office Statute, we find that the practice under the old law before 1887 has not been to state the different forms of crime under such a section as that we are dealing with as separates charges. On the contrary, the invariable practice has been to state any alternatives in the words of the statute in one charge. So far back as the year 1840 I find that in an indictment against George Munro[1] the charge stated "you did steal or did embezzle or secrete the said letter." This was a case before the High Court, the quorum of which then was a bench of three Judges. There was no objection taken, and a general plea of guilty was accepted and sentence pronounced. Again, in 1842, in the case of Daniel Peddie,[2] the accused was charged that he did "steal, embezzle, or secrete, or wilfully detain or delay." There also no objection was taken, and an interlocutor of relevancy pronounced, and a plea of guilty, without the words "stealing or embezzling," thus leaving the charge as one of secreting or wilfully detaining or delaying, was accepted and followed by sentence. Then in 1856, in the case of Henry Goldwye,[3] indicted in the High Court before a bench of three Judges, the charge stated, "you did wickedly and feloniously steal, or, for some wicked purpose to the prosecutor unknown, did embezzle or secrete." Here the indictment having been found relevant, the accused pleaded generally to this and other charges. These are specimen cases of many which have occurred during the space of more than half a century which has elapsed since the Post-Office Statute was passed, and it does not appear that till very recently any question of relevancy was raised, or objection to conviction taken, on the ground that the charges were not stated as proper alternatives, or that a general conviction following on such charges could not be made ground for sentence as being a general conviction on alternative charges. It is not until 1888 that any trace is to be found of objection to such a charge under the statute. The objection was taken in that year in the case of Joseph M'Gregor,[4] and was answered by a statement of universal practice, and as this could not be disputed the objection was accordingly repelled.

It is thus plain that indictments containing the alternative statements in the statute have been sustained as constituting a relevant charge of the statutory offence under the section in question, and that it has thus been recognised that these are not truly charges of an alternative nature, but only specifications of different modes in which the statutory offence may be constituted. Further, it has also plainly been held in practice that a general verdict on such a charge is a good verdict, on the ground that if the tribunal is satisfied that a letter has been criminally treated, and thus not handed on by the official in proper course for delivery to the addressee, but criminally stopped in its course, the statutory crime has been committed in one or other of the modes specified, it being a matter of no consequence which was the mode, and a prosecutor not being required to substantiate what was the particular mode.

[1] 2 Swinton, 498. [2] 1 Broun, 238. [3] 2 Irv. 494. [4] 1 White, 211.

No. 19.

Mar. 17, 1896. Teesdale v. H. M. Advocate.

That such has been the established practice in the case of a statutory offence which has been very often made the basis of prosecution in the Supreme Court, would in my judgment be sufficient ground for holding that the question had been considered and authoritatively dealt with in the past, and that the course taken upon it should not be lightly interfered with, even if upon an abstract view it might be thought that there were grounds for doubting the soundness of the established practice. But I feel bound to say that the practice seems to me to be sound in itself. The purpose of the Legislature in making these enactments was to protect the correspondence of the citizens from being tampered with in any way by the officials through whose hands it had to pass, and to make it a high crime and offence to do any act of any kind, and let the motive be what it might, whether theftuous, malicious, or only unconscientious, or the result of carelessness or laziness, which should stop or delay the regular transmission of post letters from the persons committing them to the post-office officials to the persons to whom they were addressed. It is the dealing with a letter contrary to duty undertaken which is the offence, and the various expressions used in the statute only express varieties of action by which the statutory offence may be committed. Under the statute they are all equally heinous, and evidence which will satisfy the tribunal that the statutory offence has been committed is sufficient for conviction of that offence, although there might be doubt or obscurity as to the question which was the exact detail of the mode of committing it, as, for instance, between stealing or secreting, as in this case, or detaining or destroying. The accused may be the only person who knows the exact mode in which he has criminally dealt with the letter. The purpose is to prevent post letters being stopped in their course of transit for delivery, with intention, and it is sufficient that the evidence leaves no doubt that by one or more of the acts specified the guilt of contravening the statute has been incurred.

I am therefore of opinion that this suspension should be refused.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the bill, and decern."

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

MRS JANE LEE OR SMITH, Complainer.—W. Thomson.
GEORGE NEILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Glasgow Police Court), Respondent.—Lees—J. B. Young.

No. 20.

Mar. 18, 1896.
Smith v. Neilson.

Fortune-telling—Complaint—Relevancy—Statutory Offence—Intent to deceive—Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, sec. 4—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 15.—The Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, by its 4th section (which was extended to Scotland by the 15th section of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871), enacts that "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects," shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond within the meaning of the Act, and shall be punishable as therein provided.

A woman was charged in a Police Court with a contravention of the above enactment, in so far as she did, at a time and place specified, "pretend to tell the fortunes of" a person named "who was thereby induced to pay to the said accused" the "sum of sixpence." The accused was convicted of the contravention "as libelled," and brought a suspension.

The Court quashed the conviction, holding that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it did not set forth that the accused had pretended to tell fortunes with intent to deceive and impose on any one.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

ON 4th February 1896 Jane Lee or Smith, residing at 42 New City Road, Glasgow, was charged in the Northern Police Court, Glasgow, on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that she "has contravened the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, particularly section 15 thereof; and the Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chapter 83, particularly section 4 thereof, as amended and made applicable to Scotland by the said Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871,—in so far as the said Jane Lee or Smith (1) did on 25th January 1896, within the premises occupied by George Smith, her husband, at 42 New City Road, Glasgow, pretend to tell the fortune of Jane Allan, of 26 George Street, Glasgow, who was thereby induced to pay to the said Jane Lee or Smith the sum of sixpence; and (2)," then followed another charge in similar terms, "whereby the said Jane Lee or Smith is liable to be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of said Acts, and to be committed to prison with hard labour for any term not exceeding three calendar months." *

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint. The objection was repelled. She then pleaded not guilty, but was convicted "of both charges of pretending to tell fortunes, being a contra-

---

* The Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, sec. 4, enacts that every person committing anyone of a variety of offences, thirteen in all, should be deemed a rogue and a vagabond, and on conviction be punishable as therein stated. Among these offences was the following:—"Every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects."

The Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, was, by section 22 thereof, declared not to extend to Scotland, but by section 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), section 4 of the Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, was extended to Scotland in language which was held so to extend the whole of section 4, and not merely the portion specially dealt with in section 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act—See M'Lean v. Murdoch, Dec. 23, 1882, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 34, 5 Coup. 193.

No. 20.
Mar. 18, 1896.
Smith v. Neilson.

vention of the Act fifth George the Fourth, chapter 83, particularly section 4 thereof, and the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, particularly section 15 thereof, all as libelled," and was decerned "to be a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of the said Acts," and fined ten shillings and sixpence, with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment.

She brought a suspension, pleading, inter alia, that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that "section 4 of 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, only makes it an offence to tell fortunes if any of Her Majesty's subjects be deceived or imposed on. There is no statement in the said complaint, nor in the said conviction, that the said subjects were deceived or imposed on. The complaint and conviction do not disclose an offence known to the law."

The respondent maintained that the words in the statute "deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects," qualified only the portion beginning "or using any subtle," &c., and not the words "pretending or professing to tell fortunes," which, sua natura, implied deceit, and imported an offence in itself.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There have been several objections taken to this conviction, but there is only one which I think it necessary to notice. Under the 4th clause of the Act of Parliament of 1824, which is now part of the law of Scotland, it is enacted that "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects," shall be guilty of an offence. The complaint here was objected to on the ground that it is irrelevant in respect that while it alleges against the accused that she did pretend to tell the fortune of a particular person, it is not alleged that she did so with intent "to deceive and impose." Now, it was argued—and there is a great deal to be said for the argument—that the Act might be read on this footing, that these words "to deceive and impose" refer only to the latter part of this subsection of the clause "or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise," and that the pretending to tell fortunes is a crime by itself, implying that there was an intention to deceive and impose, and that therefore there was no need for these words as applicable to the first part of this section. I am inclined to read these words "to deceive and impose" as applicable to the whole of this subsection. I see no reason in the form of the words for holding that it is not. If that be so, then a complaint, charging a person merely with pretending or professing to tell fortunes, omits what the statute has put in as part of what is necessary to be proved, and therefore part of what must be averred. I think that here the complaint should have contained an allegation of the intent to deceive and impose. On that ground it seems to me that the complaint is bad, and that we ought to quash the conviction.

It is not a matter of very serious moment, for this is only a single case, and for the future it is only a question of adding five or six words to the complaint. I am quite clear that if the words "with intent to deceive and impose" had been added the complaint would not have been open to objection.

[1] Monk v. Hilton, 1877, L. R., 2 Exchcq. Div. 268; Penny v. Hanson, 1887, L. R., 18 Q. B. Div. 478.

No. 20.

Mar. 18, 1896.
Smith v. Neilson.

LORD YOUNG.—I confess that from the moment I read it I thought that this charge was bad, and that therefore the conviction was bad. We were informed that this is the first prosecution in Scotland for pretending to tell fortunes. The 4th clause of the Act of George IV., it is said—and I have no doubt accurately—was made applicable to Scotland twenty-five years ago, but it was not till 1882 that it was decided—and then not without difficulty—that the whole of the clause was made applicable to Scotland.[1] During these twenty-five years this is the first instance of any prosecution of the kind, and I should almost venture to express the hope that it may be the last. It is, of course, true that a professed fortune-teller may commit roguery or knavery through the exercise of that profession just as anyone else may commit a roguery or knavery. But when you have a case of a professed fortune-teller committing roguery or knavery against those who require—that is, really deceiving and imposing upon weak people who require—the protection of the law, the charge ought to state that what he did was knavish or roguish, and amounted to an offence. It has never been imagined, so far as I ever heard, or thought, that writing, publishing, or selling books on the lines of the hand, or even on astrology—the position of stars at birth and the rules on which astrologers proceed in telling fortunes therefrom—I say I have never heard that publishing or selling such books is an offence, or that reading such books and telling fortunes therefrom is an offence. Roguery or knavery might be committed that way, but it would be a special case.

There is the word "pretend" used, but the case for the prosecutor here is that it is not necessary that there should be an intent to deceive and impose upon. Indeed, everything here is consistent with the fact that the person who told the fortune had no belief in the thing herself, and knew that the person who gave 6d. had no belief in the thing either. That was the prosecutor's view, we are told by the counsel who represents him, and that was the view on which the conviction proceeded. So that it really comes to this, that anyone telling fortunes by reading the lines on the hand is guilty of roguery and vagabondry, and liable under this section to its penalties. I think that that is extravagant, and I therefore repeat that as this is the first conviction of the kind in twenty-five years, I hope it will be the last attempted. When I say this, I am not in any way suggesting that a spae-wife or anyone else may not through that means commit knavery and deception, and so be liable to punishment.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the view which your Lordship in the chair has expressed is sufficient for the decision of the case, and in that view I concur, and I have nothing to add.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Pass the bill, suspend the conviction and sentence complained of, and decern: Find the complainer entitled to expenses, which modify to ten guineas," &c.

R. G. BOWIE, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

[1] See M'Lean v. Murdoch, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 34, 5 Coup. 193.

No. 21. HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Maconochie, A.-D.—A. O. M. Mackenzie.
ELLEN ABERCROMBIE.—Ramsay.

May 7, 1896.
H. M. Advocate v. Abercrombie.

Murder—Child Murder—Culpable Homicide—Mental derangement short of insanity—Child-birth.—At the trial of a woman upon a charge of murdering her child by choking it immediately after its birth, the presiding Judge (Lord M'Laren) directed the jury that they were entitled to find the panel guilty of culpable homicide, if they were of opinion upon the evidence that her mental state at the time when the injury was inflicted, though not warranting an acquittal on the ground of insanity, was such as to make her only partially accountable for her acts.

Dingwall, Sept. 20, 1867, 5 Irvine, 466, followed.

HIGH COURT. Glasgow (Western) Circuit. Lord M'Laren.

ELLEN ABERCROMBIE, domestic servant, was indicted for the murder of her illegitimate child by choking it immediately after its birth.

She pleaded not guilty, and specially that she was insane at the date of the alleged crime.

It was proved that the accused had never had a child before, and had concealed her pregnancy and made no preparations for her confinement. It appeared from a confession made by her that the child was born during the night, that it was alive when born, that she placed her fingers either in its mouth or on its throat in order to prevent it from crying, and thereby killed it; and that she concealed the body in a box, where it was afterwards found. The appearance of the body corroborated these statements. It was also proved that accused had performed her domestic duties up to the date of her confinement without shewing any signs of mental aberration.

For the defence medical evidence was led to prove that child-birth, especially a first confinement, and when no due preparation was made, was frequently the cause of great mental disturbance amounting to insanity. There was, however, no evidence that the confinement of the accused had been of a specially difficult or painful character.

The Advocate-depute asked for a verdict of guilty of murder.

Argued for the accused;—The evidence showed that she was insane at the date of the crime charged, or if not actually insane, that she was in a state of such mental agitation as would justify a verdict of culpable homicide.[1]

LORD M'LAREN in charging the jury, after stating the import of the evidence, said:—Lord Deas went very carefully and elaborately into the subject of partial insanity as bearing on criminal responsibility, and his direction to the jury was to this effect, that where the mind of a man had been permanently weakened by alcoholic indulgence, so that he was incapable of resisting homicidal impulses, that was a circumstance which might be taken into consideration for the purpose of reducing the crime from murder to culpable homicide. It was my misfortune to have to consider a very painful case of this nature—a case where the partial mental derangement was due to a different cause; it was in fact the result of a system of persecution and maltreatment to which the man had been subjected by his fellow-workmen. In that case I advised the jury that a man whose mind had been unhinged by a long course of brutal treatment, and who suddenly turned on one of his oppressors, was not necessarily to be regarded as a wilful murderer. The state of his mind was not such as to render him irre-

[1] Dingwall, Sept. 20, 1867, 5 Irvine, 466; Granger, Sept. 14, 1878, 4 Couper, 86.

No. 21.

May 7, 1896.
H. M. Advocate v. Abercrombie.

sponsible to the law, but the jury are entitled to consider the state of the man's mind and his imperfect power of resisting the impulse in determining whether he was responsible as for a murder or only for the second degree of homicidal crime. The view suggested was taken by the jury, and a verdict of culpable homicide was returned. In the present case I fail to see anything in the history of this girl that leads me to the belief that she was either wholly or partially insane at the time of her confinement. Up to that time her conduct had been that of any ordinary servant, entirely satisfactory to her mistress. She was not eccentric or peculiar in her behaviour. The only thing in fact that attracted the attention of her mistress was the state of the girl's health, as to which she shewed some anxiety. Then you will consider whether the history of this case, and especially the amount of physical exertion the girl was able to undergo on the day after her confinement, is consistent with the theory that this was a case of very difficult or painful labour, such as might have resulted in temporary unconsciousness after giving birth to the child. All that was said on that subject, I think, by the two doctors who were examined for the prisoner—Dr Carswell and Dr Oswald—amounted to no more than this, that she might have been suffering to a degree that would cause a state of frenzy; that it might have been a case of very painful labour, and also that these nervous attacks following on a confinement sometimes arise without any apparent cause. I think I may say that it would be very unsafe to found upon these "might be's" as reasons for treating the prisoner as a person not responsible for her actions. Neither Dr Carswell nor Dr Oswald was able to point to anything in the history of the case that specially marked it out as a case where mental derangement was at all likely to have taken place. But then it is of course a characteristic of every case of confinement, and I suppose in a special degree of the first confinement of a woman, that it is a period of very acute suffering, and you will have to consider this case not only as a question of guilty or not guilty, but the question also arises whether this is to be treated as a case of murder or of culpable homicide. It is a perfectly legitimate topic of consideration that according to the evidence the act was done immediately after delivery, and apparently without premeditation, at a time when the woman would be experiencing acute physical suffering, when she was alone and without assistance, and had apprehensions as to the disclosure of her condition; and that she may have been guilty of an attack upon the person of her child, which was illegal and criminal, and yet may have done so without realising an intention of taking the life of the child. I think the view which I have last presented to you is the practical issue in the case as you will have to consider it.

THE JURY found the prisoner not guilty on the ground of insanity.

No. 22.

Mar. 18, 1896.
MacArthur v. Campbell.

ALEXANDER MACARTHUR, Complainer.—Abel.
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Burgh Prosecutor, Oban), Respondent.—Clyde.

Suspension—Statutory exclusion of review—Radical irregularity in procedure—Interlocutor adjourning diet unsigned—Burgh Police Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 495.—The record of the proceedings under a complaint charging an offence under the Burgh Police Act, 1892, disclosed several irregularities, and the interlocutor adjourning the diet to the day on which the case was tried was not signed until after the trial and conviction of the accused. Held in a suspension, that the proceedings having been radically defective, the conviction was not protected from review by section 495 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, and fell to be quashed.

No. 22.

Mar. 18, 1896. MacArthur v. Campbell.

Police—Regulation of Buildings—New Buildings—Notice to Commissioners—Oppression—Burgh Police Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 495.—A person erected a house in a burgh, and let it to a tenant on the condition that he should not enter into occupation until it was finished. During the absence of the landlord the tenant occupied the house without any notice having been given under section 180 of the Burgh Police Act. On the landlord's return he at once gave notice to the town-clerk that the house was ready for inspection. A prosecution was instituted against him for failure to give notice before the house was occupied, and he was convicted and sentenced to a fine of 10s. Opinion per Lord Young, that the prosecution was nimious and oppressive in the circumstances, and that the conviction should be set aside.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Lord Trayner.

ON 7th June 1895 a summary complaint at the instance of Archibald Campbell, burgh prosecutor, Oban, was executed against Alexander MacArthur, banker, Oban, setting forth that the accused had contravened the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 180, by permitting a house belonging to him in Oban to be occupied before a certificate had been obtained from the surveyor.*

By interlocutor bearing date 29th July 1895 the Magistrates convicted the accused of the contravention charged and fined him 10s.

MacArthur brought a suspension, the main ground of which was based on certain irregularities in the proceedings in the inferior Court. The following is a print of the record of these proceedings:—

"At Oban, the 29th day of July 1895, in the presence of Francis Webster Cooper, Hugh M'Cowan, and James Stevenson, Esquires, the Magistrates of Police of the burgh of Oban, appeared Alexander MacArthur complained against; and the complaint being read over to him, he answers that he is not guilty." [There was no signature here.]

"Eo die.—The Magistrates adjourn the diet to the 24th day of June 1895, and appoint the said Alexander MacArthur to appear personally on that day at twelve o'clock noon." [Then followed the signatures of the Magistrates.]

"Oban, 24th June 1895.—The Magistrates adjourn the diet to the

---

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 180, enacts:—" . . . Within one month after any new house or building, or any alteration on the structure of any existing house or building, has been completed, or before such house or building or any portion thereof has been occupied, the owner or builder shall give notice to the clerk of the Commissioners that the house or building, or any part thereof, is ready for inspection before being occupied" under a penalty not exceeding £5.

Sec. 495 enacts:—"No order, judgment, record of conviction, or other proceeding whatever, concerning any prosecution instituted before the magistrates shall be quashed for want of form . . . and all judgments and sentences pronounced by the magistrate shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to suspension or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, unless on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the magistrate, or of such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court of review shall think took place wilfully, or of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the magistrate . . ."

No. 22.

Mar. 18, 1896.
MacArthur v. Campbell.

8th day of July next, and appoint the said Alexander MacArthur to appear personally on that day at twelve o'clock noon." [Then followed the Magistrates' signatures.]

"Oban, 8th July 1895.—The Magistrates adjourn the diet to the 29th day of July current, and appoint the said Alexander MacArthur to appear personally on that day at twelve o'clock noon." [Then followed the Magistrates' signatures.]

"The witnesses afternamed were examined" [names and designations.]

"29th July 1895. Eo die.—The Magistrates, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict the said Alexander MacArthur of the contraventions charged, and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay the sum of ten shillings of penalty. Fifty-eight words deleted before signing." [Then followed the signatures of the Magistrates.]

The interlocutor of 8th July 1895 was written on the margin, and it was admitted by the respondent that it was not signed, and averred by the complainer that it was not written, until after the conviction and sentence had been pronounced on 29th July 1895.

The complainer also averred:—The successive adjournments were made by the Magistrates ex proprio motu in order (as they intimated verbally) that they might obtain the opinion of counsel on a question of jurisdiction. "At the fourth diet, on 29th July 1895, it was proved that the complainer had let a house in the tenement to Malcolm M'Gregor, railway clerk, Oban, on condition that if the house was not ready at the term he should not occupy it until it was ready for occupation, and that the said Malcolm M'Gregor, without the knowledge or consent of the complainer, and when the complainer was absent from Oban, had taken up his abode in the house, and that the complainer had, on 4th June 1895 [by letter quoted in the opinion of Lord Young], given notice to the clerk to the Commissioners that the said house and another in the said tenement were ready for inspection by the Burgh Surveyor."

The complainer pleaded that the sentence complained of should be suspended, in respect, inter alia, that (1) it was incompetent, illegal, and oppressive for the Magistrates to make the adjournments for the reason stated by them; (2) that the adjournment on 8th July by verbal intimation from the bench without any written and duly signed minute vitiated the subsequent proceedings; (3) there was no ground in law for convicting the complainer when the tenant had taken possession of the house without his knowledge or consent.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This complaint, of which I have the original before me with the proceedings following upon it, seems to be as extraordinary a document as I ever saw coming out of any Court of justice. It begins with the complaint and then there is an interlocutor of 29th July 1895 which states that certain things happened in the presence of certain magistrates. That statement is followed by an adjournment of the diet to 24th June 1895, after a plea had been taken which is not authenticated [1] Authorities cited by Complainer.—Lord Advocate v. Fraser, June 1, 1852, 1 Irv. 1; Smith v. Macaulay, Nov. 26, 1846, 9 D. 190, 19 Scot. Jur. 58; Stevenson v. Watson, Feb. 7, 1857, 2 Irv. 592; M'Lean v. Falconer, June 28, 1895, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 39, 1 Adam, 564; by Respondent—Smith v. Graham, July 16, 1873, 45 Scot. Jur. 563, 2 Coup. 479; Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 495.

No. 22.

Mar. 18, 1896.
MacArthur v. Campbell.

unless the signature of the magistrates bearing to adjourn the Court to 24th June is also to be held an interlocutor pronounced on 29th July. There are certain other adjournments bearing to be on 24th June and 8th July, and then at a certain diet,—namely, 29th July,—the Magistrates, by another interlocutor, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict. Then the interlocutor of 8th July, adjourning the Court to 29th July, is written on the margin, but it is admitted that this interlocutor was not signed until after the interlocutor of 29th July was pronounced and the case was at an end. It is said that that interlocutor was written out, though not signed, on 8th July; but it might as well not have been written out, because it had no effect till it was signed.

A more monstrous mass of irregularities could not be conceived. One is astonished that in any Court in the country there should be so much want of care and want of sense in the keeping of records.

Now, various objections are taken, but the formidable objection to my mind is that this party, who was brought up on 29th July and then convicted and sentenced, was brought up on a complaint which on the face of it bore that it had fallen, for there was no adjournment of the cause to that date. The case of Smith v. Graham,[1] has been referred to. If anything in that case means that where an interlocutor was not pronounced at all continuing the diet the accused could be tried, and that that was a thing to which the accused could not object, I should most certainly not concur in such a decision. What the Court in that case proceeded on was this, that there was on the face of the proceedings an interlocutor adjourning the diet, and that it was not enough to vitiate this interlocutor that, in its date, the day of the month was written on an erasure. That was the point which was argued for the suspender at the bar. I have no doubt in holding that in all ordinary circumstances in any Criminal Court if it is found upon the record that the trial took place on a date to which there had been no adjournment, the conviction following on that trial must be had. Whether there may be any exceptions to that introduced by Act of Parliament is another question. Mr Clyde founds upon the Burgh Police Act, but the Burgh Police Act while it enacts in very strong terms that no conviction is to be set aside for want of form or for error in procedure, is in the same strong terms as many other Acts of Parliament; notwithstanding which, this Court, where it was plain on the face of the proceedings that they were outside all law, has always maintained the right to quash such proceedings. In my opinion, the irregularities in this case are such that it must be placed in that category, and that the conviction must be quashed.

Lord Young.—The complainer here says he let an unfurnished house, with liberty to the tenant to take possession when it was finished. But the tenant took possession of it when the complainer was absent from Oban, and when the complainer came back he found that the tenant had taken possession, and that a certificate ought to have been obtained. Accordingly, he wrote to the town-clerk:—"On my return yesterday evening I found that one of my tenants, to whom I had let a house in the tenement in Nursery Road, built by me, with entry when house finished, had taken possession,

[1] July 16, 1873, 2 Coup. 479.

No. 22.

Mar. 18, 1896.
MacArthur v. Campbell.

and . . . as my attention has been drawn to the Police Act, section 180, that these houses require to be certified by the burgh surveyor, I shall be obliged by your causing this to be done at once. I was unaware that this had to be done by me, so I trust there will be no delay."

I think that anyone taking the certainly harsh course of instituting a prosecution under these circumstances should make very certain that the harsh proceedings which he takes are regularly conducted. I am not sure that even if they had been so conducted I should have been prepared to sustain them under such circumstances. I think them nimious and really oppressive, and that the conviction upon them should be set aside upon that ground.

But I think there is sufficient in the irregularity of the proceedings for the decision of the case without entering on that view. The interlocutors are printed before us in the order in which they stand in the printed forms, and they begin with the latest date. It appears that on the 29th July the Magistrates adjourned the diet to the 24th June, and on the 24th June adjourned the diet to the 8th July, and then on the 8th July adjourned it to the 29th, and then on the 29th July they proceed to convict. So that these interlocutors of adjournment are between the two interlocutors of the 29th July. I think this is utterly irregular. I am not disposed to be strict to mark iniquity of a formal kind, when the proceedings have been justifiable and proper, but I cannot say that of these proceedings, and I am not disposed to think the objections merely formal. I think they are more, and I incline to agree with your Lordship that procedure upon a criminal charge on a day to which no adjournment has been made is bad and invalid, and ought not to be sustained unless under exceptional circumstances of a kind that this case does not present.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I doubt whether there is anything before us here except the notes of procedure on the 29th July. The first interlocutor bears that date, and the conviction bears that date. If this is so, there could be no competent Court on the 24th June.

But apart from that, I am of opinion that there was no adjournment of the diet from the 8th to the 29th July to which we can give any effect. The interlocutor by which that adjournment is said to have been made did not exist until after the conviction was pronounced, and in these circumstances there was no process before the magistrates on the 29th July in which a judgment could be pronounced.

On these grounds, and on the other grounds stated by your Lordships, I think the conviction should be quashed. I think this was a most unnecessary prosecution.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Pass the bill, suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern: Find the complainer entitled to expenses both in this Court and in the inferior Court: Allow an account," &c.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 23.

July 16, 1896.
Buchanan v. Wilson.

WILLIAM BUCHANAN, Complainer.—M'Lennan.
JOHN WILSON (Procurator-Fiscal for the Justices of Kinross), Respondent.—J. Graham Stewart.

Complaint—Relevancy—Specification—Statutory offence—Necessity for specifying sections of statute—Breach of Public-Houses Acts and certificate.—A complaint charging a statutory offence must specify the section or sections constituting the offence unless the statute is so brief as to make such specification unnecessary.

A complaint charged the holder of a hotel certificate with having sold or given out whisky on a Sunday "contrary to the Public-Houses Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Acts 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 67, therein referred to, and the said certificate." The accused having been convicted brought a suspension. Held that the complaint was irrelevant in respect that it did not specify the section or sections of the Acts constituting the offence charged, and therefore that the conviction fell to be quashed.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 2d June 1896 William Buchanan, hotel-keeper, Muirs, Kinross, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court at Kinross on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused, "who holds a certificate for the sale of excisable liquors at Kinross, did by the hands of" his daughter and his wife, "or one or other of them, both of whom were acting under his control, and for whom he is responsible, on Sunday, the 10th day of May 1896, at his licensed premises at Muirs, Kinross, occupied by him as a hotel, sell or give out to" a person named, "who was neither a lodger in his house nor a traveller requiring accommodation, one gill of whisky, contrary to the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Acts 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, and 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 67, therein referred to, and the said certificate."

Buchanan pleaded not guilty, but was convicted "of the contravention charged," and fined £1, with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment.

He brought a suspension, pleading, inter alia, that the complaint was irrelevant in respect that it did not specify the sections of the Acts upon which the complaint was based.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As has frequently been observed from this Bench in cases similar to the present, there is no absolute rule,—and in this case there is no necessity for laying down an absolute rule,—that in all complaints where a statutory offence is charged a reference must be made not only to the Act of Parliament founded on but also to the particular section or sections which have been contravened. The Act of Parliament may happen to be so brief that to refer separately to one clause may be unnecessary. A glance at the statute may shew that that is the only clause which is capable of being contravened. In such a case justice to the accused may not require special mention of the section contravened. I am equally clear that no rule can be laid down by which in reference to any Act of Parliament

[1] Authorities cited by the parties.—Hastie v. Macdonald, Nov. 23, 1894, 22 R. (Just. Cases) 18, 1 Adam, 505; White v. Robertson, July 17, 1891, 18 R. (Just. Cases) 56, 3 White, 245; Sharp v. Leith, Oct. 24, 1892, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 12, 3 White, 352; Hamilton v. Inglis, May 22, 1879, 6 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 4 Coup. 244; Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 28, 1 White, 369.

No. 23.

July 16, 1896.
Buchanan v. Wilson.

we could say that it is not necessary to specify the actual clause which the prosecutor thinks has been contravened. But if we were to hold that such mention was unnecessary in the present case it would come to this, that in no case was it necessary to mention more than the statute, for in the present case the prosecutor has seen fit to enumerate no less than three separate statutes, each of considerable length, without giving the accused any notice of which of their many sections he has contravened. We have been referred to a series of decisions in which we have held that justice to the accused required that the sections should be named as well as the statutes. Of these a typical instance is the case of Hastie v. Macdonald,[1] where we quashed the conviction on this ground.

I think this is a case which ought to follow these decisions. It is in some respects a clearer case than any of them. We have here three Acts referred to, and in no case is there reference to any particular section, and yet we are told from the bar that only one section is at all involved in the contravention alleged.

I cannot understand why, after the repeated notice given to prosecutors from this Bench, they should still insist on omitting to mention the section they found on in charging the accused,—unless, indeed, it be this, that in some cases it is very difficult for any one to say precisely which particular section or sections are in point in the case. But that is just the case in which the accused is entitled all the more to insist on having set out on the face of the complaint the precise sections he is said to have contravened.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur.

LORD MONCREIFF.—In the circumstances I agree that this conviction must be quashed.

It is always a matter of degree whether or not a simple reference to a statute is sufficient notice to the accused of the charge brought against him. In the present case we have a reference to three statutes, and no mention of any particular section, and on inquiry it turns out that only one section of one of the three statutes is said to have been contravened, while the other two statutes are not founded on by the prosecution at all.

Such a complaint cannot be sustained.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

JOHN VEITCH, Solicitor—JAMES HEPBURN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 24.

July 16, 1896.
Gachie v. Auld.

JOHN GACHIE OR M'GACHY AND ANOTHER, Complainers.—Guy. WILLIAM AULD (Procurator in the Justice of Peace Court, Paisley), Respondent.—M'Clure.

Suspension—Irregularity in procedure—Witness—Wrong person appearing as witness.—The record of the proceedings under a summary complaint set forth that Bridget Macdonald had appeared as a witness for the prosecutor. It appeared that the woman who gave evidence under the name of Bridget Macdonald was not called Bridget Macdonald; that this witness knew nothing at first hand of the facts to which she had spoken; and that she had given Bridget Macdonald's evidence. In a suspension the Court quashed the conviction, on the ground that the record set forth as a witness the name of a person who had not been examined as a witness, and had omitted the name of a person who had been examined as a witness.

[1] 22 R. (Just. Cases) 18.

No. 24.

July 16, 1896. Gachie v. Auld.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Trayner. Ld. Moncreiff.

ON 13th May 1896 John Gachie or M'Gachy, groom, Johnstone, and Daniel Inglis, warehouseman, Houston, were convicted in the Police Court at Greenock of breach of the peace.

They brought a suspension, in which they stated:—That the minute of the evidence led under the complaint bore that Bridget Rowan or Macdonald, residing at Clunebraehead, Port-Glasgow, was examined as a witness in support of the complaint; that Bridget Rowan or Macdonald was not so examined, and did not give any evidence in support of the complaint; that when Bridget Rowan or Macdonald was called as a witness to give evidence in support of the complaint, a woman named Sarah M'Graw or M'Ardle, residing in Port-Glasgow, stepped into the witness-box, and having taken the oath, gave evidence under the name of Bridget Rowan or Macdonald; that M'Ardle was a witness for the prosecution in support of another complaint which was called on the same day; that when she appeared in Court it was then seen that she was the same person who had given evidence in support of the first complaint under the name of Bridget Rowan or Macdonald; and that on being asked to explain, she stated that she had been asked to give Mrs Macdonald's evidence, and had been told what to say.

The complainers pleaded;—The warrant or sentence complained of ought to be suspended (1) in respect that it proceeded on the pretended evidence of a witness who was not examined; (2) in respect that the minute of evidence omitted the name of Sarah M'Graw or M'Ardle, who gave pretended evidence in support of the complaint; (3) in respect that it proceeded partly on the hearsay evidence of the witness M'Ardle.

The respondent, at the hearing, admitted the substantial accuracy of the facts set forth by the complainers, but stated that until Mrs M'Ardle appeared as a witness in the second case he had had no suspicion of the mistake that had been committed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think that this conviction cannot possibly be sustained. The record is inaccurate in two respects. It sets forth that Bridget Rowan or Macdonald was examined as a witness, when as a matter of fact it is admitted that no such person was examined; and while it is alleged that Sarah M'Graw or M'Ardle was examined, there is no entry of her name in the record. These mistakes could only have arisen in circumstances which shew, not perhaps gross irregularity, but certainly negligence on the part of the prosecutor. Such negligence should not be passed over in the case of a public prosecutor who is prosecuting persons in his district for offences which may result in the curtailment of their liberty. I think it is quite possible that injustice resulted in this case, and therefore hold that the conviction must be quashed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—JAMES F. MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

1895–96.

WINTER SESSION.

No. 1.

ALEXANDER LOVIE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—D. Dundas—Glegg.
WALTER LUMLEY AND ANOTHER (George Alexander Baird's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Shaw—Salvesen—Lyon Mackenzie.

Oct. 16, 1895.*
Lovie v. Baird's Trustees.

Lease—Tenant's claim for arbiter's valuation—Counter claim by landlord under the lease—Liquid and illiquid.—In an action by an outgoing tenant against his landlord for sums ascertained to be due to the pursuer under his lease by arbiters mutually chosen, the defender pleaded that he was entitled to set off against the pursuer's claim a counter claim for interest on improvement expenditure, &c. under the lease.

Held that as the pursuer's right depended on his having implemented his obligations under the lease he was not entitled to decree de plano, and a proof allowed.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ALEXANDER LOVIE was tenant of the farm of Towie on the estate of Auchmedden, Aberdeenshire, under a nineteen years' lease, which came to an end as regards houses, grass, and fallow land, at Whitsunday 1892. He then became entitled under his lease to be paid for grass, fallow land, and farm-yard manure at the valuation of arbiters to be chosen by him and his landlord, George Alexander Baird. Arbiters were appointed, who fixed the value at £670, 17s.

On 14th March 1895 Lovie raised an action against the trustees of Mr Baird, who had died, for payment of this sum.

The defenders did not dispute the pursuer's claim, but maintained that the pursuer was due to them the sum of £1002, 1s. 3d., under the lease in respect of arrears of rent, interest on improvement money, building, &c., and that after giving effect to certain deductions claimed by the pursuer, and giving the pursuer credit for the sum sued for in the present action, the pursuer was still due to the defenders the sum of £134, 4s. 1d.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defences being irrelevant should be repelled. (3) The counter claims made by the defenders not being liquid and not being ascertainable in this process, the defences, in so far as founded thereon, should be repelled. (4) The sum sued for being the sum found due by arbiters appointed by the parties, decree as craved ought forthwith to be pronounced therefor.

* Decided July 5, 1895.

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1895. Lovie v. Baird's Trustees.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being indebted to the defenders for rents and other sums due under the lease in a larger amount than the sum sued for, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) The defenders are entitled to set off against the sum sued for the sums due by the pursuer in respect of his tenancy of the farm under the lease founded on. (3) The pursuer not having implemented his obligations under the lease founded on, is barred from enforcing any counter obligations incumbent upon the defenders.

On 13th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments, and further appointed the defenders to lead in the proof.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The sum sued for having been fixed by arbitration was a liquid claim for which the pursuer was entitled to obtain instant decree. The defenders' counter claim was illiquid, and could not be set off against the pursuer's claim.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—The obligations of both parties arose out of one mutual contract. The pursuer was barred from enforcing performance of the defenders' obligations under it as long as he refused to fulfil his own part of it.[2] The defenders' claim, if not liquid, was capable of instant verification.[3]

Lord Adam.—My opinion is that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to. This is an action brought by a tenant of the defenders in Aberdeenshire, holding under a nineteen years' lease, which came to an end, I think, in 1892. It is one of the numerous conditions of that lease that at the expiry of the lease the outgoing tenant should be paid, according to valuation by men mutually chosen, for the value of all sown grass; for the dung made upon the farm subsequent to the time of the turnip sowing in the previous year; and for the value of labour done to the break for green crop or fallow land in that year. The lease having come to an end, a valuation took place in terms of the lease, with the result that £670, 17s. was found due by the landlord to the tenant. Liability for that sum was not disputed on the part of the defender; but then he pleads in defence to that claim certain counter claims for rent alleged to be unpaid, interest on improvement expenditure, buildings, and so on, bringing out a balance of £1002 due to him after giving deductions for all the rent paid to account, and leaving a larger sum than that alleged to be due by him. The question is, whether the landlord is entitled in this action to prove that these sums are due to him. My opinion is that he is so entitled as the Lord Ordinary has found. The claims here on the one side and on the other are mutual claims arising under the obligations of the lease. The landlord is bound to pay the sum which is sued for in this action, and so equally is the tenant bound to pay his rent and to perform the other prestations according to the averments on record. I think the question is just whether, as the Solicitor-General puts it, one party to the contract is to be entitled to instant payment, while at the same time he is refusing to implement his own part of the contract. I think that he is not.

[1] Munro v. M'Geoghs, Nov. 15, 1888, 16 R. 93.

[2] Turnbull v. M'Lean & Co., et e contra, March 5, 1874, 1 R. 730; Macbride v. Hamilton & Co., June 11, 1875, 2 R. 775.

[3] Stewart v. Campbell, Jan. 19, 1889, 16 R. 346; Sivright v. Lightbourne, June 11, 1890, 17 R. 917.

No. 1.
Oct. 16, 1895.
Lovie v. Baird's Trustees.

Lord M'Laren.—The claims regarding which the Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof appear to be entirely claims which arise within the lease between the late Mr Baird and his tenant,—that is to say, they are all provided for in the lease. The lease as usual stipulates for rent payable at two half-yearly terms, and then the tenant is under obligation to repay the landlord for insurances and public assessments, and to pay him interest on certain expenditure which the landlord undertakes to make for the benefit of the farm. That is classed under the head of draining, building, fencing, and land improvements. Then again, the landlord under one of the usual clauses binds himself to give certain compensation to the tenant for available improvements at the end of the lease. What has taken place is that at each half year the tenant appears to have punctually paid his rent, but apparently there have been no payments made under the other conditions of the lease, probably because the rent was the thing the amount of which the tenant knew in advance, but he could not pay the other claims under the lease until the account was rendered to him.

Now, supposing that the tenant's claims had not been constituted by arbitration, it seems plain enough that the one party could not have sued for fulfilment of the pecuniary obligations without exposing himself to be met by the counter claims, not upon the ground of compensation but on the ground that all stipulations under the same contract resolved into an account in which naturally a balance is due by the one party or the other.

The question then is, does it make any difference that the tenant has obtained an award from valuators as prescribed by the lease? I think not, and for this reason, that the arbiter who was valuing the tenant's claims had no power to deal with the matter of the landlord's claims for these annual charges that he was to receive along with his rent. The landlord having no valid objection to the arbitration very properly allowed it to go on, and allowed the claims to be valued. I think that that ought not to prejudice his right to set off his claims, which are just as clearly due, and which need no constitution except the production of the vouchers, against the sums due to the tenant, which required to be ascertained by the opinion of a skilled person.

The only other observation I wish to make is, that while perhaps in point of form this is a case where a proof should be allowed, I think if I had been dealing with it I should not have fixed a diet in the meantime, but should have called upon the defenders to put in process their vouchers, because if it appears that the proper receipts are produced for the sums charged, and these sums have never been paid by the tenant, there cannot be anything left that would be a proper subject of parole evidence. It may be, of course, that if certain items were objected to, parole evidence might be necessary in regard to these. But I have always rather demurred to the idea of sending what is properly a case of accounting to proof without in some way ascertaining what are the points upon which the parties are at issue. However, the interlocutor has not been objected to on that ground, and I suppose if we adhere to it there is every probability that so far as these claims can be instructed by the production of vouchers parties will dispense with other evidence.

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1895.
Lovie v. Baird's Trustees.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the tenant's claim for the sum fixed by valuation under this contract of lease is very much in the same position as the landlord's claim for the fixed rent under a contract of lease, and therefore that the question now in dispute between the parties must be determined by the principle laid down by Lord Fullerton in the case of Graham v. Gordon, June 16, 1843, 5 D. 1207, at p. 1211, which has been followed over and over again since, where his Lordship said that a claim for rent is not liquid in the same sense as a sum in a bond, because it is a payment in consideration of something to be done under a contract, and therefore if the obligations in respect of which the payment is to be made have not been performed, the demand for payment cannot be said to constitute a liquid claim. I think the tenant's position in this case is exactly the same as the position of the landlord in the case figured. He is entitled to have payment of the value of the stock in question, but that is a payment in consideration of the performance of his own obligations under the contract. If either party to a contract of this kind, having against the other a claim for a definite sum of money fixed by the contract, has not performed the obligations incumbent upon him in consideration of which that payment is made, that is a very good answer to an action such as we are now considering.

I agree with your Lordships that there is a case here which must be made the subject of inquiry, and that no decree can be given against the landlord until the pecuniary claims against the pursuer have been finally adjusted. I also agree with the hope expressed by Lord M'Laren that parties may see their way to avoid unnecessary expense in a case of this kind. But that is not a question for us, and as there is no sufficient ground to entitle us to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary, his judgment must stand.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—W. & F. HALDANE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

JAMES HOOD AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—Shaw—Dewar.
JOHN EDWARD GORDON, Respondent.—Dickson—John Wilson.

Election Law—Process—Application for leave to amend petition against the return of member—Inner-House—Election Judges—Remit—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 51), sec. 40, sub sec. (2).—Held (1) that an application under sec. 40, subsec. (2), of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, for leave to amend a petition against the return of a member of Parliament must be presented to one of the Divisions and not to the Election Judges; and (2) that, on the application being granted, it is not necessary for the Division to remit the petition to the Election Judges to enable the latter to exercise the power by statute conferred upon them.

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

1st Division.

On 19th August 1895 James Hood and Andrew Gillanders, voters at the election of a member of Parliament for the combined counties of Elgin and Nairn, held on 16th and 23d July 1895, presented a petition against John Edward Gordon, Esq., of 61 Princes Gate, London, who had been returned Member of Parliament for the counties.

The petitioners made general averments that the respondent had by himself and his agents or by other persons, before, during, and after the election, been guilty of bribing and treating, and they prayed the Court "that it may be determined that the said John Edward Gordon was not duly elected or returned, and that his election and return were and are wholly null and void, and that the place of Member of Parliament for the said combined counties of Elgin and Nairn is now vacant; and finally, that the said John Edward Gordon may be found liable in expenses, in terms of the said Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and the said Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883."

On 6th September the petitioners presented a "supplementary petition," containing a number of statements to the effect generally that the respondent and his agent had contravened various provisions of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, with regard to the returns and declarations made by them to the returning officer respecting election expenses. They referred to sec. 40, subsec. (2), of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883,* and prayed that "they may be permitted to amend" the original petition "by adding thereto the aforesaid statements," and then repeated the prayer of the original petition for the unseating of the respondent.

The case was called in the Single Bills.

Argued for the petitioners;—The application was competently made to the Division. An election petition fell in the first place to be dealt with by one of the Divisions,—that appeared from the Greenock case,[1] the first interlocutor in which was an interlocutor of the First Division—and nothing had occurred in the present case to remove the petition from the Division. But apart from that, it was expressly provided by the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 40 (2), and sec. 68 (4),* that an application for leave to amend should be made to one of the Divisions of the Inner-House. The application should therefore be granted, and the petition remitted to the Election Judges.

Argued for the respondent;—The application ought to have been

---

* The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 51), enacts, sec. 40 (2),—"Any election petition presented within the time limited by the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, may for the purpose of questioning the return or the election upon an allegation of an illegal practice be amended with the leave of the High Court within the time within which a petition questioning the return upon the allegation of that illegal practice can under this section be presented."

Sec. 68 (4),—"The jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice under this Act shall, in Scotland, be exercised by one of the Divisions of the Court of Session, or by a Judge of the said Court to whom the same may be remitted by such Division, and subject to an appeal thereto, and the Court of Session shall have power to make Acts of Sederunt for the purposes of this Act."

[1] Petition Sutherland and Others, July 14, 1892, not reported. See Blair's Election Manual, 402.

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1895. Hood v. Gordon.

made to the Election Judges. The petition was now depending before them, and it was incompetent, or in any view highly inexpedient, for a different tribunal to interfere. The provisions of secs. 5, 10, and 11 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, as applied to Scotland by section 58 (5), clearly shewed that the Election Judges were the proper tribunal to deal with such a matter as amendment. The expression "High Court" in sec. 40 (2) of the Act of 1883 was to be read as meaning the Court before whom the petition was at the time depending. In any view, assuming that the application was competently before the Division, the application should be remitted to the Election Judges.

The case was advised at a later hour on the same day.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are asked by the petitioners to grant leave to amend a petition originally presented by them to have the election for Elginshire declared void, and Mr Gordon unseated. Objection has been taken to that upon grounds of technicality and procedure, and this objection raises matters worthy of consideration. But I am bound to say that on this question, which is one of practice and precedent, we have not received such assistance from the bar as it turns out might have been available. We have ourselves examined the law applicable to this matter, and I find that our course is rendered tolerably clear by the Parliamentary Election Petition rules applicable to Scotland, framed by the Judges in Scotland under the Act of 1868, and by two decisions of the other Division of the Court. Shortly stated, it appears to me that the result of these enactments contained in the statute and in the rules, along with the decisions which I have referred to of the Second Division, is this: A petition under the Parliamentary Elections Act is properly presented to either Division of the Court, but what may be done after the petition is presented depends entirely on the nature of the questions which are sought to be raised. In one case, which is not reported, but in which I was counsel, and as to which I have just now verified the facts, viz., the Wigtown Burghs case,—the petition never was moved in the Division until the approval of the Auditor's report after the trial had taken place. My recollection of the Dumbartonshire case is that the same course was followed, but as to that I am not so accurately informed. But in the two reported cases which have occurred in the Second Division, the question has been carefully considered what motions are proper to the Division and what to the Election Judges, and that is so far determined by the 24th rule of the rules of 1868, which provides—"All interlocutory questions and matters, except as to the sufficiency of the security, shall be made upon application in writing to be lodged at the office of the Principal Clerk, and shall be heard and disposed of by one of the Judges,"—that was of course in the days when one and not two Judges tried these petitions,—"or in their absence by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills." In these cases, Christie v. Grieve and Irwin v. Mure,[1] the Second Division had to determine whether the question which was brought under their cognisance was an interlocutory matter. If it was, then the statutory rule made that proper to the decision, not of the Division, but of the Election Judges; and in both these cases the Division held the subject-matter in dispute was not of an interlocutory character, because in both cases the objection taken by the respondent, which formed the subject of debate, went to the root of the petition, and if sustained would have precluded any further procedure. The Court then laid down that questions of that character and quality were proper to the Division, and not to the Election Judges. I have referred to the 24th rule, but that does not exhaust the questions which are expressly appropriated to the decision of the Election Judges as distinguished from the Division, because Election Judges have also to fix, inter alia, the time and place of trial. Under section 17 of the rules, it is expressly provided,—"The time and place of the trial of an election petition shall be fixed by the Judges, and notice thereof in writing shall be" given in certain ways. Accordingly, the time and place for trial, interlocutory matters, the trial itself, all are proper, not to the Division, but to the Election Judges. But in the two cases to which I have referred, Christie v. Grieve and Irwin v. Mure, the Court held, as I have already mentioned, that questions going to the root of the petition and requiring to be determined before anything else is done are proper to the Division.

[1] Christie v. Grieve, Jan. 19, 1869, 7 Macph. 378, 41 Scot. Jur. 205; Irwin v. Mure, March 13, 1874, 1 R. 834.

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1895. Hood v. Gordon.

Now, we have to consider how stands the present application. It was suggested by Mr Dickson that it was necessary that the petition—when I say the petition I should amplify that by saying all petitions—even under the Act of 1868—must be got out of the First Division by being transferred or remitted to the Election Judges. I take that, upon the statute, the rules, and the two decisions which I have referred to, to be a mistake. I do not think that the Division requires to remit the petition for the disposal of these matters, within the statute and the rules, even to the Election Judges. The thing works automatically. If you have a thing proper to the Division in the sense of the two Second Division cases, come to the Division. If you have a matter proper to the Election Judges under the statute and the rules, go to the Election Judges. Now, how stands the present application? It appears to me to depend not on the discrimination of the duties of the Division and Judges, as those are determined by the Act of 1868, because it is expressly presented under the Act of 1883; it is an application for leave to amend the petition. Now, the Act of 1883 says that leave must be granted, if at all, by the High Court, and the High Court, as interpreted for Scotland, means the Division. Accordingly here I think our course is quite clear. We are asked to administer the Act of 1883 on an application for leave to amend, and it is we alone who can grant such leave. Accordingly, I think we must entertain this application, but entertain it for the purpose of performing the statutory duty under the Act of 1883, of granting or refusing leave to amend.

Now, on the merits of the question, Mr Dickson, whose position I perfectly understand, made no observations; that is to say, he had no opposition to offer on the merits of the question whether the petition shall be amended unless he was right in his original suggestion that that is no business of ours, and is to fall to the Election Judges. Now, I have looked at the proposed amendments. They seem to be legitimate and proper, and I am supported in that view by the absence of observations to the contrary on the part of Mr Dickson. I think we should grant leave to amend the petition by inserting in it the allegations contained in the note. By a singular view of what was fitting in such an application the petitioners have gone on in this application for leave to amend the petition to pray over again that Mr Gordon be unseated. I am not disposed to take any notice of that application, because that is not matter for us. I propose to limit our action to what the Act of 1883 gives us power to do,—that is, to give leave to amend. I think we should do so by allowing the petitioners to insert this statement of facts contained in this paper, and leave it so. After that the parties require no remit of ours to go to the Election Judges to get them to exercise the powers conferred on them by the Act of 1868, the rules under that Act, and the Act of 1883.

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1895. Hood v. Gordon.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT granted leave to amend the original petition in terms of the prayer of the supplementary petition.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 3.

Oct. 16, 1895. Fife v. Orr.

WILLIAM FIFE (Liquidator of W. Muir & Company, Limited), Pursuer (Respondent).—Johnston—Salvesen.
ROBERT ORR, Defender (Appellant).—R. V. Campbell—Craigie.

Reparation—Wrongous Interdict.—In an action of damages raised by the liquidator of a bleaching company, the pursuer stated that he had advertised a sale by auction of a large number of articles belonging to the bleachwork; that the defender, who had already bought the machinery of the bleachwork and other articles on the day before the sale, wrongfully obtained interim interdict against the sale proceeding; that of 266 articles included in the inventory prepared for the sale nine only were ultimately ascertained to belong to the defender, and that the interdict was unwarrantable quoad the articles belonging to the pursuer.

The defender pleaded that the action was not relevant, in respect that in the circumstances set forth by the pursuer the defender was entitled to stop the sale until his rights should be ascertained. Held that the action was relevant.

Observations per Lord M'Laren on the distinction between actions for wrongous interdict and for the wrongous use of diligence.

Process—Appeal—Proof or Jury Trial—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 40.—In an appeal for jury trial in an action of damages for wrongous interdict, the action having been held to be relevant, the Court, in respect that neither party asked for jury trial, refused the appeal and remitted the case to the Sheriff.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire at Paisley by William Fife, liquidator of William Muir & Co., Limited, sometime bleachers at Lintmill, against Robert Orr, thread manufacturer, for damages for the wrongous use of interdict.

The pursuer averred (cond. 2) that on 8th November 1894 the defender, Mr Orr, purchased Lintmill Bleachworks from the trustees of the late Henry Heys, the proprietors of the heritage and from the pursuer, the voluntary liquidator of William Muir & Co., the tenants. The said purchase included, secundo, the whole fixed and moveable machinery situated on the several subjects thereby sold, and particularly (but without prejudice to the said generality) the whole machinery and other effects specified in an inventory . . . In terms of the said agreement the defender's date of entry was Martinmas 1894.

No. 3.

Oct. 16, 1895.
Fife v. Orr.

(Cond. 3) "In consequence of the said sale, it became necessary for the pursuer, who was in the tenant's right of said subjects, and owned all the plant therein, to realise the effects belonging to him as liquidator aforesaid. He caused a catalogue to be printed, of which a copy is herewith produced, specifying certain articles, the sale of which was advertised to take place at Lintmill on Wednesday, 21st November 1894. The said catalogue contained 266 lots, consisting of moveable plant, drysalteries, and dye stuffs, spring vans, weighing machines, tools, and other articles." (Cond. 4) "On or about Tuesday, 20th November 1894, the day preceding the proposed sale, the pursuer, and also the said James Laird & Son, auctioneers, were served with interdicts by the Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute, at Paisley, obtained at the instance of the defender, against them. By the terms of the interdict the pursuer and the said auctioneers were interdicted, to the effect therein mentioned, until Tuesday, 27th November, at twelve noon, when a diet for further consideration was appointed." (Cond. 5) "The effect of the said interdict, granted as aforesaid, was to interdict the present pursuer and Messrs Laird & Son from selling, by public roup or otherwise any and all of the articles enumerated in the said catalogue, the sale of which was advertised, as aforesaid, for Wednesday, 21st November." (Cond. 7) That on 23d November the interim interdict was recalled, except in regard to 130 articles. (Cond. 8) That the pursuer having to remove from the premises on 28th November, he was obliged to have a sale on 27th November of the articles as to which interdict had been recalled; that the question as to the other articles fell to be determined by an arbiter, and that the arbiter found that of these nine belonged to the defender. (Cond. 12) "The interdict obtained by the defender, in the circumstances before mentioned, was illegal and unwarrantable, in so far as it related to articles belonging to the pursuer, in which the defender had no right or interest."

He further made specific averments of damage resulting to him from the stoppage of the sale, and pleaded;—The defender having by his illegal and wrongous use of the process of interdict occasioned loss and damage to the pursuer, is liable in reparation therefor.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender having acted reasonably and justifiably for the protection of his interests, he is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) The interim interdict applied for being the only effective and competent application to make to the Court for the protection of the defender's interests . . . and the defender having acted fairly and reasonably throughout, he is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The remedy of interdict having been held to be competent and proper, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (6) The action is incompetent and irrelevant.

On 25th June 1895 the Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof. The defender appealed for jury trial.

The defender argued;—The averments of the pursuer were irrelevant. It was not suggested that the defender had acted in mala fide. He was entitled to have the status quo preserved until the questions at issue were determined, and the only method open to him of securing this was to apply for interim interdict. It was not a universal rule that anyone who applied for interdict was liable in damages if the interdict was afterwards set aside.[1] It was always a question of cir-

[1] Moir v. Hunter, Nov. 16, 1832, 11 S. 32.

No. 3.

Oct. 16, 1895.
Fife v. Orr.

cumstances.[1] The action of the defender here was perfectly fair and reasonable, for some of the articles exposed for sale belonged to him, and it clearly appeared from his statements in the interdict process that he did not wish the interdict to apply to the whole catalogue.

Argued for the pursuer;—The case was ruled by that of Kennedy v. Police Commissioners of Fort-William.[2] The prayer of the interdict was quite general and could have no other effect than that of stopping the whole sale. It was enough to make the interdict wrongous that many of the articles claimed by the defender turned out not to belong to him at all. In Moir v. Hunter[3] the person applying for interdict was in possession; here on the other hand the person interdicted was in possession. It was only in cases of wrongous use of diligence that malice and want of probable cause must be averred to found a claim for damages; cases of wrongous interdict were clearly distinguishable.[4] Interdict was always obtained periculo petentis.

Lord President.—In my opinion the pursuer's action is relevantly laid. He alleges that a sale of certain articles, which he had exposed for roup, was interdicted at the instance of the defender, and he claims damages because the ground on which the sale was postponed was unfounded in fact, certain articles claimed by the defender as belonging to him having turned out not to belong to him at all, but to belong to the pursuer, who was exposing them to sale. He says also that damage resulted. I think that a case so stated is one to be tried upon the legal footing set out in the issue settled by Lord Rutherfurd Clark in the case which was cited in debate (Kennedy v. Police Commissioners of Fort-William[2]).

But neither party in the present instance asked for jury trial, although the appeal is taken under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and I desire to note the absence of any claim for jury trial on either side, because that leaves it to the Court to consider whether any reason has been relevantly stated for bringing this action into the Court of Session, not for trial by jury but for trial by proof. I have not heard anything which marks out this case as one in which there should be any departure from the ordinary routine of an action in the Sheriff Court.

I have not entered with any elaboration into the questions of law which have been argued at the bar. It seems to be perfectly clear that the contention of Mr Campbell that liability for damages is to be determined by the fairness and reasonableness of the person who applies for interdict is not borne out by the authorities. If any person asks interdict on statements of fact made by him to the Judge he does so at his own peril, and the mere circumstance that he may have been misled, or sanguine, will not justify him in a question with the person whom he has injured. The argument, in fact, on the side of Mr Campbell's client, proceeded upon a disregard of the plain distinction drawn between a case of interdict and a case

[1] Glasgow, &c. Railway Co. v. Glasgow Coal Exchange Co., July 14, 1885, 12 R. 1287, Lord Mure, p. 1293.

[2] Dec. 12, 1877, 5 R. 302.

[3] Moir v. Hunter, Nov. 16, 1832, 11 S. 32.

[4] Wolthekker v. Northern Agricultural Co., Dec. 20, 1862, 1 Macph. 211, 35 Scot. Jur. 156; Robinson v. North British Railway Co., March 10, 1864, 2 Macph. 841, 36 Scot. Jur. 420.

No. 3.

Oct. 16, 1895.
Fife v. Orr.

of diligence, and that being a matter settled by decision I think that the case does not present any legal difficulty.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—The ground of action averred by the pursuer is that he has suffered damage by reason of the defender having wrongously obtained interim interdict, with the result of interfering with the sale of his goods.

Prima facie, such an averment constitutes a relevant case for damages. There is a very well-settled distinction between rights of action for wrongous use of interdict and for wrongous use of personal diligence. It is unnecessary to enter into the grounds of this distinction further than to say that interdict is an extraordinary remedy almost always productive of great inconvenience, and therefore our law does not allow a party to get interim interdict as a matter of course, but only on sufficient representations made to the Judge, on which alone in the case of interim interdict the Judge acts. Where interdict is improperly obtained, no distinction can be taken between the cases when it is based on positive false statements, and when it is obtained by the suppression or non-disclosure of facts which are necessary to enable the Judge to determine the question of the expediency of granting interim interdict. Here, according to the averments of the pursuer, the Judge was misled, with the result that he granted interdict against the sale of the aggregate of all the articles constituting the stock of a trader, when, if the facts had been properly set before him, he would have limited the application of the interdict to certain articles which were the complainer's property. It is true that there are expressions in the condescendence annexed to the petition for interdict which indicate that the applicant was not entitled in whole to the remedy he asked, all the goods not being his property, but this was not brought forward by him in such a prominent way as to attract the attention of the Sheriff, and in particular, the complainer did not directly inform the Sheriff that he did not desire interdict to the full extent. According, therefore, to the pursuer's averments the defender obtained an interdict to which in fact, as it now appears, he was not entitled. I agree that these averments constitute a case for damages, such as is proper to be disposed of by the Sheriff.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff.

F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 4.

Oct. 18, 1895.
Rooney v. Cormack.

MRS MARY RAE OR ROONEY (with consent of her Husband) AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—Jameson—Salvesen.
JOHN FORD CORMACK, Defender.—W. Campbell.
JAMES MACKIE'S CURATOR AD LITEM, Defender.—Hunter.

Expenses—Separate defences—Liability of defenders inter se—Trust.—A law-agent was appointed sole trustee, and was left a legacy under the will of a client, which the law-agent had himself prepared. An action for the reduction of the will was brought against (first) the law-agent, and (second) the residuary legatee, who was a pupil, and to whom a curator ad litem was appointed, on the ground that the first defender had by fraud or circumvention impetrated the will from the testator, who was weak and facile. Separate defences were lodged. The jury returned a verdict for both the defenders.

No. 4.

Oct. 18, 1895. Rooney v. Cormack.

In dealing with expenses the Court found the pursuer liable to the first defender as trustee, and found the latter personally liable to the second defender, the curator ad litem, on the ground that his action in taking benefit under the will which he had himself prepared had so prejudiced the case that, but for the separate defence, the jury might have disregarded the pupil's interest, and returned a verdict for the pursuer.

1st Division.

(Previous report, June 22, 1895, 22 R. p. 761.)

On 17th February 1894, James Rae, Esquire, of Newton and Kirkpatrick, Dumfriesshire, died unmarried, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 27th January 1894. By this deed he, inter alia, left an annuity of £200 to his sister and sole next of kin Mrs Mary Rae or Rooney, and £500 to John Ford Cormack, his solicitor and sole trustee who had prepared the deed, and he directed the latter to hold the residue of his estate (which amounted to about £25,000) for behoof of James Mackie, a natural son of the truster, until he attained twenty-five, and then convey it to him.

On 20th February 1895, Mrs Rooney and Janet Rae (the truster's niece and heir-at-law) raised an action of reduction of the settlement against Cormack and James Mackie (to whom a curator ad litem was subsequently appointed).

The defenders lodged separate defences, and were represented by different counsel and agents.

The trial took place on the following issues:—"(1) Whether the pretended trust-disposition and settlement dated 27th January 1894, No. 9 of process, is not the deed of the late James Rae? (2) Whether on or about 27th January 1894 the late James Rae was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon; and whether the defender John Ford Cormack, taking advantage of his said weakness and facility, did by fraud or circumvention impetrate from him the said trust-disposition and settlement to his own benefit, and to the lesion of the said James Rae?"

The jury returned a verdict for the defenders.

Thereafter the defenders moved the Court to apply the verdict, and to find the pursuers liable in the expenses of both the defenders, the curator ad litem of the defender Mackie moving the Court alternatively to find the defender Cormack liable in the pupil defender's expenses.

Lord President.—The jury have found for the defenders on both the issues, the first being—in the usual form—whether the deed in question was not the deed of Mr Rae, and the second being whether Mr Rae was weak and facile, and whether the defender Cormack, taking advantage of his weakness and facility, did, by fraud and circumvention, impetrate the deed from him. The pursuers accordingly have been found to be in the wrong, the jury having held that the deed was the will of the testator, and that it was honestly executed. The Court must therefore follow the ordinary rule, and find the pursuers liable in expenses. But I do not think that they ought to be found liable in two sets of expenses, because in ordinary circumstances there would have been only a single defence, the trustee conducting it. But here, in the interests of the boy, it was in every way right that he should be separately represented, because the trustee, by his proceedings in connection with this will, had so prejudiced the case that the jury might have been apt, but for the separate representation of the boy, to disregard his interest, and, identifying the will with the trustee, to condemn both. The expense so occasioned was brought about by the action of Mr Cormack, and it appears to me that the proper solution of the question is that the pursuers should be found liable in the expenses of the trustee but not in the expenses of the boy, and that on the motion of the boy's curator ad litem we should find Mr Cormack liable in the expenses of the boy's separate defence.

No. 4.

Oct. 18, 1895. Rooney v. Cormack.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that the Court has jurisdiction over the whole subject of expenses in any action before it. It is not necessary to have any conclusion for expenses on the part of a defender as against the pursuer, and I see nothing to prevent our granting an award of expenses to one defender against another where they stand in such a relation as to make it just that such an award should be given.

I agree that the course proposed by your Lordship is reasonable and just.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Apply the verdict of the jury, and in respect thereof assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the pursuers liable in expenses to the defender John Ford Cormack as trustee, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report; and on the motion of Alexander Wylie, curator ad litem to the residuary legatee, James Mackie, find the said John Ford Cormack liable personally in expenses to the said curator ad litem," &c.

FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—J. & J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER WYLIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 18, 1895. Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees.

CHARLES WILSON & SONS AND OTHERS, Petitioners (Respondents).—Shaw—Graham Stewart.

WILLIAM MACKAY'S TRUSTEES AND ANOTHER, Respondents (Appellants).—W. Campbell—Gunn.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Process—Form of warrant when buildings erected before warrant granted.—Held that a warrant by a Dean of Guild granting leave to erect a building which had in fact been erected before the warrant was applied for, though inaccurate and inappropriate, was not invalid.

Observations per Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren as to the form which a warrant in such circumstances should take.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Heritable right—Competing titles—Onus.—The owner of premises within a burgh having applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect a flue inside the subjects belonging to him—the title to which he produced—an adjoining proprietor objected that the proposed operation would encroach on his property. The Dean of Guild, considering that the answers raised a question of heritable right which was outwith his jurisdiction, sisted process for twenty-one days to enable the respondent to bring an action for its determination in a competent Court. The respondent not having done so, the Dean of Guild granted the warrant prayed for.

No. 5.

Oct. 18, 1895. Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees.

1st Division. Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

The respondent appealed on the ground that the onus should have been laid upon the petitioner of proving his right. Held that the petitioner having produced a title to the subjects occupied by him, which was ex facie good, the onus had been properly laid upon the appellant of disproving it.

Charles Wilson & Sons, butchers, 19 South Castle Street, Edinburgh, erected a flue in the back tenement of the premises occupied by them as tenants under Beattie's trustees, who were the owners of the subjects. The flue was intended to serve a furnace used by them in connection with the sausage making department of their business. They obtained no warrant from the Dean of Guild authorising the construction of the flue, and after intimation had been made to them that they should have, in the first instance, obtained a warrant, they were fined for neglecting to do so. Thereafter Messrs Wilson & Sons, with the consent of the proprietors, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild craving a warrant "to erect a flue entirely inside the property occupied by them at the back of 19 South Castle Street . . . the said flue to be made of brick, all as shewn on two plans herewith produced."

The flue referred to in the prayer of the petition was the one which had already been erected.

Answers were lodged by William Mackay's trustees and Hugh Douglas.

The respondents averred that the works in question were executed on the back wall of certain premises in Rose Street which belonged to them, and which adjoined the back tenement occupied by the petitioners, that the chimneys of the respondents' property were carried up this back wall, and that the petitioners had, in order to form a flue for their furnace, connected the furnace with one of the respondents' chimneys by, inter alia, slapping out the wall. They further averred that the use of this chimney for the purposes of a furnace, boiler, and engine flue, was a source of damage and nuisance to the respondents, and was an infringement upon the respondents' rights of property.

The titles produced by the petitioners shewed that the wall in question was either their exclusive property or was at least a mutual gable.

On 28th February 1895 the Dean of Guild found that the averments of the respondents raised questions which were not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court, and sisted process for twenty-one days to admit of the respondents, if so advised, raising an action for the determination of these questions in a competent Court.

The respondents did not raise any action.

On 20th June 1895 the Dean of Guild recalled the sist of 28th February 1895, and granted warrant to the petitioners in terms of the prayer of the petition and of the plans therewith produced.

The respondents appealed, and argued;—The course followed by the petitioners in not going to the Dean of Guild until after the flue was erected was prejudicial to the appellants, and it was incompetent for the Dean of Guild to grant a warrant for the performance of an operation which had been already executed. The whole proceedings having been irregular, they should be set aside. In any view the Dean of Guild was wrong in laying the onus upon the appellants. The petitioners [were] seeking to invert possession, and the onus therefore was upon them.

No. 5.

Oct. 18, 1895.
Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees.

Argued for the petitioners;—The warrant was in the form usual in such a case, but even if it were irregular, that was a purely technical objection, and the point had not been insisted in in the inferior Court. It was too late now, and in any view it would serve no purpose to have the warrant rewritten. The petitioners had produced an ex facie title to the subjects, and it was for the respondents to shew that they were going beyond their right.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild granting warrant to make certain structural alterations in the premises of the present respondents. It would appear from the proceedings that these alterations had in fact been made a considerable time before the warrant of the Dean of Guild was applied for, but that he, in the exercise of a very ancient jurisdiction, and on the application of his fiscal, fined the owners of the premises (the respondents) for not having obtained a warrant before proceeding with their alterations, and interdicted them from going on. To purge themselves of the contempt of which they had been found guilty the respondents presented their application, which, I think, should have craved approval of the operations as executed, but which was put in the form of a petition for the approval of works to be executed. Answers were put in, and the warrant appealed against is in the ordinary form, granting authority to execute the alterations.

Your Lordships will, I think, agree with me that this is not an accurate form of warrant in such circumstances, and that it would have been better if the interlocutor, instead of taking the form of a warrant to erect, had narrated that after examination the Dean of Guild approved of what had been done, using any appropriate language to distinguish between approbation of what had been done and the ordinary case of approval of something proposed to be done. I cannot think, however, that the omission to notice this distinction should invalidate the warrant. At most, the effect of such criticism would be to have the case remitted to the Dean of Guild to pronounce an interlocutor more accurate in point of form. But this would not be desirable, as the case has been defended, and is brought here in order that we may dismiss the application and give effect to the appellant's plea of right. That is a course which I think it is impossible for us to follow in view of the procedure which followed in the Dean of Guild Court. When it was seen there that the defenders' objections involved questions of property, which were not appropriate to the jurisdiction of that Court, the Dean of Guild sisted process in order that an action might be raised by the defenders before a competent Court for the determination of the question. The defenders did not avail themselves of that sist; they took no proceedings, but asked for a judgment on the case as it stood. Accordingly, judgment was given for the petitioners approving of the work as executed. It has been said that the onus lay upon the latter to clear their title by instituting an action for that purpose, but no authority for this proposition has been cited, and according to my experience it is contrary to the usual practice. To support an application to the Dean of Guild a petitioner must produce a title to property which is prima facie good, but if there is opposition by anyone who says that the subjects are not included in the petitioner's title, or that he has a right of servitude, then, unless the question be one within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, it is his duty to sist the case, in order to have the question determined in this Court. In such circumstances it is according to all precedent for the defender to raise the action. Now, the petitioners produced a prima facie title, and in the absence of any attempt of the defenders to disprove it by an action, the Dean of Guild had no alternative but to act upon it and grant a warrant.

No. 5.
Oct. 18, 1895.
Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees.

I think that no sufficient ground has been stated for our displacing this warrant, and accordingly I am for dismissing the appeal.

LORD ADAM.—I agree, and while I think that the form of the warrant is not a happy one, and that it would have been better if it had been expressed as approving of works already executed, instead of sanctioning their erection, it does not appear to me that the appellants have been in any way prejudiced by this incorrectness of form. Had the petition craved approval of works already executed, the appellants' objections to it would have been the same, viz., that the property was theirs, and that a nuisance was caused by the petitioners, and the Dean of Guild would have acted just as he has done,—that is to say, he would have sisted the case, to allow the objectors to make out their case by raising an action. The only difference would have been that in the event of their not doing so he would have pronounced an interlocutor approving of the works executed instead of a warrant to erect, but the appellants would have been in precisely the same position as they are now. Accordingly, their real objection is not to the form of the petition, but to having, as they say, the onus of raising an action thrown upon them. I agree that the Dean of Guild was quite right in what he did. There may be cases in which the onus should be on the petitioner, as for example, where the subjects are ex facie the objector's property, and are not included in the petitioner's titles; but that is not the case here, and nothing has been said to shew that this should have been done.

The result of the action would of course be the same, on whichever party this onus lay, so that the question is comparatively unimportant. On the whole matter I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

CURROR, COWPER, & CURROR, W.S.—JOHN MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 6.
Oct. 19, 1895.
Alston v. Alston.

JOHN STIRLING ALSTON AND OTHERS, Petitioners (Respondents).—Clyde.

MRS A. A. M. ALSTON, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Cook.

Curator Bonis—Insanity—Opposition of alleged incapax—Necessity for inquiry.—A petition was presented, along with two certificates by medical men, for the appointment of a curator bonis to a person, on the ground that he was of unsound mind. The alleged incapax lodged answers, in which he denied that he was insane. He further averred that he was a domiciled Englishman, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts. The Lord Ordinary (Low) granted the petition without inquiry. On a reclaiming note, held that, having regard to the statements in the answers, the petition should not have been granted without inquiry as to the question of domicile and as to the respondent's insanity.

No. 6.

Oct. 19, 1895.
Alston v. Alston.

Bill-Chamber.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

ON 4th July 1895 a petition was presented by John Stirling Alston, residing in Ayr, and others, for the appointment of a curator bonis to Harry Ritchie Alston.

The petitioners stated that Mr Alston was an inmate of a private asylum kept by Dr Chambers at the Priory, Roehampton, near London, and that he was "of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his own affairs, or for giving direction for the management thereof," and they produced two medical certificates to that effect. They further stated that Mr Alston was a native of Lanarkshire, and a domiciled Scotsman.

Answers were lodged for Mr Alston and his wife, who stated that Mr Alston had for a short time been, and still was, "resident at the Priory, Roehampton." They averred,—"The respondent, Harry Ritchie Alston, is not a domiciled Scotsman, or subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts. He is and has for some time been a domiciled Englishman. . . . The said respondent is not of unsound mind, or incapable of managing his affairs, or giving directions for their management."

No medical certificates were produced with the answers.

On 20th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low), "having considered the petition and answers and heard counsel," appointed a curator bonis to Mr Alston.

The respondents reclaimed, but before the hearing Mr Alston died, and parties agreed that the appointment of the curator must be recalled.

On the question of expenses the respondent Mrs Alston argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in appointing a curator bonis without inquiry of some sort into the state of the respondent's mind. His Lordship had acted as he did because the respondents did not support their answers with medical certificates. But in circumstances like the present an inquiry was always ordered.[1] Moreover, the respondents had averred that Mr Alston was a domiciled Englishman. If he was, then the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts was excluded, for it was not averred that there was any moveable estate in Scotland which required protection. The petitioners had recognised this, for they had made a similar application in England. The respondent was entitled therefore to expenses, or at least to the expenses of the reclaiming note.

Argued for the petitioners;—The respondent Mr Alston was admittedly resident in an asylum when the petition was presented, and the petitioners had produced two medical certificates that he was incapable of managing his affairs. In these circumstances, mere statements in denial were not sufficient, and the respondents had not even produced medical certificates. The Lord Ordinary was right therefore.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—All parties are agreed that the appointment of curator must be recalled, Mr Alston having died, but the first question is, Can the Lord Ordinary's judgment be maintained? In a word, I think he went too fast, because the answers contain a distinct and articulate denial of the essential allegation of insanity. There is also a question of domicile. Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary was not in a position to disregard the answers as he did. Mr Cook's clients therefore were justified in presenting

[1] A B v. C D, Nov. 8, 1890, 18 R. (H. L.) 90; Yule v. Yule, Nov. 29, 1881, 19 S. L. R. 140; Taylor v. Macfarlane, Nov. 12, 1847, 10 D. 38; 19 Scot. Jur. 105.

[2] A B v. C D, 18 R. (H. L.) 90.

No. 6.
Oct. 19, 1895.
Alston v. Alston.

a reclaiming note, and accordingly Mrs Alston is entitled to expenses from the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Then, as regards the period anterior to that, we have really no means of coming to a conclusion; we have no material for deciding who was right and who was wrong, and the parties do not propose a proof. We shall therefore find no expenses due to or by any of the parties prior to the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, dismissed the petition, and found the respondent Mrs Alston entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and quoad ultra found no expenses due to or by any of the parties.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—A. P. PURVES & AITKEN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 7.
Oct. 22, 1895.
John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

JOHN WILSON & SON, LIMITED, Appellants.—Balfour—Shaw—Cook.
COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Sir Charles Pearson—A. J. Young.

Stamp—Conveyance on sale—Transfer of assets of private partnership to public company—Identity of partners and shareholders—Consideration—Company—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 39), secs. 54 and 55—First Schedule.—Where a private partnership conveyed its whole assets to a joint stock company limited by shares, consisting exclusively of the same partners, in consideration of each partner getting shares in the new company equal in value to his holding in the old partnership, held that the conveyance was a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that the disposition was chargeable with ad valorem stamp-duty on the value of the stock transferred.

John Foster & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R. [1894], 1 Q. B. 516, approved.

1ST DIVISION.

THIS was an appeal on a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 39), at the request of John Wilson & Son, Limited, with respect to the stamp-duty chargeable on an instrument executed in connection with the conversion of the private firm of John Wilson & Son into a limited company.

The case set forth the following facts :*—

---

* The following clauses, inter alia, of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 39), were referred to :—By the first schedule there are charged the following stamp-duties, viz. :—

"Conveyance or transfer on sale of any property (except such stock as aforesaid) where the amount or value of the consideration for the sale does not exceed £5, ... £0 0 6

. . . . . .

"For every £50, and also for any fractional part of £50 of such amount or value, ... 0 5 0

"And see sections 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61.

. . . . . .

"Conveyance or transfer of any kind not hereinbefore described, ... 0 10 0

"And see section 62.

"Deed of any kind whatsoever not described in this schedule, 0 10 0"

Section 54 of the Act is as follows :—"For the purposes of this Act the

No. 7.

Oct. 22, 1895. John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

By deed of assumption dated 25th, 26th, and 27th December 1894, which proceeded on the narrative that John Wilson and Matthew G. Wilson, his son, had carried on business in partnership for a number of years as malleable iron tube manufacturers and as brassfounders under the name of John Wilson & Son, and that the whole capital of the firm, amounting to £100,000, belonged to John Wilson, the other members of Mr Wilson's family and two gentlemen in the employment of the firm were assumed as partners—making eight partners in all. To these eight persons Mr Wilson, with consent of himself and his son Matthew, as trustees vested in the whole assets of the firm, donated, assigned, and conveyed the capital of the firm in various amounts.

By a subsequent "minute of agreement among John Wilson & Son and partners thereof," dated 28th, 29th, and 31st December 1894, it was agreed,—First, "That the said whole parties have resolved and now resolve to convert the company into a company limited by shares to be registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, the capital of the company after registration being the same as at present, videlicet, £100,000 sterling, but divided into shares of £10 sterling each. . . . ."

Second, "That the share and interest which each of the partners has at present in the company shall remain the same after registration, only it shall then be expressed in shares instead of in pounds sterling, and accordingly the company after registration shall forthwith allot its shares as follows: . . . And the said several parties agree and engage to accept of such shares in full satisfaction to them respectively of their present shares and interests in the capital of the company and whole assets thereof."

Third, "That the parties agree and engage that at or prior to the issue of the shares mentioned in the preceding article, the company, as constituted after registration, shall formally assent to this minute of agreement, and procure this minute and such assent filed in the office of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies in Edinburgh, in terms of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. . . ."

This deed was impressed with a stamp-duty of 10s. It was filed in the office of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at Edinburgh on 3d January 1895.

Thereafter, John Wilson and Matthew G. Wilson, as trustees for behoof of the company of John Wilson & Son, granted the following expression 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument, and every decree or order of any Court or of any Commissioners, whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser, or any other person on his behalf or by his direction."

---

Section 55, subsection (1), is as follows:—"Where the consideration, or any part of the consideration, for a conveyance on sale consists of any stock or marketable security, the conveyance is to be charged with ad valorem duty in respect of the value of the stock or security."

Section 57 is as follows:—"Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in any part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty."

No. 7.

Oct. 22, 1895. John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

disposition (dated 2d and 5th February 1895):—"Considering that by minute of agreement dated the 28th, 29th, and 31st days of December 1894, . . . the said partners agreed to convert the said company of John Wilson & Son into a company limited by shares, to be incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862 to 1890, upon the terms contained in the said minute, that the company was incorporated upon the said 3d day of January 1895 under the name of John Wilson & Son, Limited, and that after the said incorporation the company, by minute of assent, of date the 30th, formally assented to the foresaid minute of agreement, and procured the said minute of assent to be filed in the office of the foresaid registrar, of date the 31st, both days of January 1895: And further considering that the heritable subjects and others hereinafter described and disponed which form part of the assets of the said company of John Wilson & Son were acquired by the said company of John Wilson & Son, when we, the said John Wilson and Matthew Gemmell Wilson were the only partners therein, the titles being taken in favour of us, the said John Wilson and Matthew Gemmell Wilson, as trustees for behoof of the said company and partners thereof, present and future, according to their respective rights and interests therein, and that we as such trustees still stand heritably vested in said subjects and others: And further considering that in consequence of the said company being now incorporated as aforesaid, and therefore able to hold and be heritably vest in the said subjects and others directly without the intervention of us as trustees, it is right and proper that we should grant the disposition under written in order to divest ourselves of the said subjects and others, and devolve the same and all other assets in favour of the said company: Therefore we, the said John Wilson and Matthew Gemmell Wilson as trustees heritably vest as aforesaid, at the request and with the special advice and consent of the said company of John Wilson & Sons," and individual partners, "and we, the said whole consenters, for our own several and respective rights and interests, and we, the whole parties hereto, of joint consent and assent, do hereby assign and dispone to and in favour of the said John Wilson & Son, Limited, incorporated as aforesaid, and to the assignees of the said John Wilson & Son, Limited, heritably and irredeemably"—In the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth places, certain heritable properties, including the whole business premises of John Wilson & Son, with the buildings and machinery thereon: "And in the sixth place, All and Sundry the whole moveable estate, property, and effects of and relating to the foresaid company of John Wilson & Son, and businesses carried on thereby in Glasgow, including all book debts and goodwill, as also the whole moveable machinery on or connected with the several heritable subjects hereinbefore disponed, dispensing with the generality of this conveyance, and declaring the same to be as good, valid, and effectual as though every particular of the said whole moveable estate, property, and effects, machinery and others had been herein particularly set forth, with entry as at the first date hereof: And we, the said John Wilson and Matthew Gemmell Wilson, as trustees foresaid, with consent foresaid, assign the writs, and have delivered the same so far as in our possession; and we, with consent foresaid, assign to our said disponees all right competent to us as trustees foresaid, or to us the consenters, or any of us, to demand delivery or exhibition of the undelivered writs. . . ."

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue were of opinion that the

No. 7.

Oct. 22, 1895. John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

instrument was chargeable with ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale, and that the sum to be deemed the consideration, in respect of which it was so chargeable, was the sum of £100,000, being the cumulo amount or value of the stock or shares of John Wilson & Son agreed to be allotted to the whole partners of John Wilson & Son in terms of the said minute of agreement.

The Commissioners accordingly assessed the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty of £500 upon the instrument in respect of this sum of £100,000. John Wilson & Son, Limited, however, declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the said Commissioners, on the ground that the acts and procedure of John Wilson & Son, in assuming the new partners into the company of John Wilson & Son, and after the assumption agreeing to convert the company into a company limited by shares, and thereafter carrying the agreement into effect, did not constitute a sale either in substance or form, and that the disposition was not liable to an ad valorem duty, but was originally sufficiently stamped with the duty of 10s.

At their request the Commissioners stated the present case, the question for the opinion of the Court being—"Whether the said instrument, in the circumstances above set forth, is liable to be assessed or charged with the said ad valorem conveyance on sale duty in respect of the sum of £100,000, or with the duty of 10s. only?"

Argued for the appellants;—It was not enough that stock or shares were given for the conveyance to make it a conveyance on sale under section 55 (1). There must be a sale. Here neither was the form of the deed appropriate to a sale, nor was the transaction in substance a sale. It was a case of divestiture by trustees in order to complete an arrangement already executed by the parties who had the beneficial right to the assets. Had there been no heritable property, then no deed would have been required. Mere delivery would have been sufficient. Sale implied a price. There was none here. It also implied a buyer and a seller. Here the partners of the old firm and the shareholders of the new company were the same. There was complete identity of persons and interests. But the same person could not be both buyer and seller. The case of Foster,[1] even if it were identical with the present, was not binding on this Court, and ought not to be followed. But it was different in its circumstances, and was distinguishable. Great weight was attached by the Judges there to the form of the transaction, for the deed by which it was carried through was appropriate only to a sale. The parties truly interested were on the face of the deed divested of their property, and received shares therefor from the company. There was no similarity between such a deed and the conveyance here. In this case the partners had already been vested in the shares of the company.[2] The transaction here was more akin in legal effect to a partition than a sale.[3]

Argued for the respondents;—The present case could not be distinguished from Foster.[1] The substance of the transaction in each case was the conversion of a private firm into a public company. There

[1] John Foster & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R. [1894], 1 Q. B. 516.

[2] Anderson v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Oct. 19, 1878, 6 R. 56.

[3] Macleod v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, June 3, 1885, 12 R. 1045.

No. 7.

Oct. 22, 1895. John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

was here as there a transfer of the partnership assets to the new company, the consideration being shares. It was immaterial that the parties conveying the assets were the trustees of the old firm. That was an accident of title. The true interest in and right to the assets were in the partners, and the trustees were merely their hand. The Scots cases cited by the appellants had no bearing on the present, being entirely different in their circumstances.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the determination of the Commissioners is right. It seems to me that the counsel for the parties are right in what they have made common ground, namely, that the earlier and initial transaction which is set out in this case does not materially affect the merits of the legal question which we have to determine. It appears that Mr Wilson was minded to distribute his interest in this business among the several members of his family, and he accordingly, by deed, donated to them certain portions of the partnership assets. But that is rather historically than argumentatively the beginning of this question, because we find that in the very end of 1894 this donation had been carried into effect, and there was constituted a private partnership consisting of Mr Wilson, several members of his family, and two gentlemen who had been connected with him in business; and these were then, by Mr Wilson's gift, beneficially vested in the assets which ultimately are the subject of conveyance. So stood matters for about a month, there existing this private partnership consisting of these eight persons. It is true that the heritable property was not formally vested in the partners, but stood in the names of Mr John Wilson and Mr Matthew Wilson, his son, but this was for a purely technical reason, and not the less were those eight persons beneficially interested in all the property which they proceed to deal with, and the trustees, it is needless to say, had but one duty, and that was to keep the property for them, or to hand it over to their assignees. Now, they determined to constitute a limited liability company, of which they should be, I think it is safe to say, in the meantime, the whole members; and they put this in form by executing the minute of agreement, the substance of which is on pages 8 and 9 of this case. That agreement sets forth that they resolved to constitute a company. The company was constituted, and once that was done the deed in question was executed. Now, the deed in question is in substance a conveyance by the private company to the limited liability company. It is true that, formally, the leading parties to the deed are the trustees who held the property, but then, as I have said, they were absolutely at the call and command of their beneficiaries, and they intervene merely to give effect to the agreement and the resolution of their beneficiaries. Now, the conveyance is a conveyance of property, both heritable and moveable, from the private company to the limited company. It is quite true that this has been represented as being neither more nor less than a conversion of a private company into a limited liability company. That, in a sense, is true; but then the legal effect of what was done was that the private company parted with their rights in the specific articles of property, land, tubes, stock in trade, and the like, handed them over to the limited liability company, and got in exchange merely shares in the limited liability

No. 7.

Oct. 22, 1895.
John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

company. Now, the question we have to do with is, whether that is a conveyance on sale in the sense of this statute, and we are aided in determining that question by the interpretation clause which has been referred to, section 55, which says that you do not require to have money, but that money's worth, including shares, will do perfectly well as the consideration. Now, first, what do the true disponers—for I take them to be the private company—what do the true disponers have? Certain property, land, and stock in trade. What do they get for that? The answer to that is set out in the deed itself, which is the subject of dispute, and it is to be found in the previous agreement by which the private company and its individual members resolve to part with the specific articles, giving them to the joint stock company and taking in exchange the right to shares. It seems to me that on a fair construction of the statute, the sections invoked by the Crown do apply to that transaction. But further, Mr Balfour has very fairly admitted that, setting aside certain rather superficial distinctions to which he gave a fair although not excessive consideration, this case is not distinguishable from the case of Foster[1] which was decided very recently in the Appeal Court of the High Court of Justice in England. I have examined that case, and I think Mr Balfour is perfectly right, that it deals with precisely the case which we have here, taking it as a case of conversion of a private company into a limited liability company; and there the reasoning of the Judges, which in the Court of Appeal was entirely in one direction, leads them to the conclusion that that is a conveyance on sale, the consideration being stock, and there being, not merely in legal language but in substance, a conveyance of property from one party to another. I am greatly influenced by that case, which I think a direct authority, and I concur in the reasoning which prevailed.

LORD ADAM.—I agree that this case cannot be distinguished from the case of Foster[1] to which we have been referred; and I have further to say that there has not been raised, to my mind, any such doubt as to the soundness of the decision in the case of Foster[1] as to lead me to dissent or differ from the judgment of the Appeal Court in that case.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree in the judgment proposed. My opinion is that the contract between the private company, consisting of Mr Wilson's family and two gentlemen connected with him in business on the one hand, and the new limited company consisting of the same partners on the other, followed by a conveyance of the stock and assets, included a conveyance on sale in the sense of the Stamp-Duty Act. There is no exhaustive definition of sale in the Stamp-Duties Act; but there is a series of clauses from the 54th to the 62d in which a number of different cases—in fact all the more usual and obvious cases—which look a little different from sale, are considered and are placed under that category. I say this is not an exhaustive category, because the subject is resumed in the 73d section, where the case of exchange of land for land is considered and an equivalent duty is imposed. But I think this much is clear on the series of sections to which I have

[1] John Foster & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R. [1894], 1 Q. B. 516.

No. 7.
Oct. 22, 1895.
John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

referred, and especially on the 55th and 57th sections, that where land or a universitas or capital stock being the subject of sale, is given in exchange for securities or shares, the securities or shares are considered to be the equivalent of a price, and the value of the securities or shares is charged with duty as consideration money. Indeed, I think it was hardly disputed that if the circumstances had been varied to this extent, that the new joint stock company was a company consisting of different members from the old, the statute would have applied. Mr Balfour's argument was rested mainly, I think, on this, that he was entitled to take it as a fact that under the transaction in question there was substantial identity in the persons who received benefit as vendors and purchasers. He did not, and could not, controvert the proposition that there is no legal identity, because, when a number of persons are constituted as a company under the Companies Act, the new company is by statute a corporation having an identity distinct from that of its constituent members or those to whom shares may be allotted. Now, after giving the best consideration to that argument, and admitting that this may be considered a hard case for the family, I am unable to adopt the view that a case of substantial identity between sellers and purchasers who are theoretically distinct can be regarded as an exception to the scope of the statute. I think this case must be determined upon the legal fact that there is a sale, or what the statute treats as equivalent to a sale, from a private partnership to a company which for the present consists of shareholders having the same proportionate interests as the old, but which may hereafter be very different in its constitution. If it were possible to distinguish the case as specifically different from the ordinary case of the sale of a business to a joint stock company, I should have been disposed to give effect to Mr Balfour's argument. But it seems to me to be impossible to draw a distinguishing line anywhere between—first, the case of a sale where the vendors and purchasers are entirely distinct; secondly, the case of a sale to a company which consists in substantial proportions of the original sellers and also of new shareholders who come in; thirdly, the case of a sale by private individuals to a company which, except to a very small extent, consists of members of the old undertaking; and lastly the case where the interests are identical. I think the case where the component members of the new firm and the old are the same, and where their shares are the same, is merely a limiting case of a sale with a reserved interest in the vendors, and not a distinct and separable case.

Then I agree with your Lordship in the chair that our opinion on this point is fortified by the decision in the English case of Foster,[1] in which all the arguments that have been addressed to us to-day were considered, and were considered so carefully that there resulted a difference of opinion amongst the Judges, the majority being in favour of the view on which we propose to proceed. I should be extremely averse to considering questions of revenue law independently of English precedents, because this Court in revenue cases is just a co-ordinate Court with the English Exchequer jurisdiction. It would be in the highest degree inconvenient that the same revenue

[1] John Foster & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R. [1894], 1 Q. B. 516.

No. 7.

Oct. 22, 1895. John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue.

statute should be interpreted differently in different parts of the United Kingdom, with the result that taxation should be levied in the one country while there was exemption in the other. Of course, where the circumstances are different, it may happen that indirectly a conflict of opinion should arise. But I see no distinction of circumstances here, and even if I were less fully persuaded than I am of the soundness of the decision in Foster's[1] case, I should be disposed to defer to it as an authoritative exposition of the law. I agree with your Lordships who have spoken, that the determination of the Commissioners is right, and that it is put upon the right ground.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The case of Foster & Sons v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue[1] is not distinguishable from the present, and I think that we ought to follow that decision. I agree with your Lordships that the argument which we have heard from Mr Balfour has entirely failed to displace the reasoning upon which that case stood.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

R. P. STEVENSON, S.S.C.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895. Henderson v. Russell.

WILLIAM HORN HENDERSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson —W. Campbell.

JAMES RUSSELL, Defender (Exceptor).—Jameson—Cullen.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Issue—Counter issue—Veritas—Evidence competent to defender without counter issue.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer obtained an issue whether the defender falsely and calumniously stated that a clause in an agreement between a client of the pursuer and the Police Commissioners of a burgh had been added by the pursuer to the agreement after its execution by the Commissioners, meaning thereby that the clause had been fraudulently interpolated in the agreement by the pursuer after execution.

The defender admitted that he had made the statement, and stated that it was true, but denied the innuendo.

At the trial the defender proposed to adduce evidence to shew that the clause was added after execution by the Commissioners, but the evidence was disallowed by the presiding Judge, on the ground that it was an attempt to prove veritas without a counter issue.

In a bill of exceptions, held that the evidence was competent as tendered to prove a fact relevant to the defence.

2D DIVISION.

WILLIAM HORN HENDERSON, solicitor, Linlithgow, raised this action against James Russell, solicitor there, for damages in respect of a slander alleged to have been uttered by the defender on two separate occasions.

The pursuer's averments were to the following effect:—The Police Commissioners of Linlithgow entered into negotiations with Mr Seton of Preston for the lease of water on his property. The pursuer acted as Mr Seton's agent, and in February 1889 he sent to Mr Thom, solicitor, Linlithgow, the clerk of the Police Commissioners, the draft of an agreement for a lease of the water which contained this clause: —" . . . And they shall be bound to relieve the first party and

[1] John Foster & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R. [1894], 1 Q. B. 516.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895. Henderson v. Russell.

his foresaids of all expenses which they may incur in connection therewith, and with the preparation of this and the said other minute of agreement, and of the lease to follow thereon, in the same manner as if they had obtained their rights under the provisional order for which they have made application."

The clerk returned the draft with the clause deleted. The pursuer insisted on the clause being retained, and wrote the word "stet" opposite to it. (Cond. 6) "On 5th March 1889 the pursuer sent a clean draft of the agreement to the clerk to the Commissioners. Through the omission of a clerk in the pursuer's employment to notice the word 'stet,' and unknown to the pursuer, the clause for expenses was omitted. The clean draft was returned by the clerk of the Commissioners approved, and the agreement was subsequently engrossed from it, and sent by the pursuer to Mr Seton for his signature." (Cond. 7) "After the agreement had been engrossed, but before it was sent to the clerk to the Commissioners for signature, the omission of the clause regarding expenses was noticed by the pursuer, who instructed his clerk to add the clause to the agreement. As seventeen signatures were required for the deed, and as the clause in question occurred at the end of clause 10, it was engrossed at the end of that clause by writing it in closely instead of making a marginal addition. The agreement with the clause so inserted was sent to the clerk to the Commissioners by the pursuer on 9th May 1889," and the signatures of most of the Commissioners were appended thereto on 17th May 1889.

The pursuer further averred (cond. 10) that the defender, who had been a clerk in the pursuer's office down to April 1890, and who had afterwards commenced business on his own account in Linlithgow, moved by malice, sometime between May and July 1890, stated to John Thom that the clause above quoted had been added after the agreement had been executed by the Commissioners, and that in December 1893 the defender, who was then a Police Commissioner, made a similar statement at a meeting of the Commissioners. That the defender meant by said statements "that the said clause had been fraudulently interpolated in said agreement by the pursuer or by his instructions after the said agreement had been signed by the said Commissioners."

The defender denied that the clause as to expenses after the words "in connection therewith" was in the agreement when signed by the Commissioners. "Denied that he conceived any malice against the pursuer. Admitted that the defender, at the request of the clerk to the Commissioners (who stated to defender that he was taking evidence with the view of the Commissioners reducing said agreement if necessary), gave a statement on precognition to said clerk of what he knew as to said agreement, and then stated to him that the said expenses clause from and after the words 'in connection therewith' had been added or caused to be added by the pursuer to the water agreement after its execution by the Commissioners. . . . Explained that about the time when the said clause was added to the agreement the pursuer informed the defender that it had been included in the agreement with the authority of the clerk to the Commissioners, and the defender believed this to be the case when he made the said statement in precognition to Mr Thom. Further, the statements made in said precognitions are privileged and are true. . . . Explained that the statements made by the defender were not intended to bear, and do not bear, the innuendo here sought to be put upon them by the pursuer."

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895. Henderson v. Russell.

The defender denied that his statements were false and calumnious, and averred that they were true.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The statements made by the defender being privileged, and not having been made maliciously or without probable cause, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied. (4) The statements made by the defender being true in point of fact, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

The pursuer lodged the following issues:—"1. Whether, on a day between 15th May and 23d July 1890, the defender, in his office in Linlithgow, in the presence and hearing of John Thom, solicitor, Linlithgow, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that the clause in an agreement between the Police Commissioners of Linlithgow and Mr Seton of Preston, binding the Commissioners to relieve Mr Seton of expenses, had been added to the said agreement after its execution by the said Commissioners, or made a similar false and calumnious statement of and concerning the pursuer, meaning thereby that the clause quoted in the schedule hereto, or a portion thereof, had been fraudulently interpolated in the said agreement by the pursuer, or by his instructions, after its execution by the said Commissioners, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" The second issue was applicable to the defender's statement at the meeting of Police Commissioners.

The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"1. Whether the pursuer added or caused to be added to an agreement between the Police Commissioners of Linlithgow and Mr Seton of Preston, relating to the lease of the Hiltly and Preston Water, after the said agreement had been signed by the Commissioners, and between 20th May 1889 and 16th August 1889 the following words, videlicet:—'And with the preparation of this and the said other minute of agreement, and of the lease to follow thereon, in the same manner as if they had obtained their rights under the provisional order for which they have made application'?"

This issue was disallowed by the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) as it did not meet the innuendo.

At the trial on the 8th and 9th July 1895, the defender proposed to adduce evidence to the effect that in point of fact the clause was not in the agreement when it was signed on 17th May 1889. The pursuer objected on the ground that there was no counter issue of veritas, and the presiding Judge (the Lord Justice-Clerk) sustained the objection. The defender excepted to this ruling.

Mr Thom deponed,—"(Q.) Do you remember after Mr Russell had left Mr Henderson's office, but before he was in the Commission, of being in Mr Russell's one day about the month of June and reference being made to the water agreement? (A.) I remember the conversation referred to. . . . I cannot remember what Mr Russell said, or give it in conversational form; but I know what I wanted and what I got, and it was this, that this clause providing for the expenses of the negotiations and agreements had been inserted in the deed after it had been signed by the Commissioners. That is the substance of what Mr Russell said. . . . I was clerk to the Commissioners. I could not venture to ask anyone in the service of Mr Henderson the direct question—was this thing put in after signature? I wanted proof to advise the Commissioners to reduce the deed on the ground of fraudulent vitium. (Q.) Then were you, in short, when you went to Mr Russell, in the position of an agent taking a precognition?

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895. Henderson v. Russell.

(A.) Yes. (Q.) And you wished to be able to find out whether the Commissioners had any case or not? (A.) Yes. I informed Mr Russell why I wanted to know it."

The jury found for the pursuer on the first issue, with damages of one farthing, and for the defender on the second issue, on the ground that no malice had been proved.

The case came up on a bill of exceptions for the defender, and on a motion for a new trial.

Argued for the defender;—I. On the bill.—The ground for disallowing the evidence in question was that it amounted to evidence of veritas, which could not be proved without a counter issue. This was not so, because the essence of the alleged slander lay in the innuendo of fraud, while the defender only proposed to prove that the clause had been de facto added to the agreement after execution. The defender did not maintain on record the veritas of the statement as innuendoed. On the contrary, he disclaimed the innuendo, and averred that the statement was made by him in another and innocent sense. It was proof of the evidence in question not being evidence of veritas that the defender's proposed counter issue had been objected to by the pursuer, and refused on the ground that it did not counter the innuendo. The pursuer was bound to prove his innuendo. The defender was entitled in answer to lead evidence to shew (1) that the meaning of his statement was that averred by him; and (2) that in that sense it was true. The evidence under the latter head was material in judging whether he had uttered the statement in the sense he alleged, and was legitimate matter for the jury as shewing the circumstances in which the statement was made.[1]

II. On the motion for a new trial on the first issue.—The statements were privileged. The defender only spoke at the request of the official representative of the Commissioners, who were parties to the agreement, and therefore vitally interested in the matter. An analogous case was that of giving information to a man that he had been the victim of a crime, and privilege existed in such a case as well as where the information was given to the authorities. The existence of a direct interest to receive the communication was enough. On this view it did not matter whether Thom was or was not taking a precognition of the defender in the strict sense, although in point of fact Thom had deponed that he was precognoscing with a view to advising his clients. There was no proof of malice. The jury had so found on the second issue, and the pursuer's evidence on this head applied in the same way to both issues.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was no case of privilege. Although the jury found for the pursuer on the first issue, the damages assessed shewed their estimate of the interview between Mr Thom and the defender. It was plain that they regarded the statements made on this occasion as mere gossip, and that they did not regard Mr Thom as acting in an official capacity. There was no evidence that he was taking a precognition. Even assuming privilege, although the good faith of the defender would be presumed, the onus still lay on him to prove that the statement was true. But in order to discharge this he required not only a plea on record but a counter issue of veritas.[1] Without this the defender could not lead evidence to shew that his statement was true, and the jury were bound to assume that the statement was false.

[1] Torrance v. Weddel, Dec. 12, 1868, 7 Macph. 243, 41 Scot. Jur. 149; Craig v. Jex-Blake, July 7, 1871, 9 Macph. 973, 43 Scot. Jur. 363 and 524; Paul v. Jackson, Jan. 23, 1884, 11 R. 460; Bertram v. Pace, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 798; Shaw v. Morgan, July 11, 1888, 15 R. 865.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895. Henderson v. Russell.

LORD YOUNG.—What we have now to consider is the legal character of the action, and the legal questions which are raised by the bill of exceptions. There appears to have been a discussion between Mr Henderson, representing the proprietor of the property from which the town of Linlithgow desired to have a water privilege, and the clerk of the committee representing those charged with the town's interests in the matter. A dispute arose first as to the general terms of the bargain, the amount to be paid to the proprietor by the town for the water privilege, and about the town paying the proprietor's costs of the discussions and arrangements connected with the transaction. Then when the deed which was ultimately arranged came to be adjusted and executed, a controversy arose about a clause regarding these expenses, and I assume, and indeed feel sure, that Mr Henderson was of opinion that the clause which was ultimately introduced into the deed, whether before or after it was subscribed by the Commissioners, had been assented to. The parties are not agreed as to whether it was introduced into the deed before or after execution by the Commissioners. It certainly was introduced after the deed was extended, being crowded into a small space. Mr Henderson says—and I do not doubt his veracity in the sense that he is speaking according to his honest impression and belief—that it was introduced before it was subscribed by the Commissioners. The defender, on the other hand, who was a clerk in his office at the time, says that it was added after. That persuasion and statement of his is accompanied with the belief which he distinctly and frequently enough expressed, that Mr Henderson, the pursuer, from whom he received his information, had the authority of the Commissioners or of their officers to insert it after execution.

I may just remark here in passing that while we must judicially disapprove of any material addition being made to a deed after execution, and rather insist that the only regular course is to have everything filled in—sums of money, names which have been left blank, and so on—before subscription, I am not prepared to say that there is anything more than irregularity, or even that there is always irregularity, in making such additions. If it is discovered at the time of the execution of the deed, or immediately thereafter, that a name which had been left blank has not been filled in—a Christian name or a surname, or both—or a date which was left blank has not been filled in before subscription in whole or in part, I am not at all prepared to say that, if with the assent of parties, and quite regularly and honestly the thing is done after subscription, that will at all affect the deed, or even justify the application of the word "irregular" or "censurable" to the proceeding.

[1] Bertram v. Pace, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 798; Torrance v. Weddel, Dec. 12, 1868, 7 Macph. 243, 41 Scot. Jur. 149; Craig v. Jex-Blake, July 7, 1871, 9 Macph. 973, 43 Scot. Jur. pp. 363 and 524; Paul v. Jackson, Jan. 23, 1884, 11 R. 460, per Lord Fraser, 468.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895. Henderson v. Russell.

This action is brought upon a statement on record that the defender here, an old clerk of the pursuer, influenced by some malicious feeling against him, made a statement first to Mr Thom, the clerk to the Police Commissioners, sometime between May and July 1890, that the clause to which I have referred about expenses had been added to the agreement after its execution by the Commissioners, meaning thereby that the clause had been fraudulently interpolated in the agreement by the pursuer, or by his instructions, after its execution. If that statement was made by the defender to Mr Thom, it was certainly prima facie a slanderous statement, and so actionable. The action is also founded upon another allegation, that the statement was repeated by the defender in December 1893 at a meeting of the Police Commissioners, that this clause had been added after execution, the defender meaning to represent, and intending that those who heard him should understand, that it had been fraudulently interpolated by the pursuer or by his instructions. That, again, was prima facie slanderous and actionable, but I am of opinion upon the case as stated on record that the statement was privileged, for on the first occasion it was made to the clerk to the Commissioners, who were interested in the matter to which it related; and on the second, it was made to the Commissioners themselves,—they being the body representing in that matter the public—who were interested in the statement being true or false in the matter which it brought under their notice. If it is true, then the law does not allow the party who has been guilty of such conduct any damages for a true representation, if made, be it even in gossip and tittle-tattle. He is precluded by the impropriety of his conduct from seeking any reparation. But if a statement prima facie slanderous is made to those who are interested in the matter—legitimately interested in the matter—the occasion excludes the presumption of falsehood and malice, and as a condition of the pursuer's success in the action malice must be proved, and the most obvious and legitimate way of proving malice is to prove that the statement was false to the knowledge of the party making it, or that he made it without any legitimate knowledge upon the subject, and that it can only be attributed to some malice on his part against the party whose reputation the statement assailed.

Now, the defender here in this, upon the face of it, privileged case of alleged slander, admits upon record that he made the statement that the clause in question had been introduced into the deed,—added to the deed after execution,—but he altogether denies the imputation that he charged the pursuer with any fraud,—with any interpolation. He says that he was merely stating a fact, and that so far from charging the pursuer with fraud, which "interpolation" as it is used by us always signifies, he was simply stating the fact that the clause was added after subscription as he believed with the authority of the Commissioners. "Interpolate" is always used by us, as "interpolo" usually was in Latin, in a bad sense—meaning furbishing a thing up, giving it a false appearance, committing a fraud. It is not the introduction of words which may be introduced legitimately, or at all events excusably, and without any imputation of fraud; it means an imputation of fraud. Now, the defender distinctly denies any imputation of fraud or misconduct on the part of the pursuer. His admission is of a mere statement to the effect that the clause was added to the deed after subscription, as he believed, with the authority of the Commissioners, or as he believed Mr Henderson understood, with the authority of the Commissioners and without any reason for fault-finding on their part.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895.
Henderson v. Russell.

Well, the case went to trial upon the issue which is before us, with this innuendo, without which the statement imputed to the defender would not have been actionable at all. It goes to trial, and the defender's counsel proposes to ask the question of several witnesses,—"Was that added after execution, or was it not?" Now, that question was disallowed, and I am of opinion that it was a legitimate question, and ought to have been allowed. I have perhaps already indicated sufficiently the ground upon which I think so. In the first place, in a case of privilege, I think it is incumbent upon the pursuer to prove that the statement was made maliciously, the first step—the most obvious step—towards which is that it was false in the knowledge of the party making it, that it was untrue in fact; and in the second place, I am of opinion that in the action it was legitimate for the defender to prove that what he did say, not amounting, in my opinion, to slander at all, was true in itself, that the clause really was added after subscription. I think it was legitimate to allow him to prove that, and that therefore the questions which he proposed to put and which were disallowed upon the pursuer's objection, were competent questions, and ought to have been allowed. I do not think it is necessary to go further into the matter than that, for that leads to the exceptions being allowed, and the exceptions being allowed of necessity leads to the case being tried again if—and I hope parties will think of that "if"—the pursuer thinks that it is for his interest, and that it would be a reasonable and proper thing to have another trial in the matter.

There is a motion for a new trial here which we do not need to deal with separately, but I should like to observe that if there had been no exceptions but only this evidence before us, and the motion had been for a new trial upon the ground that there was no evidence reasonably to support the verdict upon the first issue—even to support the verdict of a farthing damages,—in short, that the pursuer had no case at all against the defender,—I should have been prepared to allow a new trial upon that ground. I think the case is one of privilege, and that the evidence laid before the jury here was not such as to entitle him to a verdict or reasonably to support the verdict for a farthing which the jury gave. I am of opinion, however, that we shall dispose of the case sufficiently by allowing the exceptions, and I propose judgment to that effect.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. In the circumstances of this case the defender could not (having regard to the decision in Bertram's[1] case) get a counter issue of veritas. He admitted having used the words complained of by the pursuer, but repudiated the meaning which the pursuer put upon them. The ruling of the learned Judge at the trial excluded evidence tendered by the defender on the ground that it was an attempt to prove the veritas without a counter issue. But the veritas which could only be proved under a counter issue was not at all what the defender proposed by the rejected evidence to prove. He was not trying to prove what

[1] 12 R. 798.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1895.
Henderson v. Russell.

he had repudiated. He was trying to prove a fact relevant to his defence, but a fact which did and might exist independent and separate altogether from the innuendo in the pursuer's issue. In these circumstances to reject the evidence tendered by the defender was, I think, wrong. I cannot help observing that the present state of our law, as regards what may or may not be proved by a defender without a counter issue, is not satisfactory. A defender should, in my opinion, be allowed to prove anything that is relevant to his defence of which he has given due notice on his record.

I agree, further, in what Lord Young said, that this case, both as regards the first and second issue was a case of privilege, and in that view I think there was no proof to support the verdict which the jury returned upon the first issue.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—At the time of the trial of this case this question came up, and it was certainly one of very great importance. In most cases before juries, objections taken to points of evidence do not, for the most part, really or seriously affect the main question of the case upon record, but this one undoubtedly did. I had an argument before me at the trial which I must say was a very different argument from that which we have had to-day—very meagre compared with what has been put before us to-day—although that does not make any difference in my responsibility in the matter. The cases cited before me seemed to point in the direction of the judgment which I gave, and no case was brought before me pointing in any other direction, although certainly there are some statements in the different cases which are rather confusing and very difficult to expiscate. But had the case of Shaw v. Morgan,[1] which has been brought up to day, been brought before me, and had I seen that this matter was dealt with by my learned brother Lord Young, with the assent of his brethren in the Division at that time, I do not think I would have given the judgment upon this objection which I did. I am satisfied,—I say it with regret,—that I erred in giving the judgment which I did. It is some satisfaction to know, and it has been said by your Lordships,—and upon that I agree most emphatically,—that whether this case had been rightly decided by me upon this question, or whether your Lordships sustained the bill of exceptions, still this verdict could not have stood, because I am very clearly of opinion with your Lordships that the verdict upon the first issue is not a verdict which is in accordance with the evidence, and on the same grounds which have been stated by your Lordships. The result will be that the bill of exceptions will be sustained and a new trial granted.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Allow the exceptions for the defender: Set aside the verdict and grant a new trial: Find the defender entitled to the expenses of the discussion in the Summar Roll, including the expense of preparing the bill of exceptions, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report: Quoad ultra reserve the question of expenses, and decern."

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—Agents.

[1] 15 R. 865.

THE REV. ROBERT POLLOK WATT AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Johnston —C. D. Murray. No. 9.

Oct. 23, 1895. Watt.

Trust—Charitable trust—Alteration of purposes—Nobile officium—Petition by persons named as trustees before accepting office—Title to sue.—A testator, who died in 1879, directed his trustees on the occurrence of a certain event to pay £3500 to the minister and kirk-session of a church in Edinburgh in trust for maintaining a male and a female missionary in connection with the congregation. In 1895, when the sum became payable, the minister and kirk-session presented a petition to the Court stating that a mission-hall was essential to the successful prosecution of mission work, and that the income of the fund, which would not probably exceed £100, would be insufficient to support two missionaries, and praying the Court to approve a scheme giving authority to the petitioners to spend £1000 in erecting a mission-hall and to employ the income of the remainder in supporting one missionary.

The Court, having regard to the fact that the trustees had not accepted office, and considering that it had not been shewn that the testator's scheme was impracticable, refused the petition.

1ST DIVISION.

THIS was a petition at the instance of the Rev. Robert Pollok Watt and others, the minister and kirk-session of the Infirmary Street (Edinburgh) congregation of the United Presbyterian Church, asking the Court to settle a scheme for the administration of a fund bequeathed in trust to the petitioners by Mr William Hunter, merchant, South Bridge, Edinburgh.

Mr Hunter died on 26th July 1879, leaving a trust-disposition dated March 1879 and codicils, by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees.

Mr Hunter, after providing for certain annuities, left the residue, amounting to £70,000, "to the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce and Manufacturers, whom failing, to the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, in trust, to found the 'William Hunter's Old Men's Fund,' from which annuities were to be granted as follows:—To ten persons not less than eighty years of age annuities of £30 each, to twenty persons not less than seventy years of age annuities of £20 each, to thirty persons not less than sixty years of age annuities of £15 each, and to persons not less than fifty years of age annuities of £10 each, to such extent as the free produce of the trust fund will safely admit."

By the fourth codicil, which was dated 22d July 1879, Mr Hunter made the following provision:—"If and when my trustees shall consider that before they denude my estate amounts to the value of £73,500 or upwards, of which they shall be the sole judges, then I direct that the sum of £3500 shall be paid over to the minister and kirk-session for the time of the Infirmary Street (Edinburgh) congregation of the United Presbyterian Church, and shall be held by them in all time coming in trust for the purpose of paying and applying the free income and annual proceeds thereof in maintaining a male missionary and a female missionary in connection with the said congregation, and with the beneficiaries of the old men's fund mentioned in my said trust-disposition and settlement, when constituted: And I declare that the male missionary for the time shall not be less than fifty years of age, that the female one shall not be less than forty years of age, and that both shall be God-fearing persons well qualified for the offices, and who will apply their whole time to their duties and have no other employment; and both missionaries shall be elected and appointed annually by the said minister and kirk-session for the time, who shall have

No. 9.
Oct. 23, 1895.
Watt.

power in their management of the sum of £3500 from time to time to make such regulations and conditions in regard thereto, and in regard to the duties and conduct of the said missionaries as to the said minister and kirk-session shall seem proper."

The petitioners, who were the legatees in trust mentioned in the codicil, had not accepted the trust. The legacy, which only became available in 1895, after deducting legacy-duty, amounted to £3150.

The petitioners stated,—"During the sixteen years that have elapsed since the death of the truster, great changes in the mission work of the said congregation have taken place, and the conditions attached to the said bequest by the truster are such as to render it impossible to carry out his intentions in strict obedience in detail to his directions. During his life, and while the said William Hunter was connected with the said congregation, the congregation rented mission premises, and regularly employed a missionary; but owing to changes in the district in which their church is situated and other circumstances, the congregation has not for many years been in possession of a mission-hall, and has not employed a missionary. A mission-hall or other premises are essential to the successful prosecution of mission work, and there is no present prospect of such being provided by the congregation. The income derived from the said sum of £3150 will not be sufficient to support two missionaries, as, having regard to the present return for trust moneys, it can hardly exceed £100 a-year. The limit of age and certain other of the conditions imposed by the truster will also make it extremely difficult for the congregation to obtain the services of suitable missionaries. The petitioners have maturely considered the terms of the above bequest, and they have been compelled to come to the conclusion that they could not, in the circumstances above narrated, carry it out according to the letter of the truster's directions."

The petitioners accordingly submitted a draft scheme for the administration of the fund, which modified the terms of the bequest in respect that it, inter alia, conferred powers on the trustees (1) to spend £1000 of the capital on the acquisition of a mission-hall, or to accumulate for that purpose the interest of the fund until it amounted to £1000; (2) to employ one male missionary only without restriction as to age; and (3) to regulate the conditions of the tenure of office of the missionaries to be appointed.

On 6th July 1895 the Court remitted to Mr Bremner P. Lee, advocate, to report upon the petition.

Mr Lee having lodged a report, counsel for the petitioners admitted that he could cite no case in which persons named as trustees had before accepting office asked the Court to modify the purposes of a trust, but argued that there was no incompetency in their doing so. The petitioners were anxious to accept and administer the trust in question, but they were unable conscientiously to do so unless the scheme of the truster was modified. Their view, after the most careful consideration, was that if they had accepted office and tried to give literal effect to Mr Hunter's will, the trust would have proved unworkable. If that had been so, the Court would have sanctioned such a scheme as was now asked. It should make no difference that the trust had not in fact been put in operation.[1]

[1] The petitioners referred to Glasgow Infirmary, March 19, 1887, 14 R. 680.

No. 9.

Oct. 23, 1895.

Watt.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In anything which I have to say adverse to the position taken up by the petitioners, I do not intend to reflect on the motives which actuated them in presenting this application. One can see, from what has been said by Mr Johnston, that it is really their anxiety and scrupulousness for the success of the mission that have led them to adopt a position which we cannot sustain.

In the first place, I have great doubt as to the competency or appropriateness of an application to settle a scheme for the administration of a trust framed by persons nominated to be trustees but who have not accepted the trust, and who, although nominated to the trust, say that, as at present advised, they are not minded to accept unless the scheme which they propose is sanctioned.

I have not heard any sufficient reason, nor am I aware of any precedent, for such a proceeding, in which the Court would interfere upon the application of persons occupying a perfectly irresponsible and tentative position, and without having before it anyone committed to the execution of the trust. Accordingly we have no guarantee for further procedure at all, but are asked to give effect to the no doubt honest but somewhat speculative criticisms and proposals of outsiders.

But, further, this testator died only in 1879, and all that is said is that external circumstances have so changed as to render his proposals less appropriate to 1895 than to 1879. These changes are mainly the inability of the congregation now to rent a mission-hall as they formerly did, and a fall in the rate of interest, which has rendered the fund less adequate for the purposes intended by the truster. Given due consideration to these circumstances, I am driven back to the question, what right have we to alter Mr Hunter's will made so recently as 1879? Is it because its provisions have become impracticable? Now the present petitioners, viz., the minister and session of this church, are entitled to have their opinions treated with great respect, for in a sense they may be regarded as experts in the mode of conducting mission work. But I am not prepared to accept the statement even from them that with a sum of £3000 they would be unable to get missionaries to carry on the work—at least in a humble way—intended by the testator. It may be that if one had to write the will now, it would be better to provide for only one missionary and supply him with a mission-room or hall for carrying on his work. But that is not our business, nor is it that of the trustees, but of Mr Hunter, who may have had more modest and less ambitious ideas on the subject and thought that if two middle-aged persons were selected to visit from house to house a great deal of unostentatious and homely work might be done with this money.

It seems to me that we are not entitled to sanction a scheme of this kind, the central object of which is the acquisition of a mission-hall which would absorb one-third of the whole fund, and at once cripple the objects which Mr Hunter had in view. I am not prepared to take that step. I do not think we have heard any adequate reasons for interfering with the terms of this bequest, least of all at the instance of persons who stand aloof from its execution. The sequel will depend on the reasonable and well-considered opinion which the trust disponees will now come to form as to their own course of action; for I cannot suppose that, because their views of the ideal

No. 9.

Oct. 23, 1895.
Watt.

apparatus of mission work do not coincide with Mr Hunter's directions, they will sacrifice this charity altogether.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—On the first point I conceive that it would be contrary to the usual practice to proceed to adjust a scheme at this stage, and at the instance of persons who refuse to say whether they will accept or decline the office of trustees, and who are consequently not yet charged with the administration of the trust. The Court has always taken a very liberal view in questions of title to sue with reference to the administration of charities, and has sustained all sorts of titles, e.g., that of a corporation, that of a sheriff of a county, and that of persons who represent the class intended to be benefited. But then in all these cases the persons who brought the application had to put themselves into a definite position in relation to the charity from which they had no intention of receding. But when, as here, disponees come forward with a scheme, they must first say whether they propose to accept or not the office imposed upon them, for if they do not accept they have no title to intervene; otherwise it might lead to this result, that when the Court had, after obtaining such information or advice as was available, approved of a scheme, the petitioners might decline to accept office, and then new administrators might be appointed, who might come and tell us that the scheme which we had sanctioned was not the best. The attitude which, no doubt with the best motives, the petitioners here have taken, is one which, in my opinion, disables them from promoting an application of this kind.

I also agree that if we were to consider the merits, there would be the greatest difficulty in sanctioning such a variation from the testator's purposes as would be entailed in the expending one-third of the whole fund in the erection of a mission-hall when nothing was contemplated by the testator but out-door work.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S., Agents.

No. 10.

Oct. 23, 1895.
Tod v.
Marshall.

JAMES TOD AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—John Wilson.
MRS GRACE MOFFAT MARSHALL, Respondent.—Chree.

Trust—Non-gratuitous Trustee—Petition for removal—Inner-House—Nobile officium—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 44), secs. 2 and 8.—Under section 2 of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1891, "'the Court' shall mean any Court of competent jurisdiction in which a question relative to the . . . removal of a trustee comes to be tried," and section 8 directs the removal of incapacitated trustees.

In a petition to the Inner-House for the removal of a trustee on the ground of incapacity, which was presented at common law, and made no reference to the Trusts Act of 1891, held that the Court, having jurisdiction to deal with the question of removal, was not entitled to treat the application as an appeal to its discretion for the exercise of its nobile officium, but was bound to apply the provisions of section 8 of the Trusts Act, 1891, and to remove the trustee on proof of his incapacity.

No. 10.

Oct. 23, 1895.
Tod v. Marshall.

1ST DIVISION.

THIS petition was presented at the instance of James Tod and J. B. M'Intosh, the surviving trustees and executors acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late John Marshall, S.S.C., praying the Court to authorise the petitioner James Tod to resign the office of trustee and executor, or otherwise to remove him from the office.

The truster died in 1870. The petitioner Mr Tod accepted a legacy bequeathed to him under the trust-disposition and settlement as a trustee and executor. The petitioners stated that Mr Tod was seventy-five years of age, and that owing to age and debility he was wholly incapacitated from attending to the affairs of the trust. They produced a medical certificate of his incapacity. They also explained subsequently that even if he were authorised by the Court to resign Mr Tod would not be able to do so, as he was precluded by his health from executing any deed whatever. The petitioners did not found upon or refer to the Trusts Acts.

Answers were lodged for Mrs Grace Moffat Marshall, the liferentrix of the trust-estate, who, inter alia, objected to the petition being granted until arrangements had been made for the appointment of suitable persons as new trustees.

Argued for the petitioners;—While the petition was formally an appeal to the nobile officium of the Court, and as such well presented to the Inner-House, that Court was a Court of competent jurisdiction in the sense of section 2 of the Trusts Act, 1891,* and was therefore bound to give effect to the provisions of that Act. Under section 8 a trustee incapacitated like Mr Tod fell to be removed.

Argued for the respondent;—The petition was an application at common law, and it was incompetent therefore for the Court to give effect to the provisions of the Act of 1891. That Act was nowhere referred to or founded upon in the petition. If it had been intended to take advantage of the Act the petition should have been presented to a Lord Ordinary. That was so enacted by section 16 of the 1867 Act (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), and that section was, by force of section 1 of the 1891 Act, which declared that the Trusts Acts "should be read and construed together," made applicable to petitions under the latter Act. It was not expedient in the circumstances for the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to remove Mr Tod.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Trusts Act of 1891 gives certain powers to, and imposes certain duties upon the Court, and then it says in section 2 that "the expression 'the Court' shall mean any Court of competent jurisdiction in which a question relative to the actings, liability, or removal of a trustee comes to be tried." Now, we have here an application which prima facie looks to be founded on common law, for it appeals to the nobile officium of the Court, upon grounds which preclude all idea of the application being disregarded as foreign to that jurisdiction. Accordingly this

* The Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 44), enacts, section 2,—"For the purposes of this Act . . . the expression 'the Court' shall mean any Court of competent jurisdiction in which a question relative to the actings, liability, or removal of a trustee comes to be tried."

Section 8.—"In the event of any trustee being or becoming . . . . incapable of acting by reason of physical or mental disability . . . such trustee . . . shall . . . be removed from office upon such evidence as shall satisfy the Court of the . . . incapacity . . . of such trustee."

No. 10.
Oct. 23, 1895.
Tod v. Marshall.

Court is competent to deal with, and is vested in, that application. That being so, it seems to me that this Court is affected by the alteration of law set out in the Act of 1891 in this regard, and that it is impossible for us to ignore the prescribed duty which is imposed on the Court by that Act—the duty which is imposed upon any competent Court dealing with the question of the removal of a trustee. The Legislature has really relieved the Court of the duty of exercising any discretion in the matter, and has bidden the Court remove the incapacitated trustee. I am therefore prepared to grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grant the prayer of the petition: Remove the petitioner James Tod from his office of trustee and executor under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late John Marshall . . . . Find the petitioners entitled to the expenses of this application and the procedure out of the trust-estate under their charge: Quoad ultra find no expenses due, and decern."

MYLNE & CAMPBELL, W.S.—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 11.
Oct. 23, 1895.
Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

JOHN PATON AND GEORGE PATON, Pursuers (Respondents).—Dickson—Salvesen.

THE CLYDESDALE BANK, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).

ALEXANDER SCOTT, Defender (Reclaimer).—Sol.-Gen. Murray—King.

Fraud — Cautioner — Fraudulent misrepresentation — Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60), sec. 6—Principal and Agent—Bank and Bank-agent.—In an action of damages against a bank and against S., the agent at one of its branches, the pursuer averred that S., knowing that D. R. & Company, customers of the bank, were largely indebted to the bank, and were insolvent, or at least were in great financial difficulties, conceived, along with a partner of D. R. & Company, a fraudulent design of obtaining the pursuer's acceptances in favour of D. R. & Company in order to apply them pro tanto in reducing D. R. & Company's debt to the bank. That in pursuance of this scheme D. R. & Company applied to the pursuer for accommodation and referred him to S., who falsely assured him (1) that D. R. & Company were in a thoroughly sound condition financially, and only required temporary accommodation; (2) that the sum due to the bank was very trifling; (3) that D. R. & Company had made up certain losses which it was known they had incurred; and (4) that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptances by the pursuer would be applied in extinction of the bank's debt, or of any obligation to the bank. That in reliance on these assurances the pursuer granted acceptances to D. R. & Company, which were all placed to the credit of D. R. & Company's bank account. That D. R. & Company were sequestrated, and the pursuers, as the bills fell due, paid them under protest.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that as the alleged representations and assurances were not in writing and subscribed by S., they were of no effect under section 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856.*

* The Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), section 6, enacts,—"From and after the passing of this Act all guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person, and all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain

No. 11.

Oct. 23, 1895.

Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

Held (1) that section 6 of the Act did not apply to the case, so as to exclude proof of the representations and assurances alleged to have been falsely made by S. as part of a fraudulent scheme; and (2) that the alleged fraudulent representations of S. were made in the course of his service, and so within the scope of his authority, and that the bank would be liable therefor.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

THIS action was raised by Messrs John and George Paton, merchants, Dundee, against the Clydesdale Bank, Limited, and Alexander Scott, formerly agent for the bank at their branch office in Dundee, for the recovery of £4000, 8s. 5d., alleged to be the value of certain acceptances granted by the pursuers to Douglas, Reid, & Company, merchants, Dundee, who were customers of the Clydesdale Bank.

The pursuers averred;—In March 1893 Douglas, Reid, & Company were indebted to the Dundee branch of the bank to the extent of £20,000. Shortly before that date they had sustained very serious losses in business, and in March 1893 they were insolvent, and remained so down to the date of their sequestration in August 1894. Alexander Scott, in March 1893, was aware of the firm's losses, and that they were insolvent, or at least were in great financial difficulties, and he became apprehensive of the safety of the bank's claim against them, and of the effect on his own position of requiring to report the real state of matters to the head-office of the bank. (Cond. 4) "In the circumstances above condescended on the said Alexander Scott, or otherwise in conjunction with Charles Reid, one of the partners of the said firm of Douglas, Reid, & Company, conceived the fraudulent design of getting the said Douglas, Reid, & Company to procure acceptances from the pursuers and other merchants in Dundee with the view of applying the proceeds of these acceptances in extinction pro tanto of the debt due to the Clydesdale Bank. It was a part of this scheme that the pursuers and the other mercantile friends to whom Douglas, Reid, & Company applied for acceptances should see the said Alexander Scott and get from him satisfactory assurances (first) as to the solvency of Douglas, Reid, & Company, and (second) that none of the money payable under the acceptances should be applied in extinction of any prior claim or debt of the bank or other creditor of Douglas, Reid, & Company." (Cond. 5) "In pursuance of this fraudulent scheme the said Charles Reid, in or about the month of March 1893, represented to Mr John Paton, the senior partner of the pursuer's firm, that his firm of Douglas, Reid, & Company required temporary accommodation, and suggested that Mr Paton should see the said Alexander Scott on the subject. Mr Paton accordingly saw Mr Scott, who assured him (first) that Douglas, Reid, & Company were in a thoroughly sound condition financially, and only required temporary accommodation; (second) that the sum due to the bank was very trifling; (third) that Douglas, Reid, & Company had made up the losses which they sustained through Lipman & Company's failure, by fortunate speculations in jute; and (fourth) that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptance by the pursuers would be applied in extinction of the bank's debt or of any obligation to the bank. The said Alexander Scott further assured Mr Paton that he held Mr Reid credit, money, goods, &c., postponement of payment of debt, or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person undertaking such guarantee, security, or cautionary obligation, or making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorised by him or them, otherwise the same shall have no effect."

---

No. 11.
Oct. 23, 1895.
Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

in high esteem, and that the bank was also prepared to assist the said Douglas, Reid, & Company, and see them through their difficulties. . . . The statements thus made by the said Alexander Scott were in all essential respects repeated, or at all events confirmed by him to Mr Paton on the occasion of the pursuers' granting each of the acceptances after mentioned. The said statements and assurances by the said Alexander Scott were false, and were made by him in pursuance of the fraudulent design above condescended on." That in reliance on these statements and assurances, the pursuers in March 1893, and subsequently, accepted bills drawn upon them by Douglas, Reid, & Company. That the bills sued for were granted in January and April 1894. (Cond. 11) "Notwithstanding the foresaid statements and assurances of the said Alexander Scott, the pursuers have now ascertained, and the fact is, that their said acceptances were all placed to the credit of the said Douglas, Reid, & Company's overdrawn account-current with the Clydesdale Bank at the several dates when the pursuers' said acceptances respectively were obtained as aforesaid. The defenders, the Clydesdale Bank, were thus lucrati to the extent of the proceeds of said acceptances." (Cond. 12) "In consequence of the said false and fraudulent representations, statements, and assurances, or one or more of them, and of the foresaid actings of the defenders, or one or other of them, the pursuers lost and the defenders gained the sum of £4000."

The defenders denied these averments, in so far as material.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having sustained loss and damage to the amount concluded for in consequence of the false and fraudulent representations, statements, and assurances of the defender Alexander Scott, are entitled to decree as concluded for against both defenders, or at least against the said Alexander Scott. (2) The pursuers having been induced to grant their said acceptances by the said false and fraudulent representations, statements, and assurances, or one or more of them, and the defenders being lucrati to the extent of said acceptances and interest thereon, decree should be pronounced as concluded for. (3) The defenders the Clydesdale Bank are liable for the fraud of the defender Scott, in respect that he was acting in said transactions within the scope of his duties as agent for the bank and for their benefit.

The following plea was added in the Inner-House:—"The pursuers having been induced to sign the said bills by the fraud of the said Alexander Scott, and the bank having received the proceeds thereof and being lucrati by said proceeds and the interest thereon, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) The averments of the pursuers are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action, et separatim are not sufficiently specific to be admitted to probation. (6) In any event, these defenders are not liable in damages, in respect that the alleged false representations were unauthorised and outwith the terms and scope of the said Alexander Scott's employment. (7) The alleged representations and assurances not having been in writing and subscribed by the person making the same, are by section 6 of the Act 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60, of no effect.

The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 29th August 1895, allowed a proof.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers' motion for a proof in this case was resisted

No. 11.

Oct. 23, 1895.
Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The fraudulent representations of Scott formed the ground upon which the bank were sued. On the averments of the pursuers it was plain that these were representations and assurances as to the character, credit, and ability of Reid, and were made to the effect or for the purpose of enabling Reid to obtain credit from Paton. Accordingly, they fell within the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 6, which introduced into Scots law the provisions of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds combined with section 6 of Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. IV. c. 14.[1] Lord Tenterden's view was ascertainable from remarks of Baron Pollock in Tatton v. Wade.[2] In Lyde v. Barnard,[3] it was clearly explained that the purpose of the Act was to meet cases like Pasley v. Freeman.[4] Misrepresentations, however gross, fell within the statute.[5] It did not matter that the object and result of the misrepresentations was that the bank should profit. The operation of the statute was not excluded because the representer was himself benefited.[6]

2. If Scott made the statements he was outside the scope of his employment, but even if within his employment, the undertaking that the bills should not be credited to the bank was an extraordinary undertaking, and could only be constituted by writ.[7] upon the ground that the representations and assurances of Scott, upon the faith of which the pursuers alleged that they accepted bills for the accommodation of Douglas, Reid, & Company, not being in writing and subscribed by him, were of no effect under the 6th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. It is true that the greater part of the alleged representations and assurances, said to have been given by Scott to the pursuers, might be brought within the scope of the very wide phraseology of the Act, namely, 'All representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person.' But then in order to bring the case within the Act the representations and assurances must be given 'for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, or postponement or payment of debt, or of any other obligation demandable of him.' Now, no doubt, the purpose for which the representations and assurances are said to have been made, was to be accomplished by enabling Douglas, Reid, & Company to obtain credit from the pursuers, but the purpose itself was to enable the bank to obtain payment of the debt of Douglas, Reid, & Company. That, in my opinion, is sufficient to take the case out of the provisions of the statute.

---

"The defenders further argued that the averments of the pursuers were not relevant, in respect that the bills granted by them to Douglas, Reid, & Company, upon the faith of the alleged representations and assurances, were met by the latter at maturity, and that it was bills subsequently granted which they failed to meet. It is averred, however, that when the later bills were granted, the original representations and assurances were referred to, and in substance repeated by Scott, and that the pursuers were thereby induced to grant the bills. I am therefore unable to say that the pursuers have not stated a relevant case, and I shall allow them a proof before answer."

[1] Bell's Commentaries (7th edition), 402, note 8; Martin's Treatise on Lord Tenterden's Act, ch. 3.

[2] Tatton v. Wade, 1856, 18 Scott's Rep. C. B. p. 381.

[3] Lyde v. Barnard, 1836, 1 M. and W. 101, per Abinger, C. B., p. 119.

[4] Pasley v. Freeman, 1789, 3 T. R. 51.

[5] Swann v. Phillips, 1838, 8 Ad. and El. 457.

[6] Devaux v. Steinkeller, 1839, 8 Scott's Rep., C. P., 202.

[7] Reid v. Reid Brothers, June 8, 1887, 14 R. 789; Garden v. Earl of Aberdeen, June 24, 1893, 20 R. 896; Stewart & Craig v. Phillips, Feb. 2, 1882, 9 R. 501; Forbes v. Caird, July 20, 1877, 4 R. 1141.

No. 11.

Oct. 23, 1895. Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

3. Assuming all the pursuers' statements to be true, Scott's representations were without the scope of his employment. Assurances regarding the ability of bank customers were beyond the limits of a bank manager's duty.[1] It was true that no employer could keep a benefit obtained by the fraud of his representative,[2] but the act must be within the scope of his employment and the principal must be benefited. The position which the defenders claimed was saved by Sir Montague Smith in Mackay.

Argued for the pursuers;—The action was founded upon the fraud of an agent by which the bank had been benefited. The scheme alleged was for the benefit of the bank. This was a good ground of action at common law. But the alleged representations did not fall within the Act, for they were made not for the purpose of obtaining money for Reid, but to induce Paton to grant acceptances, and that in order to obtain money for the bank. Formerly an averment of no value for a bill must be proved by writ, although the rule was elided by averment of fraud.[3] But now any relevant matter was provable by parole.[4] That was enough for the present case, unless it was inconsistent with the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, but that did not apply. The Scots Act was wider in phrase than the English Act, and included all representations leading a person to become creditor of another or to postpone asserting his right as a creditor, but such representations must be for some other person than the representer.[5] No case was cited where proof of representations was disallowed, when the party benefited was the representer himself. But the present was a case of the latter kind. The representations were made not for the benefit of Reid, but to enable the bank to operate payment of their account.

2. Scott's conduct was represented as an innominate contract. There was no contract between Scott and the pursuers, and the action was not founded on contract but upon a fraud inducing damage to the pursuers and advantage to the defenders. The bank could not retain the advantage and deny liability.[6]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The first question here is, whether this case falls within the clause of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act to the effect of precluding the pursuer from succeeding in his case unless he can prove by writ that certain representations were made. I do not think that this case falls under the statute. The pursuer alleges a fraudulent scheme by means of which these three bills were obtained on representations of the agent for the purposes of the bank. These representations by the agent were made by him within the scope of his employment, and therefore in my opinion this is a proper case for inquiry and proof.

Lord Young.—I agree, and I think that as the case is to be tried either

[1] Swift v. Dewsbury, Feb. 2, 1874, L. R. 9 Q. B. 301.

[2] Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, May 18, 1867, L. R. 2 Ex. 259; Mackay v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick, Feb. 1874, L. R. 5 P. C. Ap. 394, per Sir Montague Smith, p. 416.

[3] Little v. Smith, Dec. 9, 1845, 8 D. 265, 18 Scot. Jur. 123.

[4] Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 and 46 Vict. ch. 61, sec. 100.

[5] Haslock v. Ferguson, May 30, 1837, 7 Ad. and El. 86.

[6] Barwick, supra; Swift, supra; Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, March 12, 1880, L. R. 5 Ap. Cases.

No. 11.

Oct. 23, 1895.

Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

by proof or before a jury, perhaps the less that is said at this advising the better. However we must decide, and assign our reasons for deciding, upon the application of the statute in question—the application of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, section 6, on which the Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeds. I am, with your Lordship, of opinion that that clause of the Act does not apply to this case, as stated on record, or at all events, to such a case as may under the record be proved by the pursuers. If the pursuers had given credit to Douglas, Reid, & Company, and were suing the bank as having guaranteed the payment of Douglas, Reid, & Company's debt to them, inasmuch as the bank or their agent had represented that Douglas, Reid, & Company were in good circumstances, I think that would have been a case for the application of the Act. The case is not of that kind. Indeed, Douglas, Reid, & Company are not here, and on the face of any documents we have before us, Douglas, Reid, & Company never received any credit from the pursuers. We can decide nothing upon the face of the documents before us except that the pursuers accepted certain bills drawn upon them by Douglas, Reid, & Company. On the face of the bills they are debtors to Douglas, Reid, & Company, and to the holders of the bills, and they were dealt with by the holders of the bills, viz., the Clydesdale Bank, as debtors on these bills, Douglas, Reid, & Company having transferred them to the bank. Well, as such debtors on the bills to Douglas, Reid, & Company, or Douglas, Reid, & Company's indorsees, viz., the bank, they paid under protest, the ground of their protest being that the bills had been obtained from them by fraud, and that by the bank, of course not by the body of shareholders at a meeting, or even by the body of directors, but by a man acting as agent for the bank in the transaction of their business and in the particular business of procuring these bills. The fraudulent representation alleged amounts in substance to this—that the bank, through their agent, having Douglas, Reid, & Company as their debtors, upon an account for, say £10,000, wished to get that reduced, and accordingly set about getting acceptances of bills drawn by their debtors, to be applied in reducing the debt, on the false and fraudulent representation that these bills were not to be so applied, but that the proceeds were to be given to Douglas, Reid, & Company to enable them to carry on business, and that they induced the pursuers to accept the bills in question. If these statements are true, it was a knavish piece of work on the part of Scott. And for whose benefit was it? According to the statements of the pursuers, it was for the benefit of the bank. It was to get the pursuers' documents of debt, their money obligation in the shape of bills for £4000, on which the bank could sue and recover the money. That was the end and object for which the fraud was perpetrated. I do not say it was,—far from it,—but that is what is alleged. I am of opinion that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act is not applicable to prevent the case going to trial on the averments of fraud, and that the case must go to trial, and I rather incline to think—but I leave it to the parties themselves to arrange it—that it would be more fitting to bring this question of fraudulent representation—because that is the character of it—before a jury for their judgment.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. I agree with Lord Young that as there is to be some investigation into the facts of this case, it is desirable we should not pronounce any judgment upon any point which it is not necessary to decide before the investigation. One point, however, I think must be now decided, namely, whether this case falls within the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, for, if it does, then the pursuer's action is altogether excluded, it being certain that the representations founded on are not in writing. On that matter I agree with your Lordships in thinking that this case does not fall within the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The case averred (which at present must be taken to be true) is this, not that Scott made representations as to Reid to Paton, in order that Paton might give Reid credit or money, but that Scott made statements—false and fraudulent statements—to Paton in order that the bank might get from Paton payment of part of the debt which Reid owed to the bank. I entertain no doubt that what Scott is said to have done was done by him in the course of his service, and in that sense within the scope of his authority, and for which, consequently, the bank is answerable. It is not to be lost sight of in connection with this point that the bank are retaining the benefit which (according to averment) they obtained through their agent's fraud.

No. 11.

Oct. 23, 1895. Paton v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and appointed the pursuers to lodge issues.

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1895. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Beatson.

THE LORD PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF EDINBURGH, Petitioners (Appellants).—Comrie Thomson—Boyd.
WILLIAM BEATSON AND ANOTHER, Respondents.

Burgh—Administration of justice—Dean of Guild—Right to refuse petition ex proprio motu—Ultra vires.—The Corporation of Edinburgh presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court of Leith for warrant to erect a hospital within the burgh of Leith. The petition was served upon the Leith Local Authority, who entered appearance, but stated no objections. The Dean of Guild refused the petition in hoc statu on the ground that the petitioners had no right to erect a hospital within the burgh of Leith without the consent of the Local Authority.

In an appeal held that the Dean of Guild was not entitled to give effect to the objection ex proprio motu.

1st DIVISION. Dean of Guild Court, Leith.

THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF EDINBURGH having resolved to erect hospital buildings on the lands of Quarryholes, within the burgh of Leith, which they alleged belonged to them, presented an application for a warrant to the Leith Dean of Guild Court.

The petition was served upon William Beatson, burgh surveyor, Leith, for the public interest. Mr Beatson accepted service, and lodged a report with the Dean of Guild Court in which he made observations on the plans which had been lodged with the petition, and with regard to the treatment of the hospital sewage, but stated no objection to the warrant being granted.

At the calling of the case on 19th August 1895, no appearance being made for the respondent, the Provost of the burgh of Leith,

No. 12.

Oct. 29, 1895.
Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Beatson.

who sat as preses of the Dean of Guild Court, stated that the consent of the Magistrates and Town-Council of Leith, who were the Local Authority of the burgh, had not been obtained. The Court thereupon refused the petition *in hoc statu.

The petitioners appealed. No appearance was made for the burgh of Leith.

Argued for the appellants;—The interlocutor was incompetent. It had been pronounced on a ground which was never discussed, and in favour of a local authority who were not parties to the case. This question was raised by the Provost ex proprio motu. Leith was foreclosed on the point, because the Local Authority had failed to lodge answers on the service of the petition. If not, then there was a question for discussion between the two corporations before the Dean of Guild Court, and at least an opportunity should have been given for arguing it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is quite clear, in my opinion, that this interlocutor cannot stand. It is a purely Dean of Guild application presented to the Dean of Guild Court, and what the Court have done is to conjure up objections which were not before them. The Dean of Guild Court have imagined that the Local Authority of Leith were having their rights invaded, although that Local Authority had not come forward to state any such objection. Accordingly, it seems to me that whatever may be the rights of the Local Authority of Leith, this interlocutor is unsupported by anything before the Court, and must be put out of the way.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor, and remitted the case to the Dean of Guild Court to proceed.

WILLIAM ASHER, S.S.C., Agent.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895.
Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

WILLIAM JAMES DAVIDSON AND OTHERS (James Davidson's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Shaw—Dickson—Burnet.
THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Balfour—D. Dundas.

Railway—Compulsory powers—Mines and Minerals—Misappropriation of freestone—Reparation—Measure of damages.—A railway company having wrongously excavated certain freestone reserved to their superiors, held that the superiors were entitled to recover from the company the market value of the freestone used or removed by them, less the cost of working, although it appeared that the superiors could not themselves have worked or let the freestone to a profit.

* "NOTE.—With the time which has been allowed the Court of examining the relative statutes since the petition came before them for the first time last Court day (5th August current), the Court have become satisfied that, under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, especially section 39 of the Act of 1867, and section 1 of the Amending Act of 1890, the petitioners have no right to erect and administer an hospital of this kind within the bounds of the burgh of Leith—at all events without the approval or consent of the Town-Council of Leith, who are the Local Authority for the burgh of Leith, and of the Local Government Board, which have not been obtained.

"Therefore, to obviate procedure by parties, which might all be rendered abortive by the above considerations, the Court have thought it better to refuse the prayer of the petition in hoc statu."

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., Feb. 13, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 1, distinguished.

Superior and Vassal—Feuar's right to freestone for building on feu—Whether railway bridges and other works within right.—A feu-charter, which reserved the freestone to the superior, gave power to the feuar, notwithstanding the reservation, to dig or work the freestone for erecting "houses and offices, or walls or other buildings" upon the feu, or for making or repairing the roads thereon. A railway company having taken over the feu by compulsory purchase, held that it was within the powers of the feuar to dig freestone for the construction of bridges and other railway works on the feu.

2D DIVISION. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

(SEQUEL of case reported 21 R. 1060.)

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) having proceeded in terms of the interlocutor of the Second Division of 19th July 1894, it appeared from a proof that a large quantity of freestone below the authorised formation level of the railway had been taken by the defenders from the ground of which the pursuers were superiors, with a reserved right in the minerals, including freestone. It appeared further that the defenders had used a portion of the freestone so taken for building bridges and other railway works on the feu and on other portions of their line, while a portion had been sold. The proof shewed that it was very unlikely that the freestone could ever have been worked to advantage by the pursuers. Questions arose as to the principle of valuation to be adopted in fixing the amount due to the pursuers for the freestone taken, and as to whether the freestone used for railway purposes fell within the right of the defenders as derived from the feu-charter.*

The Lord Ordinary, on 3d July 1895, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders have excavated and removed freestone belonging to the pursuers below the authorised formation level of the railway to the value of £4657, 7s., for which sum decerns against the defenders in full of the petitory conclusions of the summons signeted 7th July 1893: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.†

---

* The feu-charter gave the vassal power, notwithstanding the reservation of minerals, to dig or work freestone "for erecting houses or offices or walls, or other buildings upon the said piece of ground, or for making or repairing the roads thereon; but he and they are hereby expressly restricted from selling any part of the said freestone, or disposing of the same to any other purpose or use whatsoever." The charter further took the feuar bound, so far as not already done, to erect a villa or lodging on the feu yielding a yearly rent at least equal to the feu-duty, and to uphold the same in good condition in all time thereafter.

† "OPINION.—What I have to do under the judgment of the Second Division is to ascertain a sum of money which will indemnify the pursuers for the wrongful act of the defenders in appropriating the pursuers' freestone, so far as lying below the authorised formation level of the railway, in a small plot of ground at Maryhill. Of the freestone in that situation, the defenders have taken a portion, and left a portion. With the portion which they have left, I am not concerned. It remains the property of the pursuers, and, although in all probability they will never be able to work it to profit, they have not succeeded in shewing that this result is due to the act of the defenders in removing the remainder. The truth I rather take to be, that, before the defenders acquired the ground, they would have found it exceedingly difficult to work any of the stone. (His Lordship then considered the evidence, coming to the conclusion that the market

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The true standard of value for the stone taken was its value to the respondents. The reclaimers were not in the position of buyers, but must indemnify the respondents for the legal wrong committed; but here they had suffered no loss, and would gain nothing by restitution, as they could never work the freestone to profit. In any event the reclaimers should not pay more than a royalty or lordship on the freestone taken,[1] or a fair price in view of the circumstances should be fixed by arbitration. All stone used for building purposes in connection with the railway, or at all events that used on the feu, was within the reclaimers' right under the charter.

Argued for the respondents;—The true standard was the value to the user,—that was the market value. Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Company[1] did not apply, because here the appropriation was wilful and in knowledge of the reserved right; in these circumstances the reclaimers could claim no equitable right to a deduction from the market value. The feuar's power to use freestone for building obviously referred to buildings for the purposes of a feuing subject, and no deduction should be made for what had been used for railway works.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—This case comes before us now upon a proof which was taken by the Lord Ordinary under a remit by us when the case was pre-value of the freestone taken was £6881, 15s., and that the cost of working was £2224, 8s., and continued):—"Now, is this sum [the cost of working] to be deducted or not? The pursuers found on some English cases relating to the unauthorised working of coal, which seem to turn on certain technical rules of the English common law, and to result in rather arbitrary distinctions between the cost of getting the coal and the cost of bringing it to bank. I gather from the opinion of Lord Macnaghten, in the case of The Peruvian Guano Company, L. R., 1892, App. Cases (pp. 173-177), that these rules might not now be applied in an English Court administering equity as well as law. But, in any case, a Scottish Court is not bound by them. I am free to consider in this particular case whether it would be equitable to deny to the defenders the expense which they have incurred in working this stone, and I am very clearly of opinion that it would not be. The defenders, no doubt, acted in rather a high-handed way, and under a mistaken view of their rights. They were trespassers, but it would be absurd to call them thieves; and it was a fortunate circumstance for the pursuers that they came to the ground, for I do not think that otherwise the pursuers would have found it easy to make any use of their stone at all. The proper result, therefore, in my opinion, is to allow the defenders no profit on the stone which they removed, but to charge them with the full value of it, less the expense of converting it to marketable use. I accordingly deduct the sum of £2224, 8s. from the sum of £6881, 15s., leaving the sum of £4657, 7s., for which I shall give decree.

---

"I would only add that the defenders' argument on the declaration in Allan's feu-contract seems to me quite untenable. The power thereby conferred on the feuar was to dig or work freestone 'for erecting houses, or offices, or walls, or other buildings upon the said piece of ground, or for making or repairing the roads therein.' That plainly contemplated the use of the ground as a residential subject, and could not possibly justify the use of the stone for building bridges and other railway works even on the ground itself, and much less in other places."

[1] Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., Feb. 13, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 1.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

viously before us; and it does not appear to me that there are many points raised on the interlocutor at present under review which require serious consideration.

The Caledonian Railway Company, who are now reclaiming, are proprietors by purchase of the piece of ground originally disponed or feued out by the superior to Mr Allan, and have, in the exercise of their undoubted rights, used the ground for erecting a railway station upon it, and putting down sidings and other accommodation works which as a railway company they require. But in laying down their rails, and in erecting their offices and other accommodation works, they have excavated the freestone which lay below the surface. It appears to me to be not open to question that the stone which they have so excavated was the property of the superiors, because when the superiors feued off this ground to Mr Allan they distinctly reserved to themselves the whole freestone and other minerals within the ground so feued. Accordingly, the right of property in the minerals never passed out of the superiors. But they did give Mr Allan their vassal a certain limited right in the minerals which was expressed in this way:—"Declaring that notwithstanding of the above reservation,"—that is, the reservation of the freestone and minerals to the superiors themselves,—"it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said Thomas Allan and his foresaids to dig or work the freestone in the said piece of ground hereby disponed for erecting houses and offices or walls or other buildings upon the said piece of ground, or for making or repairing the roads thereon, but he and they are hereby expressly restricted from selling any part of the said freestone."

Now, the state of the title being as I have put it, and the railway company having excavated a great part of the mineral below this feu, the question arises, what is the railway company bound to pay for the mineral so excavated, if anything.

The railway company maintain, first, that they are not bound to pay anything for the freestone excavated, because it was of no value to the owners. That is an argument that I am afraid I could not listen to with very much patience. It may have been a subject of very little value at one time to the superiors. It may have been so situated and the working of it so difficult that it would be almost impossible to get a customer for it, and it might not be worth the while of the superiors to work it for themselves. But all that was changed when the railway company came there, because the railway company came not only as a customer who might buy the freestone, but who, as one sees from the proof, was glad to get it so conveniently. The company needed just this stone for their erections; they got it on the ground, where it was to be put into use in the shape of houses, and were saved the trouble and expense of bringing it from a more distant point. Therefore it is vain for the railway company to say it was of no value to the superiors. They got a customer when the railway company came there, who must pay to the superiors the market value of the subject. The market value of that subject has been ascertained on evidence there seems no reason for doubting, and the Lord Ordinary has estimated the value of the subject at the price which the proof warrants.

The second view which was presented to us by the railway company was,

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895.
Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

that if we were of opinion that the railway company were bound to pay for this stone they should at least not be called upon to pay the market value, but should only be called upon to pay what the superior might reasonably have expected to get by way of royalty or lordship if he had let the ground as some adjoining ground had been let to a quarrier to work, and in support of this view the case of Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Company[1] was cited to us. I think that case is different from this. That is a case—into the details of which I need not go, because your Lordships are familiar with them—which is distinguished from the present in this important particular, that there the pursuer of the action might have known from his own titles that the defenders were trespassing upon his property, while the defenders by their title could not have ascertained that for themselves; they worked the coals in the belief that they had been leased to them by the person who had right to the minerals, and were held in that case only liable to Mr Livingstone in such a sum as he would have got had he leased the coal on the same terms as the surrounding mineral field was leased to the Rawyards Company. Here the case is different. The title which the railway company took informed them in express terms that the minerals were reserved by the superior. Notwithstanding this we have it in evidence that the railway company, not only worked out the minerals so reserved, but in violation of the express terms of their title sold part thereof, and also used other parts for their works outwith the feu in question. They were distinctly warned that this was not their property, and that they were not to use it without keeping a distinct note of that which they were taking, and what they were doing with it, because the pursuers intended to raise the question of their liability therefor. In these circumstances I think the case of Rawyards[1] is distinguishable from this, and affords no standard by which the defenders' liability ought to be ascertained.

These two points being taken out of the way, the only thing we require to consider is the effect of the deduction which the defenders claim in respect of the minerals and freestone used upon the ground of the feu as being within the authority conferred upon Allan, and therefore upon them, to use the freestone for erections and buildings upon the feu itself. Upon that matter the reclaimers have not given us the information necessary to enable us to fix the exact amount of the deduction to which they are entitled, because, I think, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that they are entitled to a deduction from the pursuer's claim of the market value of the minerals which they used for making roads and erecting walls or buildings of any kind upon the ground in question. The Lord Ordinary in the end of his note says,—"The defenders' argument on the declaration in Allan's feu-contract seems to me quite untenable." I think, with great deference to the Lord Ordinary, that that is not a sound view, and in so far as that view has influenced the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary under review, and in so far as he has refused in that interlocutor effect to the defenders' contention, I think he is wrong. If the parties can ascertain or agree upon the amount of the deduction to be made in respect of the freestone used upon the feu itself, we may dispose of the case now. If they cannot agree,

[1] 7 R. (H. L.) 1.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

we must then consider the case further as to whether the proof before us will enable us to fix a sum, or whether the railway company should be authorised to supplement their proof to the effect of shewing what is the exact amount of deduction to which they are entitled.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not think I have anything material to add. I indicated, indeed, my view upon the leading points in the case in the course of the discussion. It seems to me to be clear, and indeed ultimately it was not disputed, that the freestone which the railway company took out of the pursuers' ground and used for their own purposes was the property of the pursuers, and the contention that they are entitled to take the property of the pursuers and use it for their own purposes without paying for it is not far from the extravagant. What they are to pay for it is of course a question depending chiefly upon what was the worth of the article—the property of another—which they took and used for their own purposes. That should not be difficult of ascertainment, and the Lord Ordinary has ascertained it to his own satisfaction. They could only lawfully and regularly get it by a contract with the pursuers whose property it was. They took it and used it without such contract, and I should think it clear enough that the test of its value is just its worth in the market. What was that property of the pursuers—brought out of the estate, and laid on the surface ready for use by the railway company, who wished to use it—worth in the market? Now, that has been ascertained, and that is what the party who took it and used it must pay. They got it, and taking into consideration, of course, the fact that they were at the expense of working it and bringing it to the surface, and making it ready for use by them in their work, what they have got to pay to the owner, without whose consent upon a legitimate bargain they were not entitled to take it or use it, is simply its market value. I agree with what has been stated by Lord Trayner, and I cannot state it more clearly, that the railway company, as the successors of Mr Allan in this feu, have all the rights which he had. They are at liberty to take and use any freestone upon the ground which they feued necessary for buildings upon the ground. Now, Mr Allan himself might not find it necessary to use any or much freestone upon the ground. I suppose he would find it necessary to use as much as he needed to erect the buildings which he undertook to build. But his successor might have no use, or a large use, for freestone, just as it happened. His successor was the Caledonian Railway Company. The Caledonian Railway Company required stone to make buildings upon the ground, and they were not restrained in the kind of buildings for which they might use the freestone on the ground. I assume therefore that the buildings which they did erect with this freestone were erected in the legitimate exercise of their right on the ground,—indeed that was not disputed. Then they are entitled to freestone to that extent free of charge. That disposes of the whole case, subject only to the parties ascertaining for themselves, which I hope they will be able to do without any further litigation, what is the worth of the freestone which was used upon the ground.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely agree in the opinions which have been expressed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1895. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co.

PARTIES having agreed that the amount of the deduction to be made in respect of the freestone used upon the feu should be £400, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the defenders have excavated and removed freestone belonging to the pursuers below the authorised formation level of the railway to the value of £4257, 7s. sterling, for which decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses from 19th July 1894 to the date of said reclaiming note, and to one-half of their expenses since that date."

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 14.

Oct. 30, 1895. Linton v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society.

MRS JANET LINTON AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Hunter.
THE CITY OF GLASGOW FRIENDLY SOCIETY, Defenders (Appellants).—W. Campbell.

Process — Appeal — Competency — Friendly Society — Dispute between member and society—Small-Debt Court—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 60), sec. 22 (d) (e).—Held that in a small-debt action relative to a dispute between a friendly society and one of its members, an appeal, on a case stated under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, was competent, although the summons did not refer to the Act.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

AN action was raised in the Small-Debt Court at Paisley by Mrs Janet Linton and others against the City of Glasgow Friendly Society, claiming the sum of £6, 18s., in respect of the death of Margaret Linton (a daughter of Mrs Janet Linton), whose life was insured with the defenders, and who had died in August 1895. The defenders denied liability. The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) decerned against the defenders, and at their request stated a case under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875.*

On the case being called in the Single Bills the pursuers objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—Small-debt decrees could only be reviewed in the manner prescribed by section 31 of the Small-Debt Act of 1837. Being a small-debt decree, it did not matter that it was connected with a friendly society dispute. Section 31 of the Small-Debt Act was not affected by the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act. Besides, the action was in the form of an ordinary

---

* The Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 60), enacts, sec. 22,—"Every dispute between a member or person claiming through a member . . . of a registered society, and the society or an official thereof shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society . . . Provided as follows:—

"(a) The parties to a dispute in a society may by consent (unless the rules of the society expressly forbid it), refer such dispute to the chief registrar. . . .

. . . . . .

"(d) Where the rules contain no directions as to disputes . . . the member or party aggrieved may apply to the County Court or to a Court of summary jurisdiction, which may hear and determine the matter in dispute.

"(e) The Court . . . may at the request of either party state a case for the opinion . . . in Scotland of either Division of the Inner-House of the Court of Session. . . ."

No. 14.
Oct. 30, 1895.
Linton v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society.

action in the Small-Debt Court, and made no reference at all to the Friendly Societies Act, so that it could not be founded on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this appeal is competent. As I read the section of the Friendly Societies Act, if the parties agree to do so, and unless the rules of the society forbid it, they may refer their dispute to the chief registrar, and failing such agreement they may bring their action in any Court of summary jurisdiction. It appears to me that the emphasis in subsection (d) is to be laid upon the word "summary." Accordingly, I think that the action was brought in the Small-Debt Court in conformity with the regulations of the Friendly Societies Act, and an appeal from it may be taken on a case stated in the manner provided by that Act.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. A special procedure has been provided in the Friendly Societies Act to regulate appeals. If the sum in question is above £25 there is no question that the parties can come here on a case stated, and I cannot see that the procedure provided by the Act is limited to cases where the sum is above that amount. There is nothing to that effect contained in the Act.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

A special procedure is provided by the Friendly Societies Act to regulate appeals. It is no answer to the appellants' claim to have the benefit of such procedure to say that under the Small-Debt Act he would have had a different right of appeal, and not that which he claims under the Friendly Societies Act. There is nothing to take this case out of the jurisdiction of the Court to which such cases have by the Act been specially assigned. The only point raised against the competency of the case stated is, that the action in the Sheriff Court was not founded upon the terms of the Friendly Societies Act, and did not set forth that it was brought in accordance with the procedure prescribed therein. But the claim, as set forth in the case, makes it clear that the question brought before the Court is a dispute between a friendly society and one of its members, for the determination of which the Act has provided a special procedure, with a limited right of appeal.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT repelled the objection, sustained the competency of the case, and appointed the case to be put to the Summar Roll.

JOHN BAIRD, Solicitor—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

JOHN CORSE SCOTT AND OTHERS (Scott's Trustees), First Parties.—Maconochie.

JOHN CORSE SCOTT AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—Rankine—Graham Stewart.

ALEXANDER CORSE SCOTT AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—D. Dundas—Clyde.

JOHN CORSE SCOTT AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Ure—Chree.

Trust—Testamentary provisions—Severing of interests of beneficiaries—Appropriation of investments to particular legacies—Incidence of loss on such investments.—A testator directed his trustees "to retain and invest in their own names £5000 in trust" for the liferent use allenarly of A B, and for the lawful issue of C D in fee. Then followed similar directions as to other sums. "Lastly, in regard to the residue" "remaining after payment of my debts," "and the legacies, provisions, and others foresaid, I direct and appoint my trustees to divide the same into sixty-two equal parts or shares, and to hold, pay, and apply, and convey and make over the same in the manner after specified, viz., to retain and invest in their own names eight parts or shares thereof for the children of C D, and to apply the income thereof for their behoof, and to pay the capital to them on attaining majority." Then followed similar directions to retain and invest, and in other cases to pay certain shares to legatees. The deed contained a declaration that the annual income of all capital sums and shares of residue directed to be retained and invested by the trustees in their own names "for the liferent use of any party shall be payable to the parties entitled to the liferent thereof half-yearly," "beginning the first term's payment thereof at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring six months after the date of investment." The trustees were authorised to retain the testator's investments.

No. 15.

Nov. 1, 1895.

Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

The trustees, with consent of A B and C D, two of the beneficiaries, executed a deed, whereby on the narrative that the capital sums to be retained and invested amounted to £31,000, and that the trustees had resolved that instead of realising the whole trust-estate and re-investing the £31,000, they should retain and set apart deposit-receipts held by the testator, they proceeded to appropriate certain deposit-receipts in this way be held by them in trust for each set of beneficiaries.

Among the deposit-receipts appropriated in this way were three deposit-receipts of a foreign bank which suspended payment, and upon which a loss accrued.

In a special case presented by the trustees and the residuary and other legatees, held that the appropriation of the deposits by the trustees to particular legacies was ultra vires, and that the loss fell upon residue.

Robinson v. Fraser's Trustee, August 3, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 127, distinguished.

Trust—Liability of trustees—Power to retain securities on which funds invested at truster's death—Deposit-receipt—Term of payment—Guarantee of indemnity.—A testator empowered his trustees to retain securities upon which his estate might be invested at his death. The trustees accordingly retained certain deposit-receipts with a foreign bank which were not yet payable, under a guarantee from two of their number to indemnify them from all loss which they or the trust-estate might incur by continuing to hold the said deposit-receipts. Before the deposit-receipts matured the bank suspended payment.

Held that neither the trustees nor the guarantors were liable to make good the loss sustained by the bank suspending payment, as it did not appear that the deposit-receipts could have been realised before they matured.

2D DIVISION.

BY trust-disposition and settlement, the late Major-General James Corse Scott, Edinburgh, who died on 6th March 1890, conveyed to John Corse Scott, Esq., of Sinton, his nephew; Captain Alexander James Corse Scott, also his nephew; and certain other persons, as trustees and executors, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, for certain purposes.

In the fourth purpose the truster directed his trustees to "retain and invest in their own names the sum of £5000 sterling in trust, for the liferent use allenarly of the said Captain Alexander James Corse Scott, and for the lawful issue of the body of my nephew John Scott of Sinton, in fee, equally, share and share alike." [Here followed similar directions as to other sums to be held for behoof of other persons in liferent and children in fee.] "(Lastly), In regard to the residue" . . . "remaining after payment of my debts, deathbed and funeral expenses, and the legacies, provisions, and others foresaid, I direct and appoint my trustees to divide the same into sixty-two equal parts or shares, and to hold, pay, and apply, and convey and make over the same in the manner after specified, viz., to retain and invest in their own names eight parts or shares thereof for the children of . . . and apply the income thereof for their behoof and maintenance in manner after mentioned, and to pay, convey, and make over the capital of said eight parts or shares to the children of said marriage, equally at majority." [Here followed directions as to the disposal of the other shares of residue,—in some cases to retain and invest in their own names for behoof of liferenters and fiars, and in other cases to pay the share to the legatee.]

No. 15.

Nov. 1, 1895. Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

It was provided that the fee of none of "the capital sums or shares of residue" should vest in any of the beneficiaries until they attained, if males, twenty-one years of age, and if females, twenty-one years or were married, but that the trustees should have power to pay any part or the whole of the annual income accruing upon the presumptive share or shares of any such capital sums or shares of residue, or one-third of the capital sums or shares of residue.

The truster authorised the trustees "to retain the securities in and upon which the funds forming the said trust-estate are and shall be invested at the time of my decease, and to lend out and invest all or any part of my said estate in" certain securities.

The estate consisted, inter alia, of securities to the value of about £100,000, including about £33,000 of deposits for fixed periods in various colonial and foreign banks, whereof a sum of £9000 was deposited in three deposit-receipts for £4000, £3000, and £2000, with the English Bank of the River Plate, Limited, maturing, the first on 15th February 1893, and the last two on 11th June 1893.

In February 1891 the trustees, with consent of John Scott, now John Corse Scott, for himself and his children, and Captain Alexander James Corse Scott, for himself and his brother Edward, executed a deed whereby on the narrative that the capital sums directed to be retained and invested amounted to £31,000, and that the trustees had resolved on 24th June 1890 that instead of realising the whole trust-estate and re-investing the £31,000, they should retain and set apart deposit-receipts held by the testator, they accordingly proceeded to appropriate, as at 24th June 1890, certain deposits in this way to be held by them in trust for each set of beneficiaries.

The deed contained the following clause of indemnity:—"And I, the said John Scott, now John Corse Scott, as an individual, do hereby bind and oblige myself . . . to warrant, free, and relieve, and harmless and skaithless keep, the trustees and executors of the said Major-General James Corse Scott . . . from all loss, skaith, interest, damages, and expenses that they, or any of them, or the trust-estate of the said Major-General James Corse Scott may sustain, or incur, or be put to in any manner of way, by continuing to hold and retain the foresaid deposit-receipts, in terms of this present declaration of trust and deed of apportionment, or of having set apart and apportioned the same for the purpose of meeting the provisions and other legacies above particularly set forth and referred to." A similar guarantee was granted by Captain Alexander James Corse Scott.

At the date of the said meeting of trustees on 24th June 1890

No. 15.

Nov. 1, 1895. Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

and of the said declaration of trust, the English Bank of the River Plate was in good repute.

In the month of July 1891, the English Bank of the River Plate, Limited, suspended payment, and a winding-up order was pronounced on 1st August 1891. None of the deposits made by the truster in said bank had matured when it suspended payment. It was estimated that the loss on the deposits held by the trustees in the said bank would amount to about 25 per cent on the amount of the deposits,—that is, to about £2000.

In these circumstances a special case was presented to the Court by (1) General Scott's trustees; (2) Mr John Corse Scott of Sinton and Captain Scott, as individuals; (3) Captain Scott and the children of Mr John Corse Scott; and (4) the residuary legatees.

The trustees, first parties, contended that they were entitled to retain the deposits in question until maturity; that they were entitled to set apart the deposits in order to meet particular legacies; and that that having been done the legacies became liable to the commoda and incommoda of their respective trusts. Further, they contended that, assuming the arrangement embodied in the declaration of trust to be ultra vires of the trustees, they were entitled to meet out of residue any deficiency arising in the deposit-receipts; and lastly, that in any event, Mr Scott of Sinton and Captain Scott, as individuals, were liable to relieve the trustees, under the indemnity clauses above set forth, of any loss that they or the trust-estate might sustain owing to the retention of the deposits.

The second parties maintained the same contentions as the trustees, except that, in lieu of the last, they maintained that they were only liable under the indemnity clauses in the event of the retention of the deposit-receipts being ultra vires of the trustees, and the trustees being personally liable therefor.

The third parties contended that the trustees were not entitled under the settlement to retain the deposits longer than was necessary for realisation, and that they were consequently personally liable for the loss; that at all events they had no power to appropriate them in satisfaction of particular legacies, but should have held them as part of the general estate, and that the third parties were therefore entitled to have the depreciation made good out of residue; and lastly, that, even if the trustees had not acted ultra vires, the third parties were entitled to relief from Mr Scott of Sinton and Captain Scott under the clauses of indemnity.

The fourth parties contended that the trustees were entitled to appropriate particular investments to particular legacies, and that therefore the appropriation having been effectually made the particular legatees must bear the loss. Alternatively, they contended that, if the trustees had acted ultra vires, they or the second parties were bound to make good to the fourth parties any loss sustained by them owing to the retention of the deposit-receipts.

The legal questions submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court were as follows:—"(1) Are the beneficiaries interested as life-renters or as fiars respectively in the provisions and legacies specified in the declaration of trust and affected by the loss on the said deposits in the said English Bank of the River Plate, or either and which of them, entitled to relief from such loss against (a) the residue of the trust-estate; (b) the trustees of Major-General James Corse Scott, as individuals; (c) Mr John Corse Scott of Sinton and Captain A. J.

No. 15.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

Corse Scott, or either of them, under the clauses of indemnity in the declaration of trust, to the extent undertaken by these parties respectively? (2) In the event of head (a) of question 1 being answered in the affirmative, are the trustees bound to relieve the fourth parties of the loss thus occasioned them, or are the trustees or the fourth parties entitled to recover from Mr John Corse Scott and Captain Scott, under the clauses of indemnity in the declaration of trust, and to the extent undertaken by these parties respectively, the amount by which the residue is diminished by the payment of such claims? (3) In the event of head (b) of question 1 or of the first alternative of question 2 being answered in the affirmative, are the trustees entitled, under the said clauses of indemnity, to be relieved from such claim by Mr John Corse Scott and Captain Scott, to the extent undertaken by these parties respectively?"

Argued for the first parties;—The trustees were not liable for the loss to the trust-estate. They were expressly authorised to retain investments existing at the time of the testator's death, and the deposit-receipts had not matured, and the money could not have been uplifted before the failure of the bank.[1] It was true that they had no express power to set apart and appropriate any portion of the funds to particular legacies, but that power would be held to be implied when, as here, it was the natural and proper method of administering the trust.[2] In any event, if the trustees were liable, they were entitled to relief under the clauses of indemnity.

The second parties adopted the main argument of the first parties, and further argued;—The guarantors were not liable to make good the loss sustained by the trust-estate, for the guarantee only applied if the trustees suffered loss, and they could only suffer loss if they were personally liable. But they were only personally liable if they had acted ultra vires, which they had not done if their argument was sound.

Argued for the third parties;—(1) The trustees were no doubt entitled to retain the deposit-receipts, but only subject to the condition that they used their discretion from time to time as to the expediency of retaining them.[3] By the declaration of trust the trustees put it out of their own power to do this, for they had put the deposit-receipts under a trust to retain them. (2) The trustees had no power to apportion the deposit-receipts to special legacies. The trust-disposition said "retain and invest"; the declaration of trust said "set apart and apportion." In both these respects therefore the trustees had acted ultra vires, and were personally liable to make good the loss to the estate. (3) Alternatively, on the assumption that the trustees had acted within their powers, the loss must be made good out of residue.[4]

Argued for the fourth parties;—The case was ruled by Robinson's.[2] Specific appropriation was here clearly to be implied, because the trust-deed provided that the annual income of shares of residue directed to be retained and invested by the trustees for the [1] Ritchie v. Ritchie's Trustees, July 20, 1888, 15 R. 1086 (per Lord M'Laren, Ordinary, at pp. 1089, 1090); Thomson's Trustees v. Henderson, Oct. 25, 1890, 18 R. 24.

[2] Robinson v. Fraser's Trustees, Aug. 3, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 127 (per Lord Chancellor, p. 129, per Lord Watson, p. 138).

[3] Thomson's Trustees v. Henderson, ut supra.

[4] Gray v. Gray, June 4, 1835, 13 S. 866.

liferent use of any party should only commence to run from and after the date of such investment. Without payment or specific appropriation of investments to meet legacies, it was impossible to ascertain the amount of residue, or to invest shares of it. If, therefore, the trustees could not appropriate investments towards such legacies the provision as to payment of interest to persons liferenting shares of residue could not be carried out. Certain of the shares of residue fell to be paid at once, but this could not be done without specific appropriation. The House of Lords gave great weight to the direction to pay residue in Robinson's case. Assuming, then, that the securities had been properly appropriated to certain legacies, the parties on whose behalf the securities were held must bear the risk of these securities fluctuating, on the principle "cujus est commodum ejus quoque debet esse incommodum."[1] Alternatively, either the trustees or the guarantors were liable.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The questions put to us for determination in this case arise out of the administration of the trust-estate of the late General Scott, and have reference more particularly to a loss which the trust-estate has sustained in the course of administration. What we are asked to determine is, by whom that loss is to be borne.

It is unnecessary to go into any detail of the circumstances under which that question has arisen, as these are fully given in the cases before us. It is sufficient for the purposes of my opinion to recall one or two points which have to be kept in view. (First) General Scott died in March 1890. Part of his estate, amounting to £9000, had been deposited by him with the English Bank of the River Plate, on deposit-receipts for fixed periods. These receipts did not mature until February and June 1893. (Second) In June 1890, the trustees resolved to realise the trust-estate so far as was required to meet the legacies bequeathed by General Scott, and which fell to be immediately paid, and to set apart and appropriate certain of the fixed deposits to meet legacies not immediately payable, but which the trustees were, by General Scott's settlement, directed in the meantime to hold. Under this resolution, the deposit-receipts I have already mentioned for £9000 were, inter alia, "set apart and apportioned in implement" of certain legacies of the second class, that is, of legacies which the trustees were in the meantime to hold. (Third) Two of the trustees—both being beneficiaries under the settlement—guaranteed the trustees and the trust-estate against all loss arising from the retention and appropriation of those deposit-receipts in the manner just described. It does not appear that any other of the beneficiaries was either consulted as to such appropriation, or agreed thereto. (Fourth) In July 1891 the English Bank of the River Plate suspended payment, and went into liquidation. Out of this failure the loss in question arose.

It appears to me that the first matter to be considered is, whether the trustees were entitled to set apart and appropriate the deposit-receipts in question as they did. In my opinion they were not. In the first place, such an act was not directed or authorised by the settlement of General Scott, and it was an act the performance of which no beneficiary had a right to claim. The direction of the truster was that the trustees should hold the estate, so far as not immediately payable, as a whole, out of which they were to pay certain benefits to certain parties. They were nowhere authorised or directed to set apart or appropriate any part of the estate for the benefit of any beneficiary. And so long as the beneficiaries received respectively the payments directed to be made to them out of the trust funds they could claim nothing more. I do not mean to indicate by what I have said any opinion to the effect that trustees may not, in many cases, in the fair administration of trust affairs set apart a particular security or fund to meet some particular or special claim by a beneficiary, without express directions to that effect in the trust-deed under which they act. The case of Robinson[1] cited in the debate is an instance to the contrary. In that case appropriation of special funds to meet certain legacies was sustained, although such appropriation had not been directed to be made by the trust-deed. That such a course was intended by the truster in that case might very reasonably be inferred, because such appropriation was necessary to enable the residue to be divided without undue delay, which was the truster's object and, indeed, direction. Except as regards the two special legacies provided for by appropriation there was no need for continuing the trust. Here, however, having regard both to the manner in which the fee of the special legacies (in reference to which the appropriation of the deposit-receipts was made) was destined, and also the necessarily remote period at which the residue could be divided, there was no ground for inferring that the truster ever contemplated such an appropriation of trust securities as here took place. There being nothing, therefore, in the trust-deed authorising the appropriation, and nothing from which such authority could be inferred, and there being nothing to warrant a claim by any beneficiary to have such an appropriation made, I come to the opinion that what the trustees did in that matter was ultra vires. In the second place, although the trustees made the appropriation at the request of two of their number (being also beneficiaries), a request which in some circumstances they might lawfully have complied with, yet here they were not entitled to do so, because such compliance did or might result in unduly favouring (as the Lord Chancellor observed in Robinson's[1] case) one "set of legatees at the expense of the other." This is plain enough. Take the case of the fourth provision of the trust-deed by way of illustration. All that the beneficiaries were entitled to under that provision was a liferent and fee respectively of £5000. Now, the securities here set apart could not increase in value, while their value might diminish. But securities might have been set apart to meet these claims which might become of greater value than £5000, in which case if the appropriation were sustained, these beneficiaries would get more than the truster bequeathed to them, and the residuary legatees would get just so much less than was intended for and bequeathed to them. In like manner, if the securities set apart and appropriated diminished in value, the special beneficiaries would get less than the truster bequeathed to them, and the residuary legatees would get what otherwise would have been taken from the residue to make up the amount of the special legacy—that

[1] Teacher's Trustees v. Teachers, Jan. 10, 1890, 17 R. 303 (per Lord Shand at pp. 313, 314).

No. 15.

Nov. 1, 1895. Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

[1] 8 R. (H. L.) 127.

No. 15.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

is, would get more than was intended for them. Accordingly I am of opinion that the appropriation of the deposit-receipts in question was ultra vires of the trustees, and that the remaining questions in the case must be considered and determined on that footing.

Are the trustees personally responsible for the loss in question, is the next matter for consideration. This question I also answer in the negative. By the terms of the truster's settlement the trustees were authorised "to retain the securities in and upon which the funds forming the said trust-estate are and shall be invested at the time of" the truster's decease. Such an authority would perhaps not absolve the trustees from the duty (as was said in the case of Thomson's Trustees[1]) "to look closely after these investments, and to make sure for themselves that they are reasonably safe." In the case of stocks in railways, shares in public companies, and the like, the trustees may be expected to retain such securities only so long as they, in the interest of the trust-estate, reasonably may. Such stocks and shares are saleable, and may be sold on the market at any time when the trustees think it right to do so. But the securities in question were deposit-receipts for money deposited for fixed periods, and I do not know that such securities can be realised in the market like stocks and shares. It is not said in the case before us that they could, and I never heard of such a thing being done—I assume, in the absence of any statement to the contrary, that the deposit-receipts in question were not realisable until they matured, and as this did not happen till some considerable time after the bank granting the deposit-receipts had suspended payment, it follows that the trustees could adopt no other course than retain the receipts, and that such retention was in no sense culpable. If they were not to blame in retaining the receipts, they cannot be held liable for the loss which was sustained, a loss which, in the view I have expressed, they could not have avoided by any diligence on their part.

I come now to consider whether, as the trustees are not personally liable for the loss sustained, the two trustees at whose request the appropriation of the special securities was made are liable for it. This depends to a large extent on the terms of the guarantee which they gave. Their obligation is thus expressed:—They undertake "to warrant, free, and relieve, and harmless and skaithless keep," the trustees and their successors, "of and from all loss, skaith, interest, damages, and expenses that they or any of them or the trust-estate . . . may sustain, or incur or be put to in any manner of way by continuing to hold and retain the foresaid deposit-receipts . . . or of having set apart and apportioned the same for the purpose of meeting the provisions and other legacies above particularly set forth and referred to." It was argued for the second parties to this case—the guarantors—that this obligation only covered loss for which the trustees might be held personally responsible, and something no doubt may be said in support of that view. I, however, incline to the opinion that the obligation or guarantee was not of that limited character, and assume now that it covered any loss sustained by the trust-estate, although not such as the trustees would be bound personally to make good—which arose from the appropria-

[1] 18 R. 24.

No. 15.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

tion or retention of the deposit-receipts. Even in that view of the guarantee, I am of opinion that the second parties are not liable to make good or relieve the trust-estate of the loss in question, and that for the reason that the loss has not been occasioned by either of the causes, the consequences of which the trustees were guaranteed against. The guarantee was directed against loss sustained or incurred either through the appropriation of the receipts or their retention. Now, it is obvious that no loss has been sustained or incurred through the mere appropriation of the deposit-receipts. They are still in the hands of the trustees, who never transferred them in any way, and their appropriation may be in future disregarded by them. The loss, on the other hand, cannot have arisen from the retention of the deposit-receipts, because, as I have pointed out, the trustees could do nothing but retain them until they matured. Before they matured, however, the bank granting the deposit-receipts failed, and the loss was thus incurred. The appropriation and retention of the receipts in no way occasioned or contributed to the loss.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the loss must fall on and be borne by the residue of the estate, and would propose to answer the questions put to us accordingly.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is the opinion of the Court.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find and declare, in answer to the first question, that the beneficiaries interested as liferenters and fiars respectively in the provisions and legacies there referred to, and affected by the loss on the deposits in the English Bank of the River Plate, are entitled to relief from such loss against the residue of the trust-estate; and in answer to the second question therein stated, that neither the trustees nor the parties of the second part are bound to relieve the fourth parties of the said loss."

M'NEILL & SYME, W.S.—R. C. BELL & J. SCOTT, W.S.—J. A. PATULLO, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 16.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

MRS CHRISTINA SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—W. Campbell.

LOUIS SOEDER, Defender (Reclaimer).—Lees—A. S. D. Thomson.

Sale of heritage—Urban tenement—Objection to title—Restrictions—Failure of seller to disclose restrictions.—A seller, who acted through an agent, exchanged missives of sale of an urban property with a purchaser who had not the advice of an agent. After the completion of the sale the purchaser sent the titles to his agent, who informed him that the property was subject to restrictions whereby dwelling-houses only could be built on the site, windows in the back wall of the upper storey were forbidden, and a passage must be left for access to premises at the back. The purchaser then intimated to the seller that he renounced the sale. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Moncreiff) that as the restrictions were not disclosed to the purchaser at the time of the sale, he was entitled, when they came to his knowledge, to renounce.

Sale—Sale by owner of burdened house—Right of bondholder to enforce sale.—Opinion (per Lord Young) that a bondholder cannot enforce implement of a sale made by the owner of the burdened subjects.

No. 16.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.

THIS action for implement of a contract of sale of a house was raised in the following circumstances:—

Mrs Christina Smith was owner of a house of one storey and attics, Nos. 5 and 6 Hope Street, Leith, over which she had granted a bond for £170 in favour of the Standard Investment Company. The titles of the property contained the following conditions:—"That the said piece of ground above disponed is feued for the erection of a dwelling-house and for no other purpose whatever, . . . and the said George Smith and his foresaids shall be bound to leave a passage of 3 feet 4 inches in breadth on the north-east portion of the said piece of ground hereby disponed unbuilt upon, and shall also be obliged to make and keep in proper repair a door in the north-east corner, in room and place of the present [door] in the wall, with right and privilege to the said George Smith and his foresaids of free ish and entry to the back of the said dwelling-house built by him on said piece of ground by said passage and doorway, . . . and further, the said George Smith and his foresaids . . . shall not be allowed to have windows in the back wall of the upper storey of said dwelling-house, but only be allowed to use flat lights on the roof at the back thereof."

The Standard Investment Company called up the bond, and instructed their agents, Messrs Duncan Smith & M'Laren, S.S.C., to advertise the property for sale. Louis Soeder, an artist in Edinburgh, applied to Mrs Smith and her agent in reference to the advertisement, and was referred by them to Messrs Duncan Smith & M'Laren, as Mrs Smith had no longer any interest in the property. On 26th January 1894 Soeder handed to Messrs Duncan Smith & M'Laren the following offer:—"I hereby offer to purchase at the price of £170 the two-storeyed cottage, Nos. 5 and 6 Hope Street, North Leith, and the grates and gasfittings therein, so far as belonging to the proprietor. Entry to be at the term of Whitsunday 1894, when the price will be payable, and the existing searches not to be continued by your clients. Any casualties of superiority now due to be paid by me. This offer to be binding upon me until Tuesday first, at twelve o'clock noon." On 27th January Messrs Duncan Smith & M'Laren replied as follows:—"As authorised by Mrs Smith, the proprietrix of the property, Nos. 5 and 6 Hope Street, North Leith, we now hereby accept your offer, dated 26th inst., of £170 for this property, of which offer copy is hereto annexed."

After exchange of these missives, the titles of the property were sent, on Soeder's instructions, to Mr Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., who upon 27th February returned them to Messrs Duncan Smith & M'Laren, and stated that his client renounced the sale owing to the restrictions which were found in the titles.

The Standard Investment Company, under an agreement with Mrs Smith, raised this action in her name against Soeder for implement of the sale, and alternatively for damages.

After the summons had been served, the defender called upon the pursuer and offered her £5, provided she would withdraw the summons and renounce any claims she might have upon him. The pursuer accepted the sum, and wrote upon the service copy of the summons and delivered to the defender this receipt,—"6 Hope Street, North Leith,—Received to-day from Mr Louis Soeder the sum of £5 in full of all claims. June 5th 1894. CHRISTINA SMITH."

This receipt was communicated to Messrs Duncan Smith &

No. 16.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

M'Laren, who wrote in reply to Mr Brown refusing to recognise the pursuer's right to discharge the summons without the consent of the Standard Investment Company, and declaring that the receipt had been impetrated from the pursuer under false pretences. The defender took this letter to the pursuer, who wrote at the foot of the letter, —"All claims made against Mr Soeder under the summons referred to herein are given up by me and withdrawn. 6 Hope Street, North Leith. CHRISTINA SMITH. June 26th 1894"; and simultaneously therewith she added to the receipt formerly granted the words "made herein."

The Standard Investment Company proceeded with the action, and the defender pleaded;—(1) In respect of the receipt and discharge above referred to the action is barred, and the said documents are valid and must be given effect to unless reduced. (3) The pursuer being bound and having failed to disclose the restrictions in the titles and the other matters above referred to affecting the subjects, et separatim, the defender having made the offer foresaid under essential error in essentialibus, there is no contract which he can be called upon to implement, and he should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 21st December 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before answer allows the parties a proof of their averments as to the circumstances in which the receipt referred to in the defender's statement of facts and pursuer's answers thereto was granted, the pursuer to lead in the proof."

After a proof, which established the facts above narrated, the Lord Ordinary, on 15th March 1895, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defender, and appoints the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure." *

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The defender pleads that the action is barred by certain receipts or discharges granted to him by Mrs Smith. . . . . When the case was in the Procedure Roll I had considerable hesitation in sending it to proof in regard to the validity of these receipts, because it seemed almost incredible that a sane person of mature years could have granted two such documents without understanding what she was doing. But I must say that having seen and heard Mrs Smith in the witness-box the matter does not in the very least surprise me, because I do not think I ever saw such stupendous confusion of mind. I am quite satisfied that the pursuer is incapable of understanding or transacting business of the very simplest kind. I doubt whether she was capable of understanding what a summons meant, or of understanding any legal expressions, or what articles of roup meant. Her appearance of stupidity and confusion was such that at first I was under the impression that she was acting, but at last I came to the conclusion that it was beyond her powers as an actor to feign such obtuseness. On the other hand the defender, though a foreigner, understands and speaks English excellently, and he appears to be a very clever and a very shrewd man. I do not desire to say anything unnecessarily harsh about the defender. Up to a certain point he was very frank, and my impression is that he was not quite aware of the impropriety of his proceedings. He evidently thought that he had done a smart thing. He was dissatisfied with the bargain he had made, and was desirous of getting rid of it. He knew perfectly well that Mrs Smith had no interest whatever in the subject-matter of this summons. She knew, or had been told often enough; but he certainly knew that she had no interest in it. But then he also knew—he was sharp enough to see—that this action had been raised not in the name of the Standard Property Investment Company, who were the true owners of the property, and had the only interest in it,

No. 16.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

On 20th June 1895, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor: —"Decerns and ordains the defender to implement and fulfil in all respects his part of the missives of sale libelled, in terms of the first alternative conclusion of the summons, under certification." *

but in the name of Mrs Smith; and it occurred to him that if he could get a discharge from Mrs Smith of the claims made in the summons that would protect him perhaps altogether, or at all events for a time, from any claims made by the Standard Property Investment Company. . . . He is quite open about it. He says, for instance, in the examination at the end of his evidence,—'I had no definite object except to free myself from the summons, and of course I knew that by freeing myself from the summons that would, as far as that summons was concerned, free me from the claim. I noticed that Mrs Smith was the only person mentioned in the summons. I did not trouble myself at the time with what the effect of what I was doing would be on the Standard Company. I thought I had been badly used. The words "all claims" in the passage referred to referred to the claims in the summons.' Now Mr Soeder knew, or should have known, that Mrs Smith had no claims under the summons at all, and yet he obtained a discharge from her of all claims in the summons, she having none, in respect of a payment of £5. Now, if his story is true, . . . he by that payment simply bribed Mrs Smith to give him a discharge which she had no right to give or he to take. She had had no trouble in connection with the sale or with the roup-roll. The only trouble she had had was in connection with the premises to be let to her.

"That is the history of the transaction. Having been served with the summons Mr Soeder, without communicating with Mrs Smith's agents, and without even telling his own agent, went direct to Mrs Smith and obtained the discharge, and the question is whether this woman understood what she was about. I do not think she did. She had certainly no right to grant a discharge, and Mr Soeder had no right to take it from her. I repeat that I do not wish to say anything unnecessarily harsh about Mr Soeder. His very openness enables me to hold that these two documents obtained by him from Mrs Smith cannot bar the present action."

* "OPINION.—It may be assumed in favour of the defender that the purchaser of a heritable subject will be entitled to resile from his bargain if the seller seeks to impose, or the titles contain, conditions and restrictions of an unusual character of which the purchaser was ignorant, and which he was not bound to have contemplated. In such a case it may be that a seller is bound to draw the purchaser's attention to conditions of that kind, and if he does not do so, and the purchaser has not had an opportunity of examining the titles for himself, he may be entitled to resile. I do not know that the cases founded on by the defender exactly establish that proposition, because both in the case of Robertson v. Rutherford, 4 D. 121, and White v. Lee, 6 R. 699, the seller was unable to give a good title to the whole of the subjects sold. But undoubtedly the former judgment proceeded to a great extent upon the purchaser's ignorance of the restrictions, some of which were of a very unusual and serious character.

"In the present case, however, I do not think that the restrictions to which the defender objects are so unusual in the case of an urban subject as to entitle the defender, who admittedly has had an opportunity of examining the subjects, and who must have seen, from the structure of the building and the way in which the ground was laid out, evidence of the existence of some at least of the restrictions, to resile from his bargain.

"What the defender purchased was a two-storeyed cottage as it stood. Now, the three conditions to which the defender objects are these: Under the feu-contract nothing but dwelling-houses are to be erected on the ground. That is not an unusual condition; but if it is the case that it has been departed from in the case of other houses in the neighbourhood, the

No. 14.

[illegible] v. [illegible]

The defender [illegible] and signed.—He had not been fairly used in the transaction. The restrictions should have been disclosed to him before the sale were completed, as he had not the advice of an agent. Apart from this the restrictions were of themselves so unusual that he was entitled to relief. The prohibition of windows in the back wall was enough to render the property practically valueless.

Argued for the pursuer—[illegible]. The defender acted at least negligently in going to the pursuer without her agents. He went at his own risk and the onus was on him to shew that the contract was fair. The Court was slow in rescinding any such transaction [illegible] agent's hands [illegible] the restrictions. These were of a usual kind. [illegible] was the most important, and it was very familiar in urban property.[1]

At advising—

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action for implement of a contract of sale with an alternative conclusion for damages. The defender has two pleas in law on which he grounds his defence to the action. The first of these is practically that the pursuer had discharged the bargain, and in support of that he founds upon two receipts which he obtained from the pursuer—one written upon the service copy of the summons in this action, and the other upon a letter. These bear on the face of them that in consideration of the payment of £5, the pursuer discharges all claims made by her against the defender in the summons.

The other ground of defence is that the subjects sold were by the titles under restrictions of which the defender was ignorant at the time of the sale, and that these restrictions were of such a kind that he was entitled to be relieved of his bargain.

It was contended by the pursuer that these receipts ought not to have effect, because the pursuer did not know what she was doing at the time she granted them, or at least was under essential error as to their meaning defender should have no difficulty in getting the superior's leave to depart from it. He next objects that the feuar is bound to leave a passage of 3 feet 4 inches to afford a means of access to reserved premises at the back. That passage, I understand, is to be seen by anyone who inspects the house. Thirdly, he objects to the condition that the feuar should not be allowed to have windows in the back wall of the upper storey of the dwelling-house, but will only be allowed to use flat lights on the roof thereof. This also is not an unusual condition, and an inspection of the house should have drawn the defender's attention to its existence.

---

"It is said that the defender is a foreigner, and that that made it the more incumbent upon the pursuer to explain the existence of the conditions. I have had an opportunity of seeing the defender in the box, and although he is a foreigner he speaks English excellently, and is a man of more than average intelligence, and there is nothing in his manner, appearance, or conversation to lead anyone to suppose that he was not conversant with and able to transact an ordinary piece of business.

"On the whole matter I think there is no necessity for proof, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, under certification."

[1] M'Donagh v. P. & W. MacLellan, June 18, 1816, 13 R. 1000; North British Railway Co. v. Wood, July 2, 1891, 18 R. (H. L.) 27.

[2] Robertson v. Rutherford, Nov. 27, 1841, 4 D. 120, 14 Scot. Jur. 51; Whyte v. Lees, Feb. 22, 1879, 6 R. 699.

No. 16.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

and effect. The Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof as to this, and after the proof had been taken, he, by an interlocutor, dated 15th March 1895, repelled the first plea in law for the defender, and appointed the case to be heard on the plea dealing with the restrictions in the titles to the subjects. After hearing parties on that plea, the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor of 20th June 1895, ordained the defender to implement the sale in terms of the first alternative conclusion of the summons, under certification that in the event of his failing to do so within one month decree would be pronounced under the alternative conclusion of the summons. This reclaiming note brings up for our consideration both these interlocutors.

I think that the first question which we ought to consider here (because there may be doubt about the other question raised in the case) is, whether the restrictions on the subject are such that the defender's ignorance of them entitles him to be relieved of his bargain. The facts material to this contention lie in small compass.

The purchase took place by missives prepared by the pursuer's man of business. The defender, on the other hand, was without professional assistance at the time when the missives were exchanged and the contract of sale concluded. The missives, which are in the form of an offer and acceptance, are dated, the offer by the defender on 26th January 1894, and the acceptance by the pursuer's man of business, on her behalf, and with her authority, on 27th January 1894, and the contract of sale was completed then as far as it was completed at all. The defender naturally desired that, before implement, the titles should be sent to his man of business to be examined, and they were accordingly sent upon 2d February 1894. The purchaser was not to have entry to the subjects until the Whitsunday term following, and the defender's man of business was not able to attend to the matter at once, bnt upon 26th February he intimated to the pursuer that the titles contained the restrictions set forth in the feu-contract, that these restrictions were not known to the defender or disclosed to him by the pursuer at the time of his purchase, and that in consequence the defender declined to implement the purchase.

It was the fact that the defender had bought the property under these restrictions, which were known to the pursuer's man of business, but not known to the defender, and in these circumstances is it right to force him to go on with his contract? I think that the professional man who acted for the pursuer ought to have informed this artist, who had no professional assistance on his side, of the restrictions which appeared on the face of the titles. He did not do so, and as the defender informed him of his refusal to go on with the contract whenever he was told of the existence of these restrictions, I think he is entitled to be relieved of his bargain.

That is enough for the decision of the case, but I do not think we can dispose of it altogether without some allusion to the conduct of the purchaser in the matter of obtaining the two receipts. I think he was entitled to go to Mrs Smith and make a true representation of the facts to her,—and it is not said that he did not represent the true state of the facts when he said that he was ignorant of the existence of these restrictions,—and I also think that he was entitled to offer to give her £5 to be free of the bargain, and to take the discharge which she granted on that footing. The Standard

No. 16.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

Investment Company now interpose and say that the discharge by Mrs Smith is of no avail, because they, in virtue of their bond over the property for its full value, had the real interest in the matter. Now, I think it material to observe that so far as appears on the face of the transactions Mrs Smith is the only person who has an interest in the matter. The Standard Investment Company did not appear in the transaction, and were not in any way parties to it. She was the sole seller—indeed, the Investment Company could not have sold the property by private bargain at all, and she was the only person entitled to give a discharge of the action raised in her name for implement of the contract. The idea that the holder of a bond over heritable property is entitled to enforce a sale made by the owner of the property, or to recover damages from the buyer on account of his failure to implement the contract, is untenable. Bondholders may sell under the powers of their bonds and of the Act of Parliament applicable to such sales, and will have their remedy for breach of contract on the part of purchasers from them, but there is no such case here.

Of course, if the defender had taken a discharge from Mrs Smith when her state of mind was such that she did not know what she was doing, that discharge would not avail him. But it is not necessary for us to inquire into the pursuer's state of mind or knowledge of the circumstances under which the receipts were granted to enable us to decide this case, because, as I have said, the fact that information was withheld as to the restrictions is enough for the decision. But the Lord Ordinary has stated that he is quite satisfied that the pursuer is incapable of understanding or transacting business of the very simplest kind, and he doubts whether she was capable of understanding what a summons meant, or of understanding any legal expressions, or what articles of roup meant.

I do not agree with that opinion of the Lord Ordinary. The sale bears to be by the pursuer alone, and there is nothing to shew she did not understand what she was doing, or that the estate was sold. If I had formed the same opinion as that entertained by the Lord Ordinary as to her state of mind, I should have had difficulty in dealing with this action, which proceeds entirely in her name, and I should also have had difficulty in giving any effect whatever to a sale effected by a person in such a state of mind. I think, however, that the facts appear sufficiently clear for us to hold that she was a woman capable of effecting a sale of her property and of raising an action in the Court of Session. While I am of that opinion, I think the preferable course will be to decide this action on the ground that the buyer is entitled to be relieved of his bargain because the restrictions in the title were not communicated to him.

Lord Trayner and the Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

Duncan Smith & M'Laren, S.S.C.—Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

MRS MARIA MORIER AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Rankine—Younger.
BROWNLIE AND WATSON AND EDWARD GIBBON, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Craigie.
THE GLASGOW GENERAL EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS BOARD AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Cooper.

Superior and Vassal—Property—Servitude—Real burden—Building restrictions—Personal objection.—In 1871 Harper, the proprietor of an area of unbuilt-on ground in Glasgow granted a bond and disposition in security over the ground, reserving power to feu the same, but that only at the rate of not less than £60 yearly of feu-duty, it being declared that the superiority of the lands feued and all other rights reserved to Harper as superior should be subject to the security as fully and effectually as the dominium utile prior to the constitution of the feu-rights. Thereafter Harper feued out building plots Nos. 1 to 15 as shewn on a feuing-plan according to which the ground was to be occupied by a crescent of dwelling-houses with back-greens behind and a common pleasure ground in front. The feu-contracts of these plots took the vassal bound to erect and maintain on the plot a self-contained dwelling-house of three square storeys in height upon the building lines as shewn on the plans indorsed on the feu-contract, and according to the elevations and other plans therein specified, and the superior bound himself to take the feuars in the unfeued plots bound to conform to these elevations and other stipulations, all the conditions, provisions, and others before written being declared to be essential qualifications of the feu-contract and real liens and burdens upon the plots thereby disponed, and in so far as declared in favour of the vassal, a real lien and burden on the remainder of the ground. Thereafter buildings were erected on the plots feued in conformity with the feu-contracts.

In 1878 and 1881 the superiorities of the plots feued were sold with the consent of the bondholder, and part of the debt having been repaid, the security was restricted to the remainder of the ground, which was still in Harper's hands and was unbuilt upon.

In 1894 the bondholder, under the powers in his bond, sold the unfeued ground still forming the security subjects, and the purchasers having proposed to erect on the ground a row of flatted houses, four storeys in height, and not following the line of building shewn upon the feuing-plan, the proprietors of the feus granted by Harper brought an action against the purchasers of the unfeued ground to have it declared that the ground was subject to the building restrictions and conditions contained in Harper's feu-contracts. The pursuers averred that the defenders were at the time they purchased the unfeued ground aware of these conditions and restrictions.

The Court assoilzied the defenders, holding (1) that as the defenders had not acquired the superiorities of the feus granted by Harper they were not liable in the personal obligations undertaken by him to the feuars; (2) that the personal obligations undertaken by Harper to the feuars after he had granted the bond with power of sale could not affect the right of the bondholder or of his successors in the unfeued ground; (3) that the restrictions had not validly been made real burdens on the unfeued ground, as they did not enter the titles thereof; (4) that the feu-contracts granted by Harper could not create a servitude altius non tollendi over the unfeued ground, in respect that there was no separate and distinct condition as to height, although a limitation as to height might be inferred from the conditions of the feu-contracts as a whole; (5) that assuming the defenders to have been in the knowledge of the conditions in Harper's feu-contracts, they were not thereby barred from erecting buildings inconsistent with these conditions.

Question, whether, if Harper had made the obligations real burdens on the unfeued ground, they would have been effectual against the bondholder.

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

BY disposition dated 24th, and recorded 28th November 1871, John Ewing Walker, coach proprietor in Glasgow, disponed three contiguous plots of ground, extending in all to about nine acres, at Kelvinside, Glasgow, to Archibald & James Harper, cabinetmakers, Glasgow, the disposition declaring that it should not be in the power of the Harpers, or their successors, to erect upon the ground disponed any buildings except self-contained villas, self-contained lodgings, or fitted tenements of a superior description, the said buildings not to exceed four storeys in height above the surface of the ground.

By bond and disposition in security dated 24th and 26th, and recorded 27th February 1873 the Harpers, in consideration of the sum of £7500 borrowed by them from John Ross junior, merchant in Glasgow, disponed to Ross in security the three plots of ground just mentioned,—"But always with and under, in so far as applicable to the said three lots of ground hereby disponed, the whole real liens, burdens, servitudes, reservations, conditions, restrictions, prohibitions, provisions, declarations, obligations, and others specified" in the disposition by John Ewing Walker; "but declaring that, notwithstanding the above conveyance, it shall be competent to and in the power of us and our heirs and successors, at any time hereafter, to dispone in feu-farm, to be holden under us and our foresaids, all or any part of the said lands and others above disponed, but that only at the rate of not less than £60 of yearly feu-duty for each acre of ground, and so that no grassum price or other consideration shall be taken or stipulated to be taken for the ground so feued, other than an annual feu-duty at the rate foresaid, with or without casualties of superiority, or a duplication of the feu-duty every nineteenth year in full of such casualties: And it shall not be in the power of us or our foresaids to make or consent to any conditions or stipulations whereby any right competent by law to us or our foresaids as superiors of any part of said lands to be feued as aforesaid for security or recovery of the said feu-duties, duplications thereof, or casualties, may be in any way prejudiced or injured: And it is hereby declared that the superiority of the lands so to be feued as aforesaid, and the feu-duties, duplications thereof, and casualties of superiority, and any other right, title, or interest in or to the lands and others so to be feued, which may belong to or be reserved by us or our foresaids as superiors thereof, shall be subject to the security hereby created in the same manner, and as fully and effectually to the said John Ross junior and his foresaids, as the dominium utile or right of property of said lands prior to the constitution of such feu-rights."

After acquiring the property from Walker the Harpers had a feuing-plan prepared, shewing the ground laid out in a crescent of dwelling-houses (to be called "Derby Crescent"), with back-greens behind, and a common pleasure ground in front; and by feu-contract, dated 16th and 17th October, and recorded 4th November 1874, they feued out to George Pearson, builder in Glasgow, lots 10 to 15 as shewn on the feuing-plan. By the feu-contract Pearson and his heirs and successors in the lots feued were taken bound "to build and erect, and in all time coming maintain, upon each of the said plots of ground a self-contained lodging or dwelling-house of three square storeys in height upon the building lines, as shewn on the plans indorsed hereon, and conform to the elevation and other plans prepared by Robert Stevenson, architect in Glasgow, which lodging shall be kept up and maintained in all time coming according to said elevation,

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

and shall be rebuilt or renewed in case of total or partial destruction; and the said first parties [the Harpers] shall take their feuars of the other plots of ground in Derby Crescent validly bound to conform to and carry out the said elevations, and likewise the stipulations herein contained, as to the description, elevation, and quality of houses to be erected, and the formation and maintenance of pleasure ground, and the formation and maintenance of said carriage-way and meuse lane, and these conditions and stipulations are hereby declared real liens and burdens upon the other steading of ground in Derby Crescent in favour of the second party and his successors in the said plots of ground hereby disponed." Then followed a number of stipulations as to the formation, maintenance, and use of the houses, the pavement, and carriage-way in front, and the common ground, and in regard to the back-greens there was this stipulation, "declaring that the back-ground attached to said dwelling-houses shall remain unbuilt on, and be used solely as a washing-green, with suitable offices, which offices shall not exceed in height 30 feet to the ridge of the roof." There was no obligation by the superior to take his feuars in the remainder of the ground bound by these restrictions as to back-greens. The feu-contract also contained this general declaration, "all which conditions, provisions, and others before written are hereby declared to be essential qualifications of this feu-contract and real liens and burdens and servitudes upon the several and respective lands hereby disponed, and, in so far as declared to be in favour of the second party, shall be and remain a real lien and burden upon the first parties' other lands."

The parties to the action after mentioned were at issue as to whether the feuing-plan referred to in the feu-contract was prepared before or after the date of the bond and disposition in security in favour of Ross, but the feuing-plan was not referred to in the bond and disposition in security, and it was not averred that Ross knew of the feuing-plan.

In 1875 and 1876 the Harpers feued out to Pearson lots 1 to 9 of the Derby Crescent, under feu-contracts mutatis mutandis identical with those of the feu-contract of 1874, and Pearson erected dwelling-houses upon the lots feued to him in conformity with the feu-contracts.

In 1878 and 1881 the Harpers sold the superiority of the fifteen lots thus feued, in part to the incorporation of Miller's Charity (whose rights were subsequently vested in the Glasgow General Educational Endowments Board) and in part to the trustees of Alexander MacArthur. The price obtained for the superiority was paid to Ross in part extinction of the sum due under his bond, and he discharged the bond in so far as regarded the ground feued, and restricted his security to the ground unfeued still belonging to the Harpers, and extending to 7666 square yards.

The Harpers' estates having been sequestrated, and the interest on Ross's bond having fallen into arrear, Ross's trustees in 1894 sold under the powers in the bond the 7666 square yards then forming the sole subject of his security to Brownlie and Watson, writers, Glasgow. Thereafter in April 1894 Brownlie & Watson feued out the ground to Edward Gibbon under a feu-contract which contained no reference to the restrictions and feuing-plan set forth and referred to in the feu-contracts granted by the Harpers to Pearson; and Gibbon lodged an application in the Dean of Guild Court for warrant to erect on the ground feued to him a row of flatted dwelling-houses four storeys in height, and not following the line of building shewn upon the Harpers' feuing-plan, but running diagonally across what was there shewn as back-greens.

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

In consequence, in August 1894, Mrs Maria Morier and other proprietors of houses built on the feus originally granted to Pearson brought an action against Brownlie and Watson, Gibbon, The Glasgow General Educational Endowments Board, and MacArthur's trustees, concluding for declarator that the obligations, conditions, and restrictions contained in the feu-contracts granted to Pearson formed continuing obligations, conditions, and burdens on the superiority of the whole subjects which had belonged to the Harpers, and were binding on their successors in the superiority, and, in particular, were binding on Brownlie and Watson, as vested in the unbuilt-on ground, and also for declarator that Brownlie and Watson were bound in feuing that ground to insert the said obligations, &c., in all feu-contracts, feu-charters, or other feu-dispositions granted by them, as real burdens on the right of the feuars in favour of the pursuers, their heirs and successors, and further for declarator that the unbuilt-on ground was subject to a real condition, real burden, and servitude in favour of the pursuers and their successors, by which right was conferred upon and vested in the pursuers and their foresaids to restrain the erection upon the same of any buildings other than self-contained lodgings or dwelling-houses of the description and conform to the elevation and plans set forth in the feu-contract in favour of Pearson. The summons also concluded for interdict, damages, and reduction of Gibbon's feu-contract.

The pursuers set forth the feu-contracts granted to Pearson, the feu-contract granted by Brownlie and Watson to Gibbon, and averred further, inter alia, that "the said Archibald Brownlie, Joseph Watson, and Edward Gibbon were and have all along been fully aware of the conditions and obligations in the feu-contracts with Pearson."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The obligations by the superiors in the said feu-contracts with Pearson being undertaken by them as such superiors, run with the lands, and are binding upon them and their successors as superiors of said lands. (3) Under the said feu-contracts, the Messrs Harper and their successors are effectually prohibited from erecting on the vacant ground in Derby Crescent any buildings other than self-contained houses conform to the building plan and elevations foresaid. (4) The ground belonging to the defenders in Derby Crescent being subject to a real condition, real burden, restriction, and servitude in favour of the pursuers, under which the pursuers are entitled to restrain the erection of buildings other than self-contained houses of the description foresaid, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (5) The pursuers being the holders of a servitude non altius tollendi over the ground belonging to the defenders, with which the defenders' proposed buildings are inconsistent, the erection of these buildings should be interdicted. (6) The said feu-contract between Messrs Brownlie and Watson and Gibbon being executed in contravention of the superiors' obligations in the feu-contracts with Pearson, which were well known to both the parties thereto, should be reduced, and declared null and void. (7) The power to feu reserved in the bond and disposition in security granted to Mr John Ross, implied and included power to prepare feuing-plans, and to insert such reasonable conditions as were

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

necessary to induce feuars to take up building ground, and to secure adherence to the plans.

The defenders Brownlie and Watson pleaded;—(3) The said Messrs Harper having no power, on a sound construction of said bond and disposition in security, to impose, without the consent of the bondholder, the conditions founded on by the pursuers on the ground sold thereunder to the defenders, and, separatim, the said conditions not having been imposed thereon, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. The defender Gibbon had a plea to the same effect.

The action having been sisted quoad the remaining defenders, it is not necessary here to consider their defences.

On 30th May 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences for the defenders Archibald Brownlie, Joseph Watson, and Edward Gibbon: Assoilzies the said defenders from the conclusions of the action, so far as directed against them: Finds them entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . A question which was anxiously argued upon both sides was whether, considering that the disposition in security in favour of Ross was granted prior to the feu to Pearson, and the limited terms in which in the disposition right was reserved to the Harpers to feu, it was competent for the latter in a question with Ross and those taking in his right, to impose building restrictions upon ground not actually feued, or, at all events, restrictions going beyond those specified in the disposition by Walker to the Harpers. That is a question of difficulty, and, if the superiority of the ground feued had not been sold and discharged of Ross' bond, it would have been material; but, as the facts stand, I do not think, for reasons which I shall presently give, that it is necessary to decide the question.

"After the superiority of the ground feued was sold, I think that it was practically admitted that, although the Harpers ceased to have any connection with that ground, they still remained bound to the feuars by contract in the personal obligation that they should take their feuars in the other plots of ground bound to conform to and carry out the stipulations in the feu-contract as to the elevation, description, and quality of the houses. The question therefore is, was that personal obligation binding upon, and enforceable by the feuars against Ross, or anyone to whom he should sell the unfeued ground?

"I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. If the superiority of the ground feued had not been sold, and if what Brownlie and Watson had acquired from Ross's trustees had been both the superiority of the ground feued and the unfeued ground, I am inclined to think that the former would have been bound by the personal obligation to which I am referring, assuming that it was in the Harpers' power in a question with Ross to put such a restriction upon the unfeued ground. Because, in the case supposed, Brownlie and Watson would have become superiors of the ground feued, and there would have been privity both of contract and estate between them and the feuars. The superiority having been sold, however, there was no connection whatever between the ground feued, or the feuars, and Ross. There was no contract between them; and they were not interested in any common estate. In these circumstances, I do not think that the feuars could have any title to enforce the Harpers' personal obligation against Ross and his successors.

"It was argued that Ross's disponees were liable to implement the obligation, because Ross sold only under mandate from the Harpers, and therefore could not give any higher right than the latter could have given. That argument assumes that if the Harpers had sold the unfeued ground their

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—It was not beyond the powers of the Harpers, as in a question with Ross, the bondholder, to undertake the obligations in the pursuers' feu-contracts. The bond reserved power to feu, and this imported power to insert in the feu-contracts all reasonable and ordinary conditions which were not inconsistent with the express terms of the bond; and, if the conditions might validly be inserted as in a question with Ross, the fact that they were not made real burdens could not prejudice him. Further, a bondholder in selling the security subjects under his power of sale, was acting as the mandatary of the debtor, and the purchaser was therefore to be taken as if he had acquired the property from the debtor directly, and as liable in all the obligations which he would have incurred had he so acquired the property. But the Harpers being under the obligations in the pursuers' feu-contract could not have sold the property to Brownlie and Watson free of these obligations, thereby giving Brownlie and Watson a higher right in the subjects than they themselves possessed. If Brownlie and Watson in purchasing from the Harpers were in bona fide ignorance of these obligations, they had their remedy against the Harpers, either for damages for breach of con-disponee would have been liable in the obligation. I am not prepared to assent to that assumption. If the Harpers had sold the unfeued ground, I do not think that the purchaser would have been bound by a restriction not appearing in the titles, and resting only upon the personal obligation of the seller granted to a third party. In such a case it appears to me that the only remedy of the feuars would have been to claim damages from the Harpers for breach of contract. But, however that may be, I do not think that a purchaser from Ross under his power of sale could be affected by the obligation. The ground was disponed in security to Ross, and a power of sale conferred upon him, a year before the personal obligation was granted, and the argument involves that, without his knowledge and consent, the Harpers could, by giving a mere personal obligation, do what amounted to a partial recall of the mandate to sell, and a diminution of the value of the security. I am of that opinion, even upon the assumption that the Harpers were, in a question with Ross, entitled to impose the building restrictions on ground not actually feued. Assuming that the Harpers were entitled to do so, they could only have done so by inserting the restrictions in some deed (such as a disposition of the unfeued ground to themselves) placed upon record. But, if that had been done, it may well be that Ross would not have consented to discharge the feued ground of his security when the superiority was sold, and therefore it cannot be assumed that Ross's disponees would be in no worse position, if the personal obligation was held to be enforceable against them, than they would have been in if the restrictions had been validly imposed on the unfeued ground.

---

"Further, the fact (assuming it to be so) that the Harpers would have been entitled to make the building restrictions real burdens or servitudes upon the unfeued ground appears to me to be no reason for holding the purchaser bound by the personal obligation, because the feuars with whom the Harpers contracted were content with the personal obligation, and must be presumed to have known that it would not be enforceable against an onerous disponee in the event of the unfeued ground being sold.

"Then it was argued that the building restrictions, being of the nature of servitudes, were validly constituted burdens upon the unfeued ground by the contract entered into between the feuars and the Harpers, although they did not enter the record. It seems to me to be settled that only the known servitudes are effectual without entering the record, and conditions as to the character and use of houses, although familiar as building restrictions, are not among the proper servitudes known to the law. But it was argued that

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

tract or for rescission of the contract. The allegation of the pursuers, however, was that Brownlie and Watson, when they made the purchase, were well aware of the conditions in the pursuers' feu-contracts; and their knowledge, assuming it to be proved, would have been a complete answer to any action at their instance against the Harpers for breach of contract. Even assuming that Brownlie and Watson, if they had purchased in ignorance of the restrictions in the pursuers' titles, would not have been bound by these restrictions, their knowledge of these restrictions made the state of their own titles immaterial.[1] But further, if the conditions had not been effectually constituted real burdens on the unfeued property, because they did not appear in the titles to that property, they were binding as servitudes duly constituted by the Harpers. A servitude altius non tollendi might be validly constituted, although it did not appear on the recorded titles of the servient tenement;[2] and it was no objection to the validity of such a servitude that the height forbidden was not expressly specified in the deed constituting the servitude,—the height might be a matter of inference from the terms of the deed.[3] Further, building restrictions of an ordinary character, which might the conditions in regard to the dwelling-houses, and in regard to the back-greens, included the known servitudes of altius non tollendi and non ædificandi, and to that extent were effectually constituted against the unfeued ground. It might be a nice question whether a building restriction which prescribed the position, character, architectural construction, and also, and separately, the height of houses to be erected, could be split up into its component parts, and the prohibition against building above a certain height alone regarded. But in this case the question does not, in my judgment, arise. I think that it is the case that, if the whole conditions of the building restrictions are read together, uniformity in the height of the houses is secured. Because, although it is not specified that the houses are not to be more than three square storeys in height, and although a storey is not a standard of height, yet, as the houses were to be built, and in all time maintained, according to the elevation shewn upon the plan prepared by Mr Stevenson, uniformity of height, as well as of appearance, necessarily followed. But that shews that there is no limitation on the height of the houses, unless the whole conditions imposed are taken into consideration. The limitation in height is merely an inference from, or result of, the conditions as a whole, and not a distinct and separate condition. Therefore a servitude altius non tollendi could not be imposed upon the unfeued ground, unless the whole conditions as to the houses were imposed upon that ground. But, as I have said, these conditions not being known servitudes could not be imposed upon the unfeued ground without entering the record.

---

"In regard to the back-greens, the restrictions are, that they are to remain unbuilt upon, except that offices, not exceeding in height 30 feet at the ridge of the roof, may be erected. These conditions are no doubt equivalent to the known servitudes of altius non tollendi and non ædificandi, but then the Harpers came under no obligation to impose these obligations upon the unfeued ground.

"I am therefore of opinion that the feu-contracts between the Harpers and Pearson had not the effect of imposing any servitude upon the unfeued ground.

"It was finally argued that Brownlie and Watson knew of the obligation

---

[1] Lang v. Dixon, June 29, 1813, F. C.; Petrie v. Forsyth, Dec. 16, 1874, 2 R. 215; Stoddart v. Dalzell, Dec. 16, 1876, 4 R. 236.

[2] Young v. Dewar, Nov. 17, 1814, F. C.

[3] Banks & Co. v. Walker, June 5, 1874, 1 R. 981.

No. 16.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soetler.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—He had not been fairly used in the transaction. The restrictions should have been disclosed to him before the sale, more especially as he had not the advice of an agent. Apart from this the restrictions were of themselves so unusual that he was entitled to relief. The prohibition of windows in the back wall was enough to render the property practically valueless.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) On the discharge. The defender acted at least irregularly in going to the pursuer without her agents. He went at his own risk, and the onus was on him to shew that the bargain was fair. The Court was strict in criticising any such transaction behind an agent's back.[1] (2) On the restrictions. These were of a usual kind. Altius non tollendi was the most important, and it was very familiar in urban property.[2]

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action for implement of a contract of sale with an alternative conclusion for damages. The defender has two pleas in law on which he grounds his defence to the action. The first of these is practically that the pursuer had discharged the bargain, and in support of that he founds upon two receipts which he obtained from the pursuer—one written upon the service copy of the summons in this action, and the other upon a letter. These bear on the face of them that, in consideration of the payment of £5, the pursuer discharges all claims made by her against the defender in the summons.

The other ground of defence is that the subjects sold were by the titles under restrictions of which the defender was ignorant at the time of the sale, and that these restrictions were of such a kind that he was entitled to be relieved of his bargain.

It was contended by the pursuer that these receipts ought not to have effect, because the pursuer did not know what she was doing at the time she granted them, or at least was under essential error as to their meaning defender should have no difficulty in getting the superior's leave to depart from it. He next objects that the feuar is bound to leave a passage of 3 feet 4 inches to afford a means of access to reserved premises at the back. That passage, I understand, is to be seen by anyone who inspects the house. Thirdly, he objects to the condition that the feuar should not be allowed to have windows in the back wall of the upper storey of the dwelling-house, but will only be allowed to use flat lights on the roof thereof. This also is not an unusual condition, and an inspection of the house should have drawn the defender's attention to its existence.

---

"It is said that the defender is a foreigner, and that that made it the more incumbent upon the pursuer to explain the existence of the conditions. I have had an opportunity of seeing the defender in the box, and although he is a foreigner he speaks English excellently, and is a man of more than average intelligence, and there is nothing in his manner, appearance, or conversation to lead anyone to suppose that he was not conversant with and able to transact an ordinary piece of business.

"On the whole matter I think there is no necessity for proof, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, under certification."

[1] M'Donagh v. P. & W. MacLellan, June 18, 1816, 13 R. 1000; North British Railway Co. v. Wood, July 2, 1891, 18 R. (H. L.) 27.

[2] Robertson v. Rutherford, Nov. 27, 1841, 4 D. 120, 14 Scot. Jur. 51; Whyte v. Lees, Feb. 22, 1879, 6 R. 699.

No. 16.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

and effect. The Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof as to this, and after the proof had been taken, he, by an interlocutor, dated 15th March 1895, repelled the first plea in law for the defender, and appointed the case to be heard on the plea dealing with the restrictions in the titles to the subjects. After hearing parties on that plea, the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor of 20th June 1895, ordained the defender to implement the sale in terms of the first alternative conclusion of the summons, under certification that in the event of his failing to do so within one month decree would be pronounced under the alternative conclusion of the summons. This reclaiming note brings up for our consideration both these interlocutors.

I think that the first question which we ought to consider here (because there may be doubt about the other question raised in the case) is, whether the restrictions on the subject are such that the defender's ignorance of them entitles him to be relieved of his bargain. The facts material to this contention lie in small compass.

The purchase took place by missives prepared by the pursuer's man of business. The defender, on the other hand, was without professional assistance at the time when the missives were exchanged and the contract of sale concluded. The missives, which are in the form of an offer and acceptance, are dated, the offer by the defender on 26th January 1894, and the acceptance by the pursuer's man of business, on her behalf, and with her authority, on 27th January 1894, and the contract of sale was completed then as far as it was completed at all. The defender naturally desired that, before implement, the titles should be sent to his man of business to be examined, and they were accordingly sent upon 2d February 1894. The purchaser was not to have entry to the subjects until the Whitsunday term following, and the defender's man of business was not able to attend to the matter at once, but upon 26th February he intimated to the pursuer that the titles contained the restrictions set forth in the feu-contract, that these restrictions were not known to the defender or disclosed to him by the pursuer at the time of his purchase, and that in consequence the defender declined to implement the purchase.

It was the fact that the defender had bought the property under these restrictions, which were known to the pursuer's man of business, but not known to the defender, and in these circumstances is it right to force him to go on with his contract? I think that the professional man who acted for the pursuer ought to have informed this artist, who had no professional assistance on his side, of the restrictions which appeared on the face of the titles. He did not do so, and as the defender informed him of his refusal to go on with the contract whenever he was told of the existence of these restrictions, I think he is entitled to be relieved of his bargain.

That is enough for the decision of the case, but I do not think we can dispose of it altogether without some allusion to the conduct of the purchaser in the matter of obtaining the two receipts. I think he was entitled to go to Mrs Smith and make a true representation of the facts to her,—and it is not said that he did not represent the true state of the facts when he said that he was ignorant of the existence of these restrictions,—and I also think that he was entitled to offer to give her £5 to be free of the bargain, and to take the discharge which she granted on that footing. The Standard

No. 16.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Smith v. Soeder.

Investment Company now interpose and say that the discharge by Mrs Smith is of no avail, because they, in virtue of their bond over the property for its full value, had the real interest in the matter. Now, I think it material to observe that so far as appears on the face of the transactions Mrs Smith is the only person who has an interest in the matter. The Standard Investment Company did not appear in the transaction, and were not in any way parties to it. She was the sole seller—indeed, the Investment Company could not have sold the property by private bargain at all, and she was the only person entitled to give a discharge of the action raised in her name for implement of the contract. The idea that the holder of a bond over heritable property is entitled to enforce a sale made by the owner of the property, or to recover damages from the buyer on account of his failure to implement the contract, is untenable. Bondholders may sell under the powers of their bonds and of the Act of Parliament applicable to such sales, and will have their remedy for breach of contract on the part of purchasers from them, but there is no such case here.

Of course, if the defender had taken a discharge from Mrs Smith when her state of mind was such that she did not know what she was doing, that discharge would not avail him. But it is not necessary for us to inquire into the pursuer's state of mind or knowledge of the circumstances under which the receipts were granted to enable us to decide this case, because, as I have said, the fact that information was withheld as to the restrictions is enough for the decision. But the Lord Ordinary has stated that he is quite satisfied that the pursuer is incapable of understanding or transacting business of the very simplest kind, and he doubts whether she was capable of understanding what a summons meant, or of understanding any legal expressions, or what articles of roup meant.

I do not agree with that opinion of the Lord Ordinary. The sale bears to be by the pursuer alone, and there is nothing to shew she did not understand what she was doing, or that the estate was sold. If I had formed the same opinion as that entertained by the Lord Ordinary as to her state of mind, I should have had difficulty in dealing with this action, which proceeds entirely in her name, and I should also have had difficulty in giving any effect whatever to a sale effected by a person in such a state of mind. I think, however, that the facts appear sufficiently clear for us to hold that she was a woman capable of effecting a sale of her property and of raising an action in the Court of Session. While I am of that opinion, I think the preferable course will be to decide this action on the ground that the buyer is entitled to be relieved of his bargain because the restrictions in the title were not communicated to him.

Lord Trayner and the Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

Duncan Smith & M'Laren, S.S.C.—Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

MRS MARIA MORIER AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Rankine—Younger.
BROWNLIE AND WATSON AND EDWARD GIBBON, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Craigie.
THE GLASGOW GENERAL EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS BOARD AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Cooper.

Superior and Vassal—Property—Servitude—Real burden—Building restrictions—Personal objection.—In 1871 Harper, the proprietor of an area of unbuilt-on ground in Glasgow granted a bond and disposition in security over the ground, reserving power to feu the same, but that only at the rate of not less than £60 yearly of feu-duty, it being declared that the superiority of the lands feued and all other rights reserved to Harper as superior should be subject to the security as fully and effectually as the dominium utile prior to the constitution of the feu-rights. Thereafter Harper feued out building plots Nos. 1 to 15 as shewn on a feuing-plan according to which the ground was to be occupied by a crescent of dwelling-houses with back-greens behind and a common pleasure ground in front. The feu-contracts of these plots took the vassal bound to erect and maintain on the plot a self-contained dwelling-house of three square storeys in height upon the building lines as shewn on the plans indorsed on the feu-contract, and according to the elevations and other plans therein specified, and the superior bound himself to take the feuars in the unfeued plots bound to conform to these elevations and other stipulations, all the conditions, provisions, and others before written being declared to be essential qualifications of the feu-contract and real liens and burdens upon the plots thereby disponed, and in so far as declared in favour of the vassal, a real lien and burden on the remainder of the ground. Thereafter buildings were erected on the plots feued in conformity with the feu-contracts.

In 1878 and 1881 the superiorities of the plots feued were sold with the consent of the bondholder, and part of the debt having been repaid, the security was restricted to the remainder of the ground, which was still in Harper's hands and was unbuilt upon.

In 1894 the bondholder, under the powers in his bond, sold the unfeued ground still forming the security subjects, and the purchasers having proposed to erect on the ground a row of flatted houses, four storeys in height, and not following the line of building shewn upon the feuing-plan, the proprietors of the feus granted by Harper brought an action against the purchasers of the unfeued ground to have it declared that the ground was subject to the building restrictions and conditions contained in Harper's feu-contracts. The pursuers averred that the defenders were at the time they purchased the unfeued ground aware of these conditions and restrictions.

The Court assoilzied the defenders, holding (1) that as the defenders had not acquired the superiorities of the feus granted by Harper they were not liable in the personal obligations undertaken by him to the feuars; (2) that the personal obligations undertaken by Harper to the feuars after he had granted the bond with power of sale could not affect the right of the bondholder or of his successors in the unfeued ground; (3) that the restrictions had not validly been made real burdens on the unfeued ground, as they did not enter the titles thereof; (4) that the feu-contracts granted by Harper could not create a servitude altius non tollendi over the unfeued ground, in respect that there was no separate and distinct condition as to height, although a limitation as to height might be inferred from the conditions of the feu-contracts as a whole; (5) that assuming the defenders to have been in the knowledge of the conditions in Harper's feu-contracts, they were not thereby barred from erecting buildings inconsistent with these conditions.

Question, whether, if Harper had made the obligations real burdens on the unfeued ground, they would have been effectual against the bondholder.

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

BY disposition dated 24th, and recorded 28th November 1871, John Ewing Walker, coach proprietor in Glasgow, disponed three contiguous plots of ground, extending in all to about nine acres, at Kelvinside, Glasgow, to Archibald & James Harper, cabinetmakers, Glasgow, the disposition declaring that it should not be in the power of the Harpers, or their successors, to erect upon the ground disponed any buildings except self-contained villas, self-contained lodgings, or fitted tenements of a superior description, the said buildings not to exceed four storeys in height above the surface of the ground.

By bond and disposition in security dated 24th and 26th, and recorded 27th February 1873 the Harpers, in consideration of the sum of £7500 borrowed by them from John Ross junior, merchant in Glasgow, disponed to Ross in security the three plots of ground just mentioned,—"But always with and under, in so far as applicable to the said three lots of ground hereby disponed, the whole real liens, burdens, servitudes, reservations, conditions, restrictions, prohibitions, provisions, declarations, obligations, and others specified" in the disposition by John Ewing Walker; "but declaring that, notwithstanding the above conveyance, it shall be competent to and in the power of us and our heirs and successors, at any time hereafter, to dispone in feu-farm, to be holden under us and our foresaids, all or any part of the said lands and others above disponed, but that only at the rate of not less than £60 of yearly feu-duty for each acre of ground, and so that no grassum price or other consideration shall be taken or stipulated to be taken for the ground so feued, other than an annual feu-duty at the rate foresaid, with or without casualties of superiority, or a duplication of the feu-duty every nineteenth year in full of such casualties: And it shall not be in the power of us or our foresaids to make or consent to any conditions or stipulations whereby any right competent by law to us or our foresaids as superiors of any part of said lands to be feued as aforesaid for security or recovery of the said feu-duties, duplications thereof, or casualties, may be in any way prejudiced or injured: And it is hereby declared that the superiority of the lands so to be feued as aforesaid, and the feu-duties, duplications thereof, and casualties of superiority, and any other right, title, or interest in or to the lands and others so to be feued, which may belong to or be reserved by us or our foresaids as superiors thereof, shall be subject to the security hereby created in the same manner, and as fully and effectually to the said John Ross junior and his foresaids, as the dominium utile or right of property of said lands prior to the constitution of such feu-rights."

After acquiring the property from Walker the Harpers had a feuing-plan prepared, shewing the ground laid out in a crescent of dwelling-houses (to be called "Derby Crescent"), with back-greens behind, and a common pleasure ground in front; and by feu-contract, dated 16th and 17th October, and recorded 4th November 1874, they feued out to George Pearson, builder in Glasgow, lots 10 to 15 as shewn on the feuing-plan. By the feu-contract Pearson and his heirs and successors in the lots feued were taken bound "to build and erect, and in all time coming maintain, upon each of the said plots of ground a self-contained lodging or dwelling-house of three square storeys in height upon the building lines, as shewn on the plans indorsed hereon, and conform to the elevation and other plans prepared by Robert Stevenson, architect in Glasgow, which lodging shall be kept up and maintained in all time coming according to said elevation,

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

and shall be rebuilt or renewed in case of total or partial destruction; and the said first parties [the Harpers] shall take their feuars of the other plots of ground in Derby Crescent validly bound to conform to and carry out the said elevations, and likewise the stipulations herein contained, as to the description, elevation, and quality of houses to be erected, and the formation and maintenance of pleasure ground, and the formation and maintenance of said carriage-way and meuse lane, and these conditions and stipulations are hereby declared real liens and burdens upon the other steading of ground in Derby Crescent in favour of the second party and his successors in the said plots of ground hereby disponed." Then followed a number of stipulations as to the formation, maintenance, and use of the houses, the pavement, and carriage-way in front, and the common ground, and in regard to the back-greens there was this stipulation, "declaring that the back-ground attached to said dwelling-houses shall remain unbuilt on, and be used solely as a washing-green, with suitable offices, which offices shall not exceed in height 30 feet to the ridge of the roof." There was no obligation by the superior to take his feuars in the remainder of the ground bound by these restrictions as to back-greens. The feu-contract also contained this general declaration, "all which conditions, provisions, and others before written are hereby declared to be essential qualifications of this feu-contract and real liens and burdens and servitudes upon the several and respective lands hereby disponed, and, in so far as declared to be in favour of the second party, shall be and remain a real lien and burden upon the first parties' other lands."

The parties to the action after mentioned were at issue as to whether the feuing-plan referred to in the feu-contract was prepared before or after the date of the bond and disposition in security in favour of Ross, but the feuing-plan was not referred to in the bond and disposition in security, and it was not averred that Ross knew of the feuing-plan.

In 1875 and 1876 the Harpers feued out to Pearson lots 1 to 9 of the Derby Crescent, under feu-contracts mutatis mutandis identical with those of the feu-contract of 1874, and Pearson erected dwelling-houses upon the lots feued to him in conformity with the feu-contracts.

In 1878 and 1881 the Harpers sold the superiority of the fifteen lots thus feued, in part to the incorporation of Miller's Charity (whose rights were subsequently vested in the Glasgow General Educational Endowments Board) and in part to the trustees of Alexander MacArthur. The price obtained for the superiority was paid to Ross in part extinction of the sum due under his bond, and he discharged the bond in so far as regarded the ground feued, and restricted his security to the ground unfeued still belonging to the Harpers, and extending to 7666 square yards.

The Harpers' estates having been sequestrated, and the interest on Ross's bond having fallen into arrear, Ross's trustees in 1894 sold under the powers in the bond the 7666 square yards then forming the sole subject of his security to Brownlie and Watson, writers, Glasgow. Thereafter in April 1894 Brownlie & Watson feued out the ground to Edward Gibbon under a feu-contract which contained no reference to the restrictions and feuing-plan set forth and referred to in the feu-contracts granted by the Harpers to Pearson; and Gibbon lodged an application in the Dean of Guild Court for warrant to erect on the ground feued to him a row of flatted dwelling-houses four storeys in height, and not following the line of building shewn upon the Harpers' feuing-plan, but running diagonally across what was there shewn as back-greens.

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

In consequence, in August 1894, Mrs Maria Morier and other proprietors of houses built on the feus originally granted to Pearson brought an action against Brownlie and Watson, Gibbon, The Glasgow General Educational Endowments Board, and MacArthur's trustees, concluding for declarator that the obligations, conditions, and restrictions contained in the feu-contracts granted to Pearson formed continuing obligations, conditions, and burdens on the superiority of the whole subjects which had belonged to the Harpers, and were binding on their successors in the superiority, and, in particular, were binding on Brownlie and Watson, as vested in the unbuilt-on ground, and also for declarator that Brownlie and Watson were bound in feuing that ground to insert the said obligations, &c., in all feu-contracts, feu-charters, or other feu-dispositions granted by them, as real burdens on the right of the feuars in favour of the pursuers, their heirs and successors, and further for declarator that the unbuilt-on ground was subject to a real condition, real burden, and servitude in favour of the pursuers and their successors, by which right was conferred upon and vested in the pursuers and their foresaids to restrain the erection upon the same of any buildings other than self-contained lodgings or dwelling-houses of the description and conform to the elevation and plans set forth in the feu-contract in favour of Pearson. The summons also concluded for interdict, damages, and reduction of Gibbon's feu-contract.

The pursuers set forth the feu-contracts granted to Pearson, the feu-contract granted by Brownlie and Watson to Gibbon, and averred further, inter alia, that "the said Archibald Brownlie, Joseph Watson, and Edward Gibbon were and have all along been fully aware of the conditions and obligations in the feu-contracts with Pearson."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The obligations by the superiors in the said feu-contracts with Pearson being undertaken by them as such superiors, run with the lands, and are binding upon them and their successors as superiors of said lands. (3) Under the said feu-contracts, the Messrs Harper and their successors are effectually prohibited from erecting on the vacant ground in Derby Crescent any buildings other than self-contained houses conform to the building plan and elevations foresaid. (4) The ground belonging to the defenders in Derby Crescent being subject to a real condition, real burden, restriction, and servitude in favour of the pursuers, under which the pursuers are entitled to restrain the erection of buildings other than self-contained houses of the description foresaid, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (5) The pursuers being the holders of a servitude non altius tollendi over the ground belonging to the defenders, with which the defenders' proposed buildings are inconsistent, the erection of these buildings should be interdicted. (6) The said feu-contract between Messrs Brownlie and Watson and Gibbon being executed in contravention of the superiors' obligations in the feu-contracts with Pearson, which were well known to both the parties thereto, should be reduced, and declared null and void. (7) The power to feu reserved in the bond and disposition in security granted to Mr John Ross, implied and included power to prepare feuing-plans, and to insert such reasonable conditions as were necessary to induce feuars to take up building ground, and to secure adherence to the plans.

The defenders Brownlie and Watson pleaded;—(3) The said Messrs Harper having no power, on a sound construction of said bond and disposition in security, to impose, without the consent of the bondholder, the conditions founded on by the pursuers on the ground sold thereunder to the defenders, and, separatim, the said conditions not having been imposed thereon, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. The defender Gibbon had a plea to the same effect.

The action having been sisted quoad the remaining defenders, it is not necessary here to consider their defences.

On 30th May 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences for the defenders Archibald Brownlie, Joseph Watson, and Edward Gibbon: Assoilzies the said defenders from the conclusions of the action, so far as directed against them: Finds them entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . A question which was anxiously argued upon both sides was whether, considering that the disposition in security in favour of Ross was granted prior to the feu to Pearson, and the limited terms in which in the disposition right was reserved to the Harpers to feu, it was competent for the latter in a question with Ross and those taking in his right, to impose building restrictions upon ground not actually feued, or, at all events, restrictions going beyond those specified in the disposition by Walker to the Harpers. That is a question of difficulty, and, if the superiority of the ground feued had not been sold and discharged of Ross' bond, it would have been material; but, as the facts stand, I do not think, for reasons which I shall presently give, that it is necessary to decide the question.

"After the superiority of the ground feued was sold, I think that it was practically admitted that, although the Harpers ceased to have any connection with that ground, they still remained bound to the feuars by contract in the personal obligation that they should take their feuars in the other plots of ground bound to conform to and carry out the stipulations in the feu-contract as to the elevation, description, and quality of the houses. The question therefore is, was that personal obligation binding upon, and enforceable by the feuars against Ross, or anyone to whom he should sell the unfeued ground?

"I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. If the superiority of the ground feued had not been sold, and if what Brownlie and Watson had acquired from Ross's trustees had been both the superiority of the ground feued and the unfeued ground, I am inclined to think that the former would have been bound by the personal obligation to which I am referring, assuming that it was in the Harpers' power in a question with Ross to put such a restriction upon the unfeued ground. Because, in the case supposed, Brownlie and Watson would have become superiors of the ground feued, and there would have been privity both of contract and estate between them and the feuars. The superiority having been sold, however, there was no connection whatever between the ground feued, or the feuars, and Ross. There was no contract between them; and they were not interested in any common estate. In these circumstances, I do not think that the feuars could have any title to enforce the Harpers' personal obligation against Ross and his successors.

"It was argued that Ross's disponees were liable to implement the obligation, because Ross sold only under mandate from the Harpers, and therefore could not give any higher right than the latter could have given. That argument assumes that if the Harpers had sold the unfeued ground their

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—It was not beyond the powers of the Harpers, as in a question with Ross, the bondholder, to undertake the obligations in the pursuers' feu-contracts. The bond reserved power to feu, and this imported power to insert in the feu-contracts all reasonable and ordinary conditions which were not inconsistent with the express terms of the bond; and, if the conditions might validly be inserted as in a question with Ross, the fact that they were not made real burdens could not prejudice him. Further, a bondholder in selling the security subjects under his power of sale, was acting as the mandatary of the debtor, and the purchaser was therefore to be taken as if he had acquired the property from the debtor directly, and as liable in all the obligations which he would have incurred had he so acquired the property. But the Harpers being under the obligations in the pursuers' feu-contract could not have sold the property to Brownlie and Watson free of these obligations, thereby giving Brownlie and Watson a higher right in the subjects than they themselves possessed. If Brownlie and Watson in purchasing from the Harpers were in bona fide ignorance of these obligations, they had their remedy against the Harpers, either for damages for breach of con-disponee would have been liable in the obligation. I am not prepared to assent to that assumption. If the Harpers had sold the unfeued ground, I do not think that the purchaser would have been bound by a restriction not appearing in the titles, and resting only upon the personal obligation of the seller granted to a third party. In such a case it appears to me that the only remedy of the feuars would have been to claim damages from the Harpers for breach of contract. But, however that may be, I do not think that a purchaser from Ross under his power of sale could be affected by the obligation. The ground was disponed in security to Ross, and a power of sale conferred upon him, a year before the personal obligation was granted, and the argument involves that, without his knowledge and consent, the Harpers could, by giving a mere personal obligation, do what amounted to a partial recall of the mandate to sell, and a diminution of the value of the security. I am of that opinion, even upon the assumption that the Harpers were, in a question with Ross, entitled to impose the building restrictions on ground not actually feued. Assuming that the Harpers were entitled to do so, they could only have done so by inserting the restrictions in some deed (such as a disposition of the unfeued ground to themselves) placed upon record. But, if that had been done, it may well be that Ross would not have consented to discharge the feued ground of his security when the superiority was sold, and therefore it cannot be assumed that Ross's disponees would be in no worse position, if the personal obligation was held to be enforceable against them, than they would have been in if the restrictions had been validly imposed on the unfeued ground.

---

"Further, the fact (assuming it to be so) that the Harpers would have been entitled to make the building restrictions real burdens or servitudes upon the unfeued ground appears to me to be no reason for holding the purchaser bound by the personal obligation, because the feuars with whom the Harpers contracted were content with the personal obligation, and must be presumed to have known that it would not be enforceable against an onerous disponee in the event of the unfeued ground being sold.

"Then it was argued that the building restrictions, being of the nature of servitudes, were validly constituted burdens upon the unfeued ground by the contract entered into between the feuars and the Harpers, although they did not enter the record. It seems to me to be settled that only the known servitudes are effectual without entering the record, and conditions as to the character and use of houses, although familiar as building restrictions, are not among the proper servitudes known to the law. But it was argued that

No. 17.

Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

tract or for rescission of the contract. The allegation of the pursuers, however, was that Brownlie and Watson, when they made the purchase, were well aware of the conditions in the pursuers' feu-contracts; and their knowledge, assuming it to be proved, would have been a complete answer to any action at their instance against the Harpers for breach of contract. Even assuming that Brownlie and Watson, if they had purchased in ignorance of the restrictions in the pursuers' titles, would not have been bound by these restrictions, their knowledge of these restrictions made the state of their own titles immaterial.[1] But further, if the conditions had not been effectually constituted real burdens on the unfeued property, because they did not appear in the titles to that property, they were binding as servitudes duly constituted by the Harpers. A servitude altius non tollendi might be validly constituted, although it did not appear on the recorded titles of the servient tenement;[2] and it was no objection to the validity of such a servitude that the height forbidden was not expressly specified in the deed constituting the servitude,—the height might be a matter of inference from the terms of the deed.[3] Further, building restrictions of an ordinary character, which might the conditions in regard to the dwelling-houses, and in regard to the back-greens, included the known servitudes of altius non tollendi and non ædificandi, and to that extent were effectually constituted against the unfeued ground. It might be a nice question whether a building restriction which prescribed the position, character, architectural construction, and also, and separately, the height of houses to be erected, could be split up into its component parts, and the prohibition against building above a certain height alone regarded. But in this case the question does not, in my judgment, arise. I think that it is the case that, if the whole conditions of the building restrictions are read together, uniformity in the height of the houses is secured. Because, although it is not specified that the houses are not to be more than three square storeys in height, and although a storey is not a standard of height, yet, as the houses were to be built, and in all time maintained, according to the elevation shewn upon the plan prepared by Mr Stevenson, uniformity of height, as well as of appearance, necessarily followed. But that shews that there is no limitation on the height of the houses, unless the whole conditions imposed are taken into consideration. The limitation in height is merely an inference from, or result of, the conditions as a whole, and not a distinct and separate condition. Therefore a servitude altius non tollendi could not be imposed upon the unfeued ground, unless the whole conditions as to the houses were imposed upon that ground. But, as I have said, these conditions not being known servitudes could not be imposed upon the unfeued ground without entering the record.

---

"In regard to the back-greens, the restrictions are, that they are to remain unbuilt upon, except that offices, not exceeding in height 30 feet at the ridge of the roof, may be erected. These conditions are no doubt equivalent to the known servitudes of altius non tollendi and non ædificandi, but then the Harpers came under no obligation to impose these obligations upon the unfeued ground.

"I am therefore of opinion that the feu-contracts between the Harpers and Pearson had not the effect of imposing any servitude upon the unfeued ground.

"It was finally argued that Brownlie and Watson knew of the obligation

---

[1] Lang v. Dixon, June 29, 1813, F. C.; Petrie v. Forsyth, Dec. 16, 1874, 2 R. 215; Stoddart v. Dalzell, Dec. 16, 1876, 4 R. 236.

[2] Young v. Dewar, Nov. 17, 1814, F. C.

[3] Banks & Co. v. Walker, June 5, 1874, 1 R. 981.

No. 17.
Nov. 1, 1895.
Morier v. Brownlie & Watson.

reasonably be expected to exist in the particular case, were binding, on the same principles as regulated the known servitudes.[1]

The defenders Brownlie and Watson and Gibbon supported the judgment on the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After narrating the circumstances of the action) —It is important to keep in view the sequence of events beginning with the bond to Ross. That bond was granted when the Harpers were under no obligation except those contained in their own author Walker's disposition.

They then granted their bond to Ross, and thereafter gave out these feus to Pearson, taking themselves bound in the new conditions. If it were to be held that these conditions were binding upon Ross's disponees, that would be tantamount to holding that after the Harpers had granted their bond and disposition in security, they could by granting a personal obligation in favour of new feuars affect the value of Ross's security, giving him after their disposition to Pearson less to realise, in the event of circumstances occurring which would entitle him to exercise his power of sale. Could they, by a mere personal obligation given to their feuars, practically destroy in part the value of the security given to Ross, and affect the right of a purchaser from Ross under his power of sale? That question must be answered in the negative. It might be a question, as the Lord Ordinary points out, whether the Harpers had in a question with Ross the power, if they proceeded in proper form, to impose restrictions in favour of feuars upon the unfeued part of the lands. But assuming that they could do so by a deed entering the record,—which is, to say the least, very doubtful,—such a disclosed change of conditions might well have which the Harpers had undertaken in regard to the unfeued ground, and are therefore bound to implement that obligation. The cases founded upon in support of that proposition were Petrie, 2 R. 214, and Stodart, 4 R. 286. In the case of Petrie, the sale of land to a second purchaser was reduced upon the ground that he knew that a prior contract of sale had been previously concluded between the seller and a third party. In Stodart's case a similar judgment was pronounced, where a purchaser attempted to evict a person who had informally acquired a right of feu over part of the subjects purchased, the purchaser being in the knowledge that some right had been acquired over the subjects, and being thereby put upon his inquiry. It seems to me that the principle upon which these cases were decided has no application here. If, as I think was the case, the personal obligation did not affect lands, then knowledge on the part of the purchasers that such an obligation had been granted appears to me to be of no moment. Assuming that they knew of the obligation, they knew also that it did not affect the lands."

---

[1] Johnston v. MacRitchie, March 15, 1893, 20 R. 539, per Lord Young at p. 548.

[2] Authorities.—Heron v. Martin, July 18, 1893, 20 R. 1001, per Lord Low (Ordinary), at p. 1005; Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, May 23, 1837, 2 S. and M. 609; Campbell v. Clydesdale Banking Co., June 19, 1868, 6 Macph. 943, 40 Scot. Jur. 539; Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95; Johnston v. MacRitchie, March 15, 1893, 20 R. 539.

deterred Ross from granting the partial discharge which he did when the superiority was sold. It is therefore not just to assume, as the reclaimer asks us to do, that Ross's trustees could be in no worse position if the personal obligation were held enforceable against them, than if the restrictions in question had been validly imposed on the unfeued portion of the ground. But whatever might have been possible to the Harpers had they executed such a deed as is above supposed, the onerous disponee of the ground sold by the bondholder's trustees cannot be held subject to what was in reality only a personal obligation of the Harpers to their feuars, nothing in point of fact having been done towards imposing the restrictions on the unfeued ground so as to make them enforceable against the bondholder, even if that were possible.

As regards the plea maintained by the pursuers, that the restrictions fall into the class of known servitudes, it is difficult to see how it can be held that any limitation in height can be held to be imposed as a servitude, when such limitation is not applied otherwise than by deducing it from other conditions not constituting known servitudes, and which conditions could not therefore be imposed upon the unfeued ground unless they entered the record. That is the case here. For there is no other way of reaching a restriction as to height than by inferring it from certain prescribed conditions taken together. It is not a definite condition by itself. As regards the back-greens, while what is contained in the Harpers' deed to Pearson is of the character of servitude, the Harpers were not by their contract taken bound to impose any servitude, obligation, or restriction on future feuars in regard to these back-greens.

It only remains to notice the contention that the knowledge of the Harpers' undertaking to their feuars on the part of Brownlie and Watson is sufficient to bind them to implement the Harpers' obligation. It is a sufficient answer, as stated by the Lord Ordinary, that if the view be sound that the personal obligation undertaken by the Harpers did not affect the lands, then a knowledge of this inoperative undertaking could not make the undertaking effectual or binding on a bona fide purchaser from the bondholder, whose right was not affected by the condition.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in the result, and I am prepared to affirm the judgment on the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think that the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived might have been reached on other grounds, but the grounds stated by his Lordship seem to me sufficient for the decision of the case.

THE COURT adhered.

MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1895. North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers)).—Balfour—Cooper.

LANARKSHIRE AND DUMBARTONSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Dickson—Ure—Malcolm.

Arbitration—Reference of differences with respect to matters referred to in a section of private Act—Jurisdiction—Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. cci.), sec. 6.—By the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, sec. 6, subsec. (4), it was enacted that a railway company should carry their line under certain ground belonging to the North British Railway Company in tunnel, and that in the construction of the tunnel the company should not "without the previous consent of" the North British Company break open the surface of the ground.

By subsec. (7) it was enacted that bridges and works passing over or under lands belonging to the North British Company should be according to plans approved of by the engineer of that company.

By subsec. (10) it is enacted that "if any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade. . . ."

The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground belonging to the North British Company. The questions raised in the action were whether certain plans which had been submitted by the company to and approved of by the engineer of the North British Company disclosed the ventilating shaft, and if they did, whether the engineer's approval was equivalent to the consent required by subsec. (4), or otherwise barred the North British Company from challenging the shaft. The defenders pleaded the reference clause. The pursuers maintained that the questions did not constitute a difference in the sense of subsec. (10), in respect (1) that the erection of the shaft was altogether outwith the statutory powers of the defenders; and (2) that the questions were essentially questions of law. Held that a difference had arisen which fell to be referred in terms of subsec. (10).

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

IN 1891 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company were authorised by Act of Parliament, 54 and 55 Vict. cap. cci., to construct a line of railway from a point near the Queen's Dock, Glasgow, to Dumbarton. The line near its commencement at Glasgow passed in tunnel under the Stobcross Station or depôt, which belonged jointly to the North British Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company. In 1894 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company constructed a ventilating shaft from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground at the depôt where the ground was wholly dedicated to the use of the North British Railway Company.

On 22d February 1895 the North British Railway Company raised an action against the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company, concluding for decree ordaining them to close up the ventilating shaft, and to restore the surface of the ground to its former state.

The undernoted clauses of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, were referred to by the parties.*

* 54 and 55 Vict. cap. cci., sec. 6, enacts, subsec. (4),—"Railway No. 1

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1895. North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

The pursuers averred that the ventilating shaft had been constructed without their consent or permission, and against their remonstrances. They denied that it had been constructed with the knowledge and consent of their engineer.

The defenders stated:—In conformity with section 6, subsec. 7, of their Act, they submitted to Mr Carswell, the pursuers' engineer, a plan and section, which shewed that it was the intention of the defenders to construct the ventilating shaft objected to, and that a detailed specification was afterwards sent to him, shewing how the contractor intended to execute the work. No objection was made by Mr Carswell to any of the works included in the plans and specification. The work of constructing the ventilating shaft was proceeded with in the full knowledge of the pursuers' engineer, and under the supervision of the pursuers' inspectors.

In answer to this statement the pursuers averred that the plans submitted to their engineer did not disclose that the defenders were to construct the ventilating shaft on the pursuers' lands, and further, that their engineer had no authority to permit the defenders to make an opening in their ground.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defenders not having obtained the consent of the pursuers, in terms of section 6, subsection (4) of the defenders' Act of Parliament, the works complained of are illegal, and the defenders should be ordained to remove them, and to restore the ground in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders having constructed said ventilating shaft in the knowledge and with the consent of the pursuers, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (5) In any event, the pursuers' proper remedy was that afforded by section 6, subsection 10, of the defenders' said Act of Parliament, and the present action is excluded by said subsection.

On 11th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found "that the question between the parties falls to be determined by an arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade, in terms of section 6, subsection 10, of the defenders' Act; therefore sists process to enable either of the parties to make application to the Board of Trade for the appointment shall be carried under the North British Railway Company's Glasgow City and District Railway, and under the joint sidings and works of that company and the Caledonian Company at Stobcross in tunnel, and the company shall not, without the previous consent of the companies owning the same, in the construction of such tunnel, break open the surface of the ground."

---

Subsec. (7).—"All bridges and works which may be constructed by the company, so far as passing over or under, or in any manner interfering with any lines, works, or lands belonging to the North British Company, shall be of such design and materials as shall be approved of by the engineer for the time being of that company, and shall be constructed and completed under the superintendence, and to the reasonable satisfaction in all respects, of such engineer, and according to working plans, sections, and specifications to be submitted to and approved of by him previously to the commencement of the works affecting the property of the said company."

Subsec. (10).—"If any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company, or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade on the application of either of the said companies, at the cost of the company, and the decision of such engineer shall be final and conclusive."

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1895. North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers)).—Balfour—Cooper.

LANARKSHIRE AND DUMBARTONSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Dickson—Ure—Malcolm.

Arbitration—Reference of differences with respect to matters referred to in a section of private Act—Jurisdiction—Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. cci.), sec. 6.—By the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, sec. 6, subsec. (4), it was enacted that a railway company should carry their line under certain ground belonging to the North British Railway Company in tunnel, and that in the construction of the tunnel the company should not "without the previous consent of" the North British Company break open the surface of the ground.

By subsec. (7) it was enacted that bridges and works passing over or under lands belonging to the North British Company should be according to plans approved of by the engineer of that company.

By subsec. (10) it is enacted that "if any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade. . . ."

The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground belonging to the North British Company. The questions raised in the action were whether certain plans which had been submitted by the company to and approved of by the engineer of the North British Company disclosed the ventilating shaft, and if they did, whether the engineer's approval was equivalent to the consent required by subsec. (4), or otherwise barred the North British Company from challenging the shaft. The defenders pleaded the reference clause. The pursuers maintained that the questions did not constitute a difference in the sense of subsec. (10), in respect (1) that the erection of the shaft was altogether outwith the statutory powers of the defenders; and (2) that the questions were essentially questions of law. Held that a difference had arisen which fell to be referred in terms of subsec. (10).

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

IN 1891 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company were authorised by Act of Parliament, 54 and 55 Vict. cap. cci., to construct a line of railway from a point near the Queen's Dock, Glasgow, to Dumbarton. The line near its commencement at Glasgow passed in tunnel under the Stobcross Station or depôt, which belonged jointly to the North British Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company. In 1894 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company constructed a ventilating shaft from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground at the depôt where the ground was wholly dedicated to the use of the North British Railway Company.

On 22d February 1895 the North British Railway Company raised an action against the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company, concluding for decree ordaining them to close up the ventilating shaft, and to restore the surface of the ground to its former state.

The undernoted clauses of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, were referred to by the parties.*

* 54 and 55 Vict. cap. cci., sec. 6, enacts, subsec. (4),—"Railway No. 1

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1895. North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

The pursuers averred that the ventilating shaft had been constructed without their consent or permission, and against their remonstrances. They denied that it had been constructed with the knowledge and consent of their engineer.

The defenders stated:—In conformity with section 6, subsec. 7, of their Act, they submitted to Mr Carswell, the pursuers' engineer, a plan and section, which shewed that it was the intention of the defenders to construct the ventilating shaft objected to, and that a detailed specification was afterwards sent to him, shewing how the contractor intended to execute the work. No objection was made by Mr Carswell to any of the works included in the plans and specification. The work of constructing the ventilating shaft was proceeded with in the full knowledge of the pursuers' engineer, and under the supervision of the pursuers' inspectors.

In answer to this statement the pursuers averred that the plans submitted to their engineer did not disclose that the defenders were to construct the ventilating shaft on the pursuers' lands, and further, that their engineer had no authority to permit the defenders to make an opening in their ground.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defenders not having obtained the consent of the pursuers, in terms of section 6, subsection (4) of the defenders' Act of Parliament, the works complained of are illegal, and the defenders should be ordained to remove them, and to restore the ground in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders having constructed said ventilating shaft in the knowledge and with the consent of the pursuers, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (5) In any event, the pursuers' proper remedy was that afforded by section 6, subsection 10, of the defenders' said Act of Parliament, and the present action is excluded by said subsection.

On 11th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found "that the question between the parties falls to be determined by an arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade, in terms of section 6, subsection 10, of the defenders' Act; therefore sists process to enable either of the parties to make application to the Board of Trade for the appointment shall be carried under the North British Railway Company's Glasgow City and District Railway, and under the joint sidings and works of that company and the Caledonian Company at Stobcross in tunnel, and the company shall not, without the previous consent of the companies owning the same, in the construction of such tunnel, break open the surface of the ground."

---

Subsec. (7).—"All bridges and works which may be constructed by the company, so far as passing over or under, or in any manner interfering with any lines, works, or lands belonging to the North British Company, shall be of such design and materials as shall be approved of by the engineer for the time being of that company, and shall be constructed and completed under the superintendence, and to the reasonable satisfaction in all respects, of such engineer, and according to working plans, sections, and specifications to be submitted to and approved of by him previously to the commencement of the works affecting the property of the said company."

Subsec. (10).—"If any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company, or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade on the application of either of the said companies, at the cost of the company, and the decision of such engineer shall be final and conclusive."

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1895.
North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

of an arbiter, with a view to the cause being remitted to such arbiter upon his appointment."*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The reference clause did not apply. The operation complained of was really outwith the statute altogether, for the ventilating shaft, entailing as it did the permanent occupation of a part of the pursuers' lands, was not a work incidental to the construction of the railway. But in any view under subsection 4 of section 6 the pursuers' consent was required, and they had not

---

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether a certain ventilating shaft, constructed by the defenders in the roof of a tunnel on their railway where it passes under certain property of the pursuers, was constructed with the consent of the pursuers. If there was no consent, it seems to be conceded that the structure was illegal and must be removed. But the defenders maintain that the pursuers did consent to the work, and their consent is said to have been obtained in this way: That the plans of the tunnel, which required under the statute to be submitted to the pursuers' engineer, shewed the ventilating shaft in question as part of the proposed works, and that the engineer approved of this plan, including the proposed shaft. The pursuers, on their part, deny that the plan shewed a ventilating shaft, or any work of that description, and they further maintain that the engineer of their company had no authority to consent to the construction of the shaft, his authority being, as they say, limited to the approval or disapproval of the plan of the tunnel.

"In these circumstances there is plainly an issue of fact which has arisen between the parties, an issue, at all events, involving the construction of the plans of the tunnel which were submitted to the pursuers' engineer; and what I have to determine is whether the issue thus arising is one which falls to be remitted to an arbiter in terms of subsection 10 of section 6 of the defenders' Act. That subsection provides that 'if any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company, or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade on the application of either of the said companies.' The defenders contend that that arbitration clause applies, and that the action should be sisted to enable an application to be made to the Board of Trade, and should then be remitted to the arbiter to be appointed by that Board.

"I have come to the conclusion that there is no sufficient reason for denying to the language of the arbitration clause its prima facie and natural latitude. I think that the language of the clause is wide enough to cover any dispute which may arise under the section in question,—that is to say, any dispute with regard to the execution of the works in question which may arise between the parties. But even if it were to be held implied—as the pursuers maintain—that the matters to be referred to the engineer appointed by the Board of Trade were only matters of engineering, I am not prepared to say that that construction would exclude the remit which is asked in this case, because, as I have said, the one question—perhaps the main question—between the parties is as to the true reading of certain plans submitted by one engineer to another; and that seems a matter peculiarly appropriate for the determination of an engineer. I propose, therefore, not to dismiss the action, because a clause of that kind does not oust the jurisdiction of the Court, but to find that the question between the parties falls to be determined by the arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade, in terms of section 6, subsection 10, of the defenders' Act, and therefore to sist process to enable either of the parties to make application to the Board of Trade for the appointment of such arbiter, with a view to the case being remitted to such arbiter upon his appointment."

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1895. North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

given it. The defenders said that they had, by their engineer, who had approved of certain plans. But the engineer had no authority to bind the pursuers, and besides, his approval of the plans—even if they shewed the shaft as a permanent structure, which was also disputed—could not be held equivalent to the consent required by the statute. Now, these differences raised questions of the meaning of subsections 4 and 7, and of simple fact, but not questions of engineering skill. The statutory reference, however, was to an engineer, and was clearly intended to cover only technical matters arising during the construction of the railway. The jurisdiction of the Court, therefore, was not excluded.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuers were barred under subsection 7 from now objecting to the shaft, because the plans which shewed it had been approved by their engineer, and further, his approval was tantamount to the consent required by subsection 4. These propositions were disputed by the pursuers, and a difference had thus arisen. But the words of the reference clause were very general, and amply covered the dispute.[1] The onus lay on the pursuers to shew that some good reason existed why the dispute should not be referred to arbitration,[2] and they had failed to do so.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in dispute, as the Lord Ordinary says in the first sentence of his opinion, is whether this ventilating shaft was constructed with the consent of the pursuers. Although, however, this is the ultimate question, the dispute, as it was explained to us, involves more than a question of fact or of engineering, and indeed depends largely on the construction and relation of the 4th and 7th subsections of the 6th section of the defenders' statute.

On the one hand, it is said for the defenders that they having presented to the pursuers' engineer plans shewing a ventilating shaft he approved of it, and that this having been done under subsection 7, the pursuers cannot challenge the shaft. The defenders say also that the engineer's approval may also be held to be the consent of the company under subsection 4, and thus to legalise the shaft.

On the other hand, the pursuers say that even assuming (which they did not unreservedly do) that a ventilating shaft may be treated as a work incidental to the railway, yet that, inasmuch as it necessarily involves breaking open the surface of the ground, the previous consent of the company was necessary under subsection 4 to its construction at this place; that the engineer had no authority, express or implied, to grant such consent; and that his approval of the plans cannot supply the want of the company's antecedent consent. The question is also complicated by the defenders not having served notices to take the land on which the shaft is constructed.

This, or something like this, is the controversy; and if it contains the [1] Magistrates of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co., June 17, 1892, 19 R. 874; Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. Highland Railway Co., 1871, 9 S. L. R. 92; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Co., March 30, 1874, 1 R. (H. L.) 8.

[2] Hodgson v. Railway Passengers Assurance Co., 1882, L. R., 9 Q. B. D., 188.

No. 18.
Nov. 5, 1895.
North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

elements of fact and engineering skill, it is, or may prove ultimately to be mainly a question of law.

Not the less, however, do I hold that the dispute is a difference or differences with respect to some of the matters referred to in section 6, and therefore must be determined in manner provided in subsection 10. I see no warrant for limiting the very wide terms of the clause to matters in which an engineer is a peculiarly well qualified arbiter by reason of his professional skill. The statute has drawn no such distinction.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 19.
Nov. 6, 1895.
Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees.

JOHN GILLESPIE MURRAY (Downie's Curator Bonis) AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—C. K. Mackenzie—Constable.
GEORGE LAWRIE AND OTHERS (Mrs Macfarlane's Trustees—Patterson Trust), Defenders.—C. J. Guthrie—James Reid.
PETER FAIR HUSBAND (Mrs Macfarlane's Trustee—Cook Trust), Defenders.—W. Campbell—Crole.
MRS MARGARET DEWAR OR MILLER, Defender.
WILLIAM DONALDSON HUSBAND AND OTHERS (Mrs Macfarlane's Testamentary Trustees), Defenders.

Expenses—Separate defences—Objection to Auditor's report.—Observed by the Lord President that, where successful defenders have appeared separately, the appropriate time for determining whether they are entitled to the expense of separate defences is when the motion for expenses is made.

1ST DIVISION.

(REPORTED ante, July 17, 1895, vol. xxii., p. 927.)

In this case the Court, on 9th July 1895 (22 R. 940), dismissed the first and second declaratory conclusions of the summons in so far as directed against the defenders the trustees under the Patterson Trust, the trustees under the Cook Trust, and Mrs Miller, assoilzied them from the remaining conclusions of the summons, and found them entitled to expenses. The trustees under the Patterson and Cook Trusts who had conducted their defences separately lodged separate accounts of expenses. At the audit the pursuers' agents contended that these defenders ought to have had only one account, as their interests were identical, but the Auditor did not give effect to this contention in taxing the accounts, holding "that the matter is one for the Court to deal with, and they having awarded expenses to all the defenders without any qualification, he feels that he has no power to restrict them to the effect contended for."

The pursuers objected to the Auditor's reports on the ground that he should only have allowed these defenders the expense of a joint defence.

Argued, inter alia, for the pursuers;—The present was an appropriate stage for raising the question whether the expense of separate defences should be allowed.[1]

Argued, inter alia, for the defenders;—The objection came too late.

[1] Cameron v. French, Oct. 26, 1893, 1 Scots Law Times, 259.

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1895.
Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees.

Lord Young's dicta in Cameron's case did not represent the practice of the profession. The regular practice, which was certainly the most convenient, was that an objection of this character should be taken when the finding as to expenses was pronounced.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think both sets of expenses should be allowed.

I may add that I think this discussion very forcibly illustrates the convenience of the practice of determining this question when the finding as to expenses is made, because at this stage the whole subject requires to be rediscussed and brought back to the mind of the Court, but when the case is fresh in our minds the discussion is necessarily of a more simple character.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT repelled the objection, and approved of the Auditor's reports.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—W. B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1895.
Glasgow District Subway Co. v. Albin & Son.

THE GLASGOW DISTRICT SUBWAY COMPANY, Complainers (Respondents).—D. Dundas—W. Thomson.
T. ALBIN & SON, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Salvesen—A. M. Anderson.
CHARLES YULE AND ANOTHER, Defenders.

Railway—Construction of railway—Compensation—Yearly tenant—Procedure—Arbitration—Sheriff—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 6—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 114.—A claim by a yearly tenant against a railway company for compensation under sec. 6 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, falls to be determined by the Sheriff under sec. 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845—and not by arbitration—whether the claim is on account of lands injuriously affected or is on account of lands taken.

Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr, 17 D. 312, followed.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

BY the Glasgow District Subway Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. clxii.), the Glasgow District Subway Company was incorporated, and was empowered to construct a subway below certain streets in Glasgow.

On 30th January 1895, T. Albin & Son, hairdressers, lessees and occupants of the premises, 1½ West Milton Street, Glasgow, served the Subway Company with a deed of nomination of an arbiter under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (which was incorporated with the company's special Act), for the purpose of determining a claim by them against the company for compensation "for loss and damage to our stock and effects, business premises, and loss of and interference with the access to the said premises caused through the construction of the subway and the operations of the company." The claim was based on the 6th section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,* which was incorporated with the special Act.

[1] Duncan v. Salmond, March 17, 1874, 1 R. 839.

* The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), section 6, enacts,—"In exercising the power given to the

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1895. Glasgow District Subway Co. v. Albin & Son.

The company having also nominated an arbiter, but under protest, brought a note of suspension and interdict against Albin & Son and the arbiters to have the proceedings in the arbitration interdicted, and a record was made up.

The company maintained that interdict ought to be granted, inter alia, on the ground that Albin & Son's claim to compensation fell to be determined by procedure before the Sheriff under section 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,* and not by arbitration, in respect that Albin & Son were yearly tenants of their premises.

Albin & Son admitted that they were yearly tenants, but averred (and the company admitted) that no land was taken, and maintained that section 114 of the Lands Clauses Act did not apply to cases in which compensation for injurious affection only was claimed, and no land in possession of the tenant taken.

On 9th August 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced an interlocutor, inter alia, granting interdict as craved.†

---

company by the special Act to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act, and in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise as regards such lands of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company, and except where otherwise provided by this or the special Act, the amount of such compensation shall be ascertained and determined in the manner provided by the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for determining questions of compensation with regard to lands purchased or taken under the provisions thereof; and all the provisions of the said last mentioned Act shall be applicable to determine the amount of any such compensation, and to enforcing the payment or other satisfaction thereof."

* The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19), section 114, enacts, with respect to lands subject to leases, that "if any such lands shall be in possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as tenant for a year or from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein, he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands, and for any just allowance which ought to be made to him by any incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury he may sustain, or if part only of such lands be required, compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy by the severing of the lands held by him, or otherwise injuriously affecting the same; and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by the Sheriff in case the parties differ about the same; and upon payment or tender of the amount of such compensation, all such persons shall respectively deliver up to the promoters of the undertaking, or to the person appointed by them to take possession thereof, any such lands in their possession required for the purposes of the special Act."

† "OPINION.— . . . The complainers . . . maintained that . . . the respondents . . . could, as yearly tenants, only proceed before the Sheriff under the 114th section of the Lands Clauses Act. I am of opinion that I am bound to sustain that argument. The precise point was decided in the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr, January 27, 1855, 17 D. 312. No Scottish case was quoted on the

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1895.

Glasgow District Subway Co. v. Albin & Son.

Albin & Son reclaimed, and argued;—Section 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, applied only where land was taken by the company from the tenant. The words of the section were, if such person should be "required to give up possession of any lands" he should be entitled to compensation. The case of Barr,[1] which was admittedly adverse to that construction, was wrongly decided, and was inconsistent with subsequent English decisions upon the practically identical terms of the English Act.[2] Barr's case therefore ought not to be followed.

Argued for the company;—If the terms of the 114th section were regarded by themselves merely, the construction maintained on the other side was perhaps the sound one; but the difficulty arose in consequence of the importation of a section of an Act which dealt only with the taking of lands into a provision in another Act dealing with compensation for the injurious affection of lands. That difficulty did not occur in the English cases cited on the other side, for in them the Courts had to construe a single Act only, consequently the English cases were not in point. In Barr's case the Court had put a reasonable construction on the 114th section of the Lands Clauses Act regarded as part of the Railway Clauses Act, by holding that the 114th section was not limited to cases in which land was actually taken. Barr's case, therefore, was well decided. At all events it was a deliberate decision pronounced forty years ago upon the very question now in dispute, and must be held to have settled that question in so far as the Courts in Scotland were concerned.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It was admitted at the bar that this question had been decided in the Court of Session by the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr,[1] and the respondents in the suspension endeavour to get over that case by quoting to us several English cases which turn, not upon the same Acts of Parliament, nor upon the same words as those upon which the present case turns. Still it is argued that these English cases are so exactly analogous that we should disregard the case of Barr[1] and give effect to these cases by holding that—as it has been decided in England that such a case as this cannot competently be brought before two Justices—that being the corresponding tribunal—but must be brought before an arbiter under the arbitration section of the Act—we should, following other side. It appears, however, that the decisions in England have been different. The difference is noticed in Deas on Railways, p. 161, et seq. In the cases referred to by him it was held that the 121st section of the English Act, which corresponds to the 114th section of the Scottish Act, applied only when land was taken. I consider, however, that I am bound to follow the decision in our own Courts. It may be that in the Inner-House the decision in The Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr might be reconsidered with reference to the English cases. But it must, in the meantime, be followed in the Outer-House."

---

[1] Caledonian Railway Co. v. Barr, Jan. 27, 1855, 17 D. 312, 27 Scot. Jur. 312.

[2] Queen v. Sheriff of Middlesex, 1862, 31 L. J., Q. B. 261; Queen v. Stone, 1866, L. R., 1 Q. B. 529; Brand v. Hammersmith Railway Co., L. R., 4 Eng. and Ir. App. 171, per Lord Colonsay, p. 209.

No. 20.

Nov. 6, 1895. Glasgow District Subway Co. v. Albin & Son.

these cases and disregarding the case of Barr,[1] hold that the present application for arbitration is competent.

I am not prepared to disregard the case of Barr.[1] Whether that case can be differentiated from those cases in England, I do not say. There may be considerable ground for saying that it might; but when there is a distinct and clear decision in this Court that decision in my opinion is binding upon us, and we are not entitled to set aside by our judgment a case that has been deliberately decided in this Court.

LORD ADAM.—It is not disputed that if the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr[1] has been properly decided, procedure to have this claim of alleged damage submitted to arbitration is incompetent. I am of opinion that we must follow the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr.[1] I am not disposed to express any opinion as to the soundness of that decision.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The respondents in the suspension are admittedly yearly tenants of the premises in question, and their claim, so far as it is before us, is a claim for injury to their business premises, and to their stock and effects therein.

Now, in these circumstances, the first question that arises is, Is a yearly tenant making such a claim entitled to have that claim submitted to arbitration, or must he submit it, in terms of the 114th section, to the Sheriff? I think that question is not open. I think it is concluded, so far as we are concerned, by the decision in The Caledonian Railway Company v. Barr.[1] I express no opinion as to the soundness of that decision, but as it is a decision pronounced many years ago, and has no doubt been acted upon in Scotland since, I think we are bound to follow it.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK were absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor (which dealt with questions as to the relevancy of Albin & Son's claim to compensation, as to which no opinion was expressed in the Inner-House), and interdicted, prohibited, and discharged, in terms of the prayer of the note.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—JOHN VEITCH, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 21.

Nov. 7, 1895. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

W. & R. GRAHAM & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Lees—Aitken.
RAEBURN & VEREL, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Graham Stewart.
JAMES BAIN AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Johnston—Graham Stewart.
THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders (Respondents).—W. Campbell.
THE STEAMSHIP "BONNINGTON" COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders.—Johnston—Graham Stewart.

Right in Security—Loan—Agreement for repayments out of profits—Specific appropriation—Breach of trust.—A offered to advance to a shipping company £15,000 on a mortgage over a steam vessel, "on condition that all profits earned by the steamer to be paid to us towards reducing the [1] 17 D. 312.

No. 21.

Nov. 7, 1895.

Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

loan till the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000." The managing committee of the company agreed to accept the offer, subject to the modification "that instead of all the profits being paid to A till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then." A agreed to the modification, and the arrangement was approved by the company. Subsequently the advance was made, and the mortgage granted. The company went into liquidation.

Held that the agreement imported merely a personal obligation by the company to pay to A £2000 per annum from profits, and that A had no preference over the profits.

1st Division Lord Low.

W. & R. GRAHAM & COMPANY, merchants in Glasgow, raised an action against (1) Raeburn & Verel, shipowners, Glasgow; (2) the Bank of Scotland; (3) James Bain, assistant manager of the Bank of Scotland, and three other gentlemen who were the managing committee of the Steamship "Bonnington" Company, Limited; and (4) the "Bonnington" company.

The first conclusion of the summons was for payment to the pursuers by the defenders "jointly and severally or severally, or in such proportions as shall be ascertained in the course of the process," of the sum of £3181, 3s. 7d.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 1) "The defenders, The Steamship 'Bonnington' Company, Limited, are the owners of the steamship 'Bonnington' of Glasgow, of which the other defenders Messrs Raeburn & Verel are the managers. The defenders James Bain" and others, "were a committee of the shareholders of said Steamship 'Bonnington' Company, appointed to represent the interests of the shareholders of said company with reference to the loan transactions after mentioned," and under special resolutions of the company "exercised all the powers of directors of a limited company, and they managed and controlled the financial arrangements of the company, Messrs Raeburn & Verel, as managers, taking their instructions from said committee in the disposal of the funds or profits passing through their hands. The Bank of Scotland were represented by the said James Bain on the said committee, as being largely interested in the said company, and particularly as creditors of the same, or of the steamship 'Bonnington.' In their character as the leading creditors of the steamship company, the said James Bain was their agent and nominee, deputed by them to protect their interests." (Cond. 2) "On or about 17th July 1889 the pursuers offered, at the request of the defenders Messrs Raeburn & Verel, who acted on behalf of the Steamship 'Bonnington' Company, and the said committee of said company, to lend to the said company the sum of £15,000 in cash on the following conditions, as expressed in a letter from the pursuers to said Raeburn & Verel:—'(1) The "Bonnington" s.s. to be mortgaged by the said company to us as security therefor. . . . (5) All profits earned by the steamer to be paid to us towards reducing the said loan till the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000. (6) After the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000 the company shall, if possible, repay to us at least £1500 per annum till the amount on loan shall have been all repaid. . . .' The said offer was accepted on or about 22d July 1889 by letter signed by the defenders Raeburn & Verel on behalf of the Steamship 'Bonnington' Company, Limited, and, as stated in said letter, on the express authority of the other defenders who formed the committee of the company, subject to the following modifications:—That instead of all the profits being paid to

No. 21.
Nov. 7, 1895.
Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

the pursuers till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then, and £1500 thereafter, as per the sixth condition above mentioned. The pursuers agreed to this modification, and the transaction was arranged on that footing. . . ."

The pursuers further averred;—The steamer was duly mortgaged to them, and the £15,000 advanced by them in August 1889. No payment was made to them out of the profits of the steamer until January 1891. The company then paid £500, and that was the only sum received on account of principal. The interest on the loan continued to be paid until February 1892. The pursuers for the first time saw the accounts of the steamship company in August 1893, "and they then learned that the defenders, in breach of their agreement with the pursuers, and in breach of their duty to the pursuers, had paid the earnings or profits of the steamer—which were specially appropriated to the pursuers—to other parties. The total sum so paid away to the pursuers' prejudice amounts to £3181, 3s. 7d.," the sum first concluded for. James Bain, who was the assistant manager of the Bank of Scotland, was the representative of the bank on the committee, and was attending to its interests, and of the profits paid away to creditors the sum of £1783 was paid to the bank by the committee "in breach of said arrangement, which it was said defenders' duty to carry out. On the pursuers ascertaining the manner in which the profits of the steamer were being dealt with they entered into possession of the steamer under their mortgage."

The steamship company went into liquidation on 8th November 1894.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having wrongfully, and in breach of their duty to the pursuers, paid away to third parties the profits of the said vessel specially appropriated to the pursuers under the foresaid arrangement, the pursuers are entitled to decree for the amount thereof, being the sum first concluded for. (2) Separatim, The defenders who received the sums specifically appropriated to the pursuers as aforesaid, in the knowledge that they had been so appropriated, are bound to replace the amounts severally received by them.

The defenders severally pleaded;—(2) That the pursuers' averments were irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 14th June 1895, the Lord Ordinary (Low), inter alia, sustained the second plea in law for each of the defenders, and dismissed the action so far as regarded the first conclusion of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The action, I take it, is mainly directly against the defenders other than the 'Bonnington' Company, because there is no dispute as to the debt due by the company to the pursuers, or as to the validity of the mortgage over the ship. The claim against the other defenders is based upon the allegation that the earnings or profits of the steamer, to the extent of £2000 a year, were specially appropriated to the pursuers, and that Raeburn & Verel and the committee acted in breach of their duty to the pursuers in paying other creditors out of profits which should have been paid to the pursuers, and are thus personally liable for the amount so paid away. The case against the bank is that their assistant manager, Mr Bain, was on the committee, that he was the agent and nominee of the bank, and that in their interests he obtained payment of their debt in breach of his

No. 21.

Nov. 7, 1895.
Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The effect of the contract was that the profits were to the extent of £2000 each year specially appropriated to the payment of the pursuers' loan, and as soon as the profits came into the hands of Raeburn & Verel and the committee, these defenders held them as trustees for the pursuers.[1] They committed a breach of trust therefore in applying them to the payment of the debts of other creditors. The representative and agent of the bank—Mr Bain—was a party to the agreement, and he was acting in fraudem of the pursuers' right in applying the profits in liquidation of the bank's debt. The bank were not entitled to take advantage of their own agent's breach of duty, and were liable therefore to repay the money received by them.[2]

Argued for Raeburn & Verel and the Committee;—The action was irrelevant. There could be no breach of trust quoad the profits, unless these were specifically appropriated. There was nothing on record, however, to infer even an obligation to appropriate, much less to instruct an actual appropriation. There was no averment that in fact the profits had been set aside to be retained for the pursuers, and that was essential to appropriation.[3] duty to the pursuers. The bank is therefore asked to repay to the pursuers the money which it received.

---

"The contract, according to pursuers' construction, was that the company should pay the profits to them to the amount of £2000 a year until the mortgage was reduced to £10,000. I think that it is at all events doubtful whether that is the true construction of the contract. The letters by which the contract was made are not in process, and I am dealing only with the pursuers' averments. But upon their own statement, I am inclined to think that the fifth condition in Raeburn & Verel's letter was altogether departed from, and that the modification proposed by the company and agreed to was, that instead of the profits being paid to the pursuers, the company should pay to them £2000 a year until the debt was reduced to £10,000, and £1500 a year thereafter. But assuming that the contract was that the profits should be paid to the pursuers to the extent of £2000 a year until the debt was reduced to £10,000, I am of opinion that the pursuers have not stated a relevant case.

"The pursuers' argument, as I understand it, is that the contract (as construed by them) involved a 'special appropriation' of the profits as they were earned in each year to the amount of £2000 to payment of their debt; that the shareholders, in approving of the action of the committee, authorised and directed the committee and Raeburn & Verel to hold the profits for and pay them to the pursuers to the extent of £2000; that the pursuers thereby acquired a jus quæsitum entitling them to demand that Raeburn & Verel and the committee should account to them for all the profits earned; and it is no defence to the claim that the money was paid to other creditors of the company.

"Now, if an agent receives money from his principal to pay a particular debt of the latter, and applies it to a different purpose, it may well be that the creditor would have a direct action against the agent, especially if the principal had become bankrupt.—(Stewart v. Bisset, M. App. Compensation, No. 2.)

"But I do not think that a case of that description is averred here. It

---

[1] Gas-Light Improvement Co. v. Terrell, 1870, L. R., 10 Eq. 168, M. R. (Lord Romilly) at p. 175; Willmott v. London Celluloid Co., 1886, L. R., 34 Ch. Div. 147.

[2] Taylor v. Forbes & Co., Dec. 14, 1830, 4 W. and S. 449.

[3] Baird v. Murray's Creditors, 1744, M. 7757.

No. 21.

Nov. 7, 1895. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

Argued for the Bank of Scotland;—There was nothing on record to infer that the profits in question were the property of the pursuers, and as such held in trust for them; unless, however, that was the fact the bank were not disabled from taking payment of the debt due to them by the company, merely because their assistant manager was one of the company's committee who had entered into the agreement with the pursuers.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—Under this reclaiming note we are only concerned with the first conclusion of the action, which is for payment of the sum of £3181, 3s. 7d. with interest. The Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action quoad that conclusion, being of opinion that the facts as stated do not disclose a relevant ground of liability against any of the defenders.

The pursuers, in the year 1889, agreed to lend the sum of £15,000 to the Steamship "Bonnington" Company on mortgage. In their letter agreeing to advance this sum the pursuers made certain conditions, and amongst others it was proposed (5) that all profits earned by the steamer should be paid to the pursuers towards reducing the loan until the loan should be reduced to £10,000; and (6) thereafter that the company should repay the loan by annual instalments of £1500 until the amount on loan was not part of the contract that the profits should be set aside or earmarked for the pursuers in any way, and as matter of fact that was not done. There was only, at most, an obligation on the part of the company to pay the pursuers £2000 a year out of the profits. It therefore seems to me to be impossible to hold that the profits as they accrued became the property of the pursuers. But if they were not the property of the pursuers—if the pursuers had not the jus in re—I think that their case fails. Take for example the case against the bank. The bank have done no more than obtain payment from their debtor of a debt which was due to them. I therefore do not understand how the bank can be asked to repay the money to the pursuers, unless it belonged to them before it was paid to the bank. Again, upon what ground is the claim against Raeburn & Verel and the committee rested? It cannot be rested upon contract, because there was no contract between the pursuers and these parties. Nor is it a claim of damages. There is no statement of a claim of damages in the record. The claim is obviously rested entirely upon what the pursuers call 'special appropriation' of the profits. That is a familiar expression in connection with payments of money, but I am not sure what it means in a case of this sort. If it merely means that the company were under obligation to pay the pursuers £2000 out of the profits, that will not entitle the pursuers to sue parties with whom they did not contract. If it means that the money was set apart and held as a specific sum, for the pursuers, then upon their own shewing no such thing was ever done.

---

"It seems to me that notwithstanding the contract with the pursuers, the profits remain the property of the company, the pursuers being only the creditors in the personal obligation of the company. I think therefore that a creditor of the company could have used arrestments—for example, of freight—in the hands of Raeburn and Verel; and, if the profits had been extant, I think that the other personal creditors of the company in the liquidation would have been entitled to participate in them. But if that is so, the claim of the pursuers for £3181 necessarily fails, because that claim is entirely based upon the supposition that that sum belonged to the pursuers and did not belong to the company.

"I am therefore of opinion that the action must be dismissed as regards all the defenders, so far as the first conclusion is concerned."

No. 21.

Nov. 7, 1895.
Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

should be all repaid. The condescendence then proceeds (art. 2),—"The said offer was accepted on or about 22d July 1889 by letter signed by the defenders Raeburn and Verel on behalf of the Steamship 'Bonnington' Company, Limited, and as stated in said letter, on the express authority of the other defenders, who formed the committee of the company, subject to the following modifications:—That instead of all the profits being paid to the pursuers till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then, and £1500 thereafter as per the 6th condition above mentioned." It is added,—"The pursuers agreed to this modification, and the transaction was arranged on that footing."

The Steamship Company did not perform their obligation to pay £2000 a year in reduction of the debt. The only payment made in repayment of principal was a sum of £500 paid in 1891. The company is now in liquidation. It is averred that during the years 1890, 1891, and 1894 the Steamship Company earned profits amounting to £3181, and that such profits were paid to certain prior but unsecured creditors, including a sum of £1783 paid to the Bank of Scotland.

The action is directed against (1) the Bank of Scotland; (2) James Bain, assistant manager of that bank, and three other gentlemen who were a committee of the shareholders of the company; and (3) the company; and it concludes for payment of the sum of £3181, being the profits alleged to have been earned.

As regards the defendant company, it is not disputed that its estate is responsible, not only for the sum claimed, but for the entire mortgage debt of £15,000, less £500 paid to account, but I agree with the Lord Ordinary that a petitory action is not the proper way of establishing the liability of the company. The right of the pursuers is to enforce their mortgage by bringing the ship to a sale, and if necessary to make a claim in the liquidation for the deficit, if any. But as the theory of the pursuers' case is that they have a preferential claim to the profits earned by the ship subsequent to the agreement, it may be proper to consider this claim more narrowly. If the pursuers have a preference, it must be of the nature of a voluntary security, because they do not say that they have a preference by the use of diligence. Now, it is conceded that they are creditors under the obligation of the defendant company to pay instalments of the debt out of profits. But it is perfectly clear that a mere pecuniary obligation is not a security, and that it does not become one by reason of a fund being designated out of which payments shall be made. The question is not whether the company acted honestly in paying away their profits to other creditors, but whether the pursuers have a preferable claim in competition with other creditors who have not been paid. I think that according to elementary principles in the law of debtor and creditor, an obligation to pay out of profits is in legal effect no more than an obligation to pay, and that it only entitles the creditor to a dividend in the liquidation.

The claim against the Bank of Scotland is founded on the fact that the bank's assistant manager was a member of the committee of the steamship company at the time when payments were made to the bank out of profits. In my opinion the Bank of Scotland was entitled to take payment from its debtor out of any unsecured fund in the debtor's hands, and the bank

No. 21.
Nov. 7, 1895.
Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel.

would not be the less entitled to accept such payments if its officers knew that their debtor had promised to another creditor to make the fund available to him. It is not a case of trust, because the freights were the property of the steamship company. Then the fact that Mr Bain was a member of the committee of management is, in my judgment, altogether irrelevant, because the payment to the Bank of Scotland was the act of the company, and in general the validity of a corporate act cannot depend on the relation which its members may sustain towards any other contracting party. Such relation could only be material if the act complained of amounted to a fraud or a breach of trust.

There remains for consideration the claim against the individuals who constituted the committee of management of the defendant company. As I read the record this claim is not founded on contract but on breach of duty on the part of these gentlemen. It is plain enough that the contract founded on was with the limited company, and the members of the committee were only responsible as shareholders for its fulfilment,—that is, to the extent of their subscriptions to the company's capital. But apart from contract the individual defenders owed no duty to the pursuers; it is not said that they came under any guarantee on behalf of the company, or that they gave their personal assurance that the company would fulfil its obligations. I assume that they were the instruments or agents of the company in the commission of a breach of contract, but I fail to see how a matter which is no more than a breach of contract in a question with the principal, can change its nature and become a breach of duty in a question with the company's agents.

It is unnecessary that I should elaborate this view, because I concur entirely in the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary on the question of individual responsibility, and in his Lordship's observations on the fallacy involved in the use of the expression "special appropriation" as applied to an obligation to make payments out of profits. I am of opinion that the reclaiming note should be refused.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 22.
Nov. 7, 1895.
Campbell v. Barber.

MRS ELLEN GARDEN CAMPBELL, Petitioner (Appellant).—Balfour—Watt.

MRS LAURA AGNES BARBER AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Salvesen—T. B. Morison.

Executor—Executor-nominate—Confirmation—Danger to estate—Judicial Factor.—Circumstances in which the Court dismissed a petition for confirmation presented by the widow and executrix-nominate of a person deceased and appointed a judicial factor on the estate, in respect that prima facie there was risk of injury to the estate if the administration were left in the hands of the petitioner.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen.

FRANCIS W. GARDEN CAMPBELL, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Troup, in the county of Banff, died on the 10th May 1895. He was twice married. His first wife died on 6th August 1893. He was married to his second wife on 23d July 1894. There was no issue of either marriage. Mr Garden Campbell left a disposition and settlement dated 23d July 1894, by which he conveyed to his wife, Mrs Ellen Thorne or Garden Campbell, his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, under burden of his debts and certain legacies to servants. He also appointed his widow to be his sole executrix.

No. 22.

Nov. 7, 1895.
Campbell v. Barber.

On 10th September 1895 Mrs Garden Campbell presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen for confirmation as executrix-nominate of her deceased husband.

The petition was opposed by Mrs Laura A. Barber and her husband.

The respondents stated that in 1870 the deceased Mr Campbell had adopted Mrs Barber as his daughter, she being a niece of his first wife, and then unmarried, and that on the death of his first wife he had executed a deed of settlement by which he left everything which he might die possessed of to Mrs Barber.

The respondents further stated that the late Mr Garden Campbell had for the last ten years of his life been a man of very intemperate habits, that he had met his second wife about the month of February 1894, that he went through the ceremony of marriage with her on the 23d July 1894, which was the day on which the deed in question was executed, and that for days before the ceremony his condition, both mentally and physically, had become such that he was totally unfit to give directions as to the preparation of any deeds.

"The pretended deed of settlement and other documents are not the deeds of the deceased, he being weak, facile, childish, easily imposed upon, and mentally unfit to give directions as to same, or even to understand their purport, but were impetrated from him by the said Ellen Thorne, who had a dominating and undue influence over him."

The petitioner denied the respondents' material averments.

On 13th September 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) sisted the application till the 13th October. On appeal the Sheriff (Crawford), on 5th October 1895, refused the appeal, and further sisted the application till the 13th March 1896. The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session.

On 29th October 1895 the Court allowed the respondents to amend their statements, and the petitioner to answer the amendment.

The respondents lodged a minute of amendment, which contained, inter alia, the following averments:—"At the date of his death Mr Garden Campbell was possessed of a large amount of jewellery . . . The value of this collection was about £2000. Further, the deceased, shortly before his marriage to the appellant, purchased from a London firm of jewellers additional jewellery to the value of over £1000. . . . None of the said jewels are entered in the inventory, the only jewellery returned being the deceased's watch and chain, valued therein at £10. The objector has ascertained and avers that all these jewels have been removed by the petitioner from Troup to her present residence in London. . . . . The petitioner has also dispenished the mansion-house at Tore of Troup of the greater part of the furniture, the whole of the silver-plate and family pictures, and removed them to London. The plate, which comprised a large amount of solid silver, has only been entered at nominal values in the inventory. . . . In these circumstances the objector considers that a judicial factor should be at once appointed to take charge of the estate pending the decision of the action of reduction, and she is prepared at once to present a petition if the Court should consider it necessary to have such an appointment made."

No. 22.
Nov. 7, 1895.
Campbell v. Barber.

The appellant answered,—"It is admitted that prior to his marriage the deceased purchased some jewellery in London, and obtained an advance from his bankers to enable him to pay for it. He presented it to the pursuer in the spring of 1894. Further admitted that after her husband's death, but before the pursuer was aware of any opposition on the part of the respondent, she removed to London the silver-plate, some pictures and curios, and a few articles of furniture of little value. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that after her husband's death, in the ordinary course of administration, the pursuer employed Messrs John Taylor & Son, licensed appraisers, 110 Princes Street, Edinburgh, to inventory and value all the furniture and other effects belonging to the deceased at Troup. The inventory and valuation is complete, and includes the silver-plate, which was weighed by a silversmith, and all the effects at Troup, including the small portion removed therefrom as above stated. On or about 20th June 1895 the silver-plate, some pictures and curios, and a few articles of furniture of little value, were carefully removed to London under the charge of Messrs John Taylor & Son. This was done for safe custody and in order to obtain a better sale, if it became necessary to dispose of them. . . . The pursuer has disposed of nothing belonging to the deceased, save some dogs. None of the effects have been in any way injured. . . . After his first wife's death he gave some of her jewellery as presents to friends and the rest he gave to the pursuer. . . ."

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant had by the will a title to administer independently of confirmation. The latter was only necessary to enable debtors to pay in safety. Very strong grounds must be established for refusing confirmation to an executor-nominate, and for appointing a judicial factor. There were none such here. The fact that a reduction of the will was being brought was not a sufficient ground.[1] Quoad ultra the allegations were irrelevant. It was not suggested that the appellant was impecunious, or that there was serious risk of the estate being injured or destroyed.

Argued for the respondents;—There was a strong prima facie case for the reduction of the will. As regarded the interim possession and administration of the estate it was clear from the respondents' statements that there was a serious risk of its being dissipated or injured, if left under the control of the petitioner. On the other hand, the appellant had failed to shew that any prejudice would be suffered if a judicial factor were appointed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not sure that had the record stood as it did in the Sheriff Court I should have agreed with the conclusion come to by the Sheriff. But the amendment of the record presents a case different in quality from that which the Sheriff had to consider, and it appears to me to be a case which requires careful attention. The case now made is a case of the estate not being in safety, and that was an aspect of the case not presented to the Sheriff, because the record then contained no impeachment

[1] Graham v. Bannerman, Feb. 28, 1822, 1 S. 362; Hamilton v. Hardie, Dec. 7, 1888, 16 R. 192.

No. 22.

Nov. 7, 1895.
Campbell v. Barber.

of the conduct and intentions of the executrix-nominate in that regard. But as I have said the new statements do touch that delicate question, and they constitute a direct appeal for our immediate action. We must necessarily determine this on the view and on a prima facie regard to the admitted facts and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from the state of the pleadings. I cannot say that I think we have adequate assurance for the safety of this estate. Without entering into the various considerations which lead me to that conclusion, I think we should appoint a judicial factor on the estate. It will do no harm, whatever be the event of any pending litigation, and in the meantime it seems to me we could not disregard the pointed statements which have been made, met as they are by answers which are lacking in the precision which I think was called for by what I would call the general aspects of the case. I am, therefore, for recalling the judgments of the Court below, and appointing a judicial factor on the estate.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 13th September 1895, and subsequent interlocutors: Appoint A. H. Cooper, W.S., to be judicial factor on the executry estate of the deceased Francis William Garden Campbell; and in respect of said appointment dismiss the petition, reserving right to the petitioner to present such other petition as she may be advised in the event of the action of reduction now pending being dismissed or absolvitor pronounced therein, and of the factory being recalled, and decern: Find neither party entitled to expenses."

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—PETER MORISON JUNR., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 23.

Nov. 14, 1895.
Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart.

DONALD STEWART AND OTHERS (Stewart's Trustees), First Parties.—Craigie.
DONALD STEWART, Second Party.—Craigie.
DONALD STEWART AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Craigie.
MARJORY STEWART, Fourth Party.—N. J. D. Kennedy.
JOHN M'NAUGHTON AND OTHERS, Fifth Parties.—M'Clure.

Process—Special Case—Competency—Failure to set out contentions of parties.—Held that a special case in which the contentions of parties were not set forth was not in competent form.

THIS was a special case brought to obtain the opinion and judgment of the Court upon certain questions with regard to the construction and effect of the trust-disposition and settlement of John Stewart. 1ST DIVISION.

The case set forth the deed and the circumstances in which the questions arose, but did not set forth the contentions of the respective parties.

At the hearing of the case objection was taken by the Court to the form in which the case was stated.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court is not satisfied that the case is properly

No. 23.
Nov. 14, 1895.
Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart.

placed before us, because there is nothing to shew the contentions of parties, and we do not know that they are not purely speculative questions on which the opinion of the Court is asked.

The case was continued that the parties might have an opportunity of amending their statements.

T. J. GORDON & FALCONER, W.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

No. 24.
Nov. 15, 1895.
Cumming's Trustees v. Anderson.

THE REVEREND KENNETH MACKENZIE AND OTHERS (Cumming's Trustees), First Parties.—Macphail.
JANE ANDERSON, Second Party.—Mac Watt.
HUGH MACPHERSON CUMMING, Third Party.—Macphail.
HUGH MACPHERSON CUMMING (Cumming's Executor) AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—W. C. Smith.

Succession—Vesting—Vesting subject to defeasance—Liferent and fee.—A testatrix directed her trustees to invest the sum of £1300, and divide the annual interest therefrom equally between her nieces Jane and Isabella during their joint lives, and on the death of either without lawful issue, to pay the whole annual interest to the survivor; but in case either should die leaving lawful issue, then such issue should be entitled to their parent's share of said interest; and upon the death of the survivor one-half of the said sum should be paid to the lawful issue of each of Jane and Isabella; "but declaring always, that if either or both of the said Jane and Isabella shall die without leaving lawful issue, then the half or the whole of said £1300, as the case may be, shall, on the death of the survivor, be paid by the said trustees to my brother, the said Robert Cumming." The testator was survived by the two nieces, who were not married, and by Robert Cumming.

Held that the fee of the sum of £1300 vested at the death of the testatrix in Robert Cumming, subject to defeasance to the extent of one-half in the event of Isabella leaving issue, and to the extent of the other half in the event of Jane leaving issue.

Steel's Trustees v. Steel, 16 R. 204, followed.

1ST DIVISION. MISS MARY CUMMING, Dunkeld, died on 26th March 1869, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed her whole estate to trustees for the following purposes:—(First) payment of debts. (Secondly) that the trustees should, after her death, lend out the sum of £1500 on good security, and apply the interest to the maintenance of her brother Alexander Cumming. "(Thirdly) that my said trustees may, as soon after my death as they conveniently can, lend and place out on good security, heritable or moveable, the sum of £1300 sterling, and pay and divide the annual interest to be derived therefrom equally between my nieces Jane M. C. Anderson and Isabella R. Anderson during their joint lives, exclusive always of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband they may marry. . . . Providing that on the death of either of the said Jane M. C. Anderson or Isabella R. Anderson without lawful issue the whole of the said annual interest shall be paid to the survivor; but in case either shall die leaving lawful issue, then such issue shall be entitled to their parent's share of said interest; and upon the death of the survivor one-half of the said sum of £1300 shall be paid by the said trustees to the lawful issue of each of the said Jane Anderson and Isabella Anderson; but providing and declaring always, that if either or both of the said Jane Anderson and Isabella Anderson shall die without leaving lawful issue, then the half or the whole of said £1300, as the case may be, shall, on the death of the survivor, be paid by the said trustees to my brother, the said Robert Cumming."

After giving directions, in the fourth place, for payment of certain legacies, the testatrix provided:—"(Lastly) With regard to the residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, above conveyed, I direct the said trustees, at and immediately after the decease of the said Alexander Cumming, to pay and assign the said residue (and including the sums liferented to the said Alexander Cumming) to and in favour of the said Hugh Macpherson Cumming and Robert Cumming, and their heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever."

After Miss Mary Cumming's death the trustees invested the sum of £1300, and paid the income thereof to Miss Jane Anderson and Miss Isabella Anderson equally down to the death of the latter, who died unmarried in 1873, after which the whole income was paid to Miss Jane Anderson.

Robert Cumming died on 27th October 1894, leaving a will, whereby he bequeathed his whole estate to his niece, Miss Jane Anderson.

A special case was thereafter presented, to which Miss Cumming's trustees were the first parties; Miss Jane Anderson, second party; Hugh Macpherson Cumming, third party; and parties representing the heirs in mobilibus of Miss Cumming, fourth parties, in order to obtain the opinion of the Court upon, inter alia, the following questions:—"(1) Did the legacy of £1300, contained in the third purpose of Miss Cumming's will, vest in Robert Cumming a morte testatoris, subject to the liferents, and subject to defeasance to the extent of one-half in the event of Isabella Robina Anderson leaving issue, and to the extent of the other half in the event of the second party leaving issue? (2) Did one-half thereof vest absolutely in Robert Cumming at the death of Isabella Robina Anderson without issue, subject to the liferent of the second party in such half? (3) Is the second party now entitled to payment of one-half of the said sum of £1300 for her own absolute use and behoof on renouncing and discharging the liferent thereof?"

The second party contended that the bequest of £1300 vested in Robert Cumming a morte testatoris, subject to the liferents, and subject to defeasance quoad the half or whole in the event of either or both of the liferentrices leaving lawful issue; that on Isabella R. Anderson's death his right to one-half of the bequest became absolute, or at all events that he then became absolutely entitled to one-half; and further, that by virtue of Robert Cumming's will in her favour she had acquired an absolute right to one-half of the bequest. She offered to renounce and discharge the liferent quoad the said half, and maintained that the trustees, on said discharge being granted, were bound to pay over the said half to her as her absolute property.

The third party contended that Robert Cumming did not acquire a vested right either to the half or the whole of the sum of £1300 in question, but that in consequence of his death and of the death of Miss Isabella Anderson without issue one-half of the said sum (subject to the second party's liferent) formed part of the residue of Miss Cumming's estate, and that in the event of the second party dying without issue, the other half of the said sum would fall to be disposed of as such residue.

The fourth parties contended that no part of the said sum of £1300

No. 24.
Nov. 15, 1895.
Cumming's Trustees v. Anderson.

vested in Robert Cumming either a morte testatoris or on the death of Isabella Anderson, and that that sum did not fall within the terms or operation of said residuary clause, but that one-half of the said sum (subject to the second party's liferent) was intestate moveable succession of Miss Cumming, and that in the event of the second party dying without issue, the other half of said sum would fall to be disposed of as such intestate moveable succession.

Argued for the second party;—The case was the usual one in which the principle of vesting, subject to defeasance, was applied.[1] The mere fact that one sister was substituted to the liferent enjoyed by the other did not exclude the application of that principle.

Argued for the third party;—(1) There was no vesting a morte, there being no direct gift by the testator in favour of the legatee, but only a direction to pay on the occurrence of an uncertain event.[2] Further, the residuary clause must be held as containing a destination over.[3] Accordingly, if there was vesting a morte subject to defeasance in anyone, it was in the residuary legatees.[3]

Argued for the fourth parties;—It was a question of intention whether, in the event of vesting being held to be postponed, the £1300 upon Robert Cumming's death fell into residue or intestacy. So far as could be gathered from the terms of the settlement, the legacy was not intended to be carried by the residuary clause.

LORD ADAM.—The question before us arises on the third purpose of the settlement, and is whether the bequest of £1300 vested in Mr Robert Cumming a morte testatoris subject to its divesting in the event of certain ladies leaving issue. I am of opinion that it did. If either of the ladies left issue, then that issue would be entitled to the fee of the half share liferented by the mother, but failing issue of both, the whole was to be paid over to Robert Cumming. Now, as was pointed out by Mr MacWatt, this is nothing more than a gift—if I may so call a right of liferent—to one lady and her issue, and, failing such, to Robert Cumming. The fact of the sum being split up between two liferenters is of no moment.

I am clearly of opinion that this case is ruled by that of Steel's Trustees,[1] and that it is impossible to distinguish between the two cases. The conditions of the bequest here, as already described, are precisely those that are dealt with in Steel's Trustees,[1] and I can see no reason why the rule laid down there should not be applied here.

I am therefore for answering the first three questions in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question which is of importance to the parties in this case is that which is first stated, and that question is whether the principle of vesting, subject to defeasance, is applicable to the legacy of £1300, which is one of the special provisions of the will. In the case which has

---

[1] Steel's Trustees v. Steel, Dec. 12, 1888, 16 R. 204; Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, &c., Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269; Cumming's Trustees v. White, March 2, 1893, 20 R. 454; Turner v. Gaw, Feb. 20, 1894, 21 R. 563; Wright's Trustees v. Wright, Feb. 20, 1894, 21 R. 568.

[2] Gilbert's Trustees v. Crerar, &c., Nov. 3, 1877, 5 R. 49; Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, &c., Nov. 26, 1880, 8 R. 142.

[3] Storie's Trustees v. Gray and Others, May 29, 1874, 1 R. 953, per Lord President at p. 957.

No. 24.

Nov. 15, 1895.
Cumming's Trustees v. Anderson.

been referred to on both sides (Steel's Trustees)[1] the late Lord President sums up the conditions under which the principle of vesting subject to defeasance had been applied in previous decisions of this Court and the House of Lords. I do not read his Lordship's opinion as necessarily limiting the application of the principle to these cases, but it is needless to consider the possible extension of the principle, because, in my judgment, the present case falls directly within the category defined in the Lord President's opinion. In Steel's Trustees[1] there was a direct bequest to the testator's daughter in liferent and her issue in fee, and failing such issue to a conditional institute, and it was laid down that the principle of vesting subject to defeasance applied to such a case. Of course if there had been issue in existence at the death of the testator a different question would have arisen, as it would have been impossible to hold that there was vesting in a conditional institute, when there were objects in existence answering to the prior destination.

If I have correctly stated the result of the case of Steel's Trustees,[1] it is difficult to see why different principles should be applied to the case of a legacy to a daughter, and to the case of a legacy to any other favoured person, in liferent. At all events, where the person to whom the liferent is given is a person to whom the testator stood in loco parentis, I think there can be no doubt that the same principle is applicable.

Another distinction is suggested between this case and Steel's Trustees.[1] It is pointed out that here there are two liferents and that they are so closely connected that on the death of one liferentrix the survivor takes the liferent enjoyed by the predeceaser; but I think it is quite clear that if the principle of vesting subject to defeasance is applicable to the case of two gifts, each of one-half of a particular fund, in liferent, with the destination which I need not repeat in fee, the mere circumstance that the survivor is to take the life interest previously enjoyed by the predeceaser can have no bearing on the presumed intention of the testator with regard to the fee.

With these explanations, I think that we have here the very case in which the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance has always been applied, and that we should, therefore, answer the first question in the affirmative.

The second question is really consequential on the first, because, if there was vesting in Robert Cumming subject to defeasance in the event of the liferenters having issue, then on the death of one of the liferenters without issue, when the possibility of there being issue ceased, Robert Cumming's right to the fee of the sum liferented by the deceased became absolute.

I may remark on the third question, viz., whether the second party is entitled to payment of one-half of the £1300 absolutely, the circumstances which raise the question are that the second party takes the liferent previously enjoyed by her deceased sister by immediate gift under the will, and also takes the fee of the same share or sum as representative of Robert Cumming. I think that the lesser right of liferent is absorbed in the more comprehensive right of fee. Questions are sometimes raised in relation to such rights, which depend on the consideration that the liferent rights are

[1] 16 R. 204.

No. 24.
Nov. 15, 1895.
Cumming's Trustees v. Anderson.

alimentary. Nothing was said in argument on this point, and I do not find that the liferent in question was declared to be alimentary.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The testatrix gives the sum of £1300 to two persons in liferent, and he gives the fee on the expiry of the liferents to Robert Cumming, the gift to Robert Cumming to take effect on an event certain,—namely, the death of the liferenters,—subject to one contingency only—the birth and survivance of issue. Therefore the bequest to Robert Cumming is liable to be defeated in that event and no other. This seems to me to be the normal case of vesting subject to defeasance, according to the doctrine laid down in Steel's Trustees,[1] and I have heard no reason for refusing to follow that decision.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT answered the first, second, and third questions in the affirmative.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 25.
Nov. 15, 1895.
Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

JOHN FLEMING AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—Ure—Cullen.

DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF MIDDLE WARD OF COUNTY OF LANARK, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Rankine—Clyde.

Lease—Compulsory Sale—Compensation to tenant—Lease with break.—A tenant of a farm under a lease to Whitsunday 1911, which gave power to the landlord or tenant to terminate it at Whitsunday 1898, being deprived of land by a Local Authority under compulsory powers, claimed, in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, compensation for loss of profits on the basis of the lease extending to Whitsunday 1911. The Local Authority contended that the lease should be taken as ending at Whitsunday 1898.

Held that the tenant was entitled to compensation on the footing that the lease endured to Whitsunday 1911, subject to such deduction as the arbiter might consider due to the contingency of its being brought to an end at an earlier date.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

IN March 1893 the District Committee of the Middle Ward of the County of Lanark, as the Local Authority under the Public Health Acts, in the exercise of powers conferred by their special Act and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, gave notice to John Fleming and James Murray, tenants of the farm of Low Plewland, of their intention to take 66 acres of their farm for the construction of water works.

The farm was held of the Duke of Hamilton under a lease for nineteen years from Martinmas 1891 and Whitsunday 1892, but with power to landlord or tenant to put an end to the lease at the end of six, eleven, or sixteen years from the respective terms of entry.

The tenants claimed compensation on the footing that the lease did not expire till Martinmas 1910 and Whitsunday 1911, at the end of the nineteen years. The District Committee, on the other hand, maintained that the lease must be taken as ending at Martinmas 1897, and that the tenants were only entitled to compensation to that

[1] 16 R. 204.

No. 25.

Nov. 15, 1895.
Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

term, and named an arbiter in terms of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, to fix the compensation, and that alternatively, in the first place, on the footing that the lease terminated at Martinmas 1897; and, in the second place, that it terminated at Martinmas 1910.

The tenants, under protest that the condition contained in the deed of nomination that the arbiter should give two or alternative findings of the amount or amounts due to them was illegal and invalid, nominated an arbiter on their part to act along with the arbiter appointed by the District Committee.

Thereafter the arbiters appointed an oversman, and in the decree-arbitral, on 19th October 1894, they found that the District Committee were liable to pay as compensation to the tenants:—(a) On the footing that the claimants were entitled to compensation for loss, injury, and damages sustained and to be sustained by them to the term of Whitsunday 1898 only, the sum of £2573, 3s. 0½d. (b) On the footing that the claimants were entitled to compensation for loss, injury, and damages sustained and to be sustained by them to the term of Whitsunday 1911, being the natural termination of said lease, the sum of £6307, 14s. 1d.

On 6th December 1894 the tenants raised an action against the District Committee for declarator that upon a just construction of their lease, they were entitled to receive full compensation from the defenders for all loss, injury, and damage sustained and to be sustained by them to the term of Whitsunday 1911, being the natural termination of the lease, in consequence of the defenders taking the land on the farm, and for payment of £6307, 14s. 1d.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) On a just construction of the said lease, and in the circumstances condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to receive payment from the defenders, in terms of the second branch of the first head of the said decreet-arbitral, of the sum of £6307, 14s. 1d., with interest, as concluded for. (2) The condition in the said lease with regard to a break being personal to the parties thereto, and not having come into operation, the defenders are not entitled to found upon the same, and the pursuers are entitled to compensation as stated in their first plea in law.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) On a sound construction of the pursuers' lease, they are entitled to compensation only on the footing of their tenancy expiring as at the first break therein. (4) The pursuers having no vested right or jus quæsitum to a continuance of their tenancy beyond the date of the first break in their lease, they are not entitled to decree as concluded for.

On 3d July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) found and declared in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.—The question here is whether the tenant of a farm, holding under a lease for a term of years with breaks in it available to either party, is entitled to receive compensation under the Lands Clauses Act on the footing of his tenancy enduring for the whole period of the lease, or only till the first break after the land is taken.

"It is a new question, on which there is no direct authority. I have found it a difficult one, and I do not profess to have arrived at a very confident conclusion. But, on the whole, it seems to me that the tenant is entitled to compensation for the full term.

"I admit the force of the defenders' argument that a lease containing mutual breaks binds the parties only till the first break arrives, and that they are then perfectly free to make a new bargain. They may do so or

No. 25.

Nov. 15, 1895. Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The question was, what was the tenancy? It was not a lease for nineteen years, but for six years only. If the tenant continued in possession beyond that period he did so by virtue of a new consent given six months before the termination of the first period. That was a contingency which was precisely on a footing with the chance of tacit relocation at the end of a nineteen years' lease, and the arbiters could not have valued the one any more than the other.

Argued for the pursuers;—The lease was not one for six years certain, but for nineteen years, subject to the chance of a break, and the pursuers were therefore entitled to declarator.[1]

At advising on 15th November,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The arbitration proceedings out of which this action

---

they may not; nobody can tell till the time comes for giving notice. But in the meantime a portion of the farm is compulsorily taken on the footing of full compensation, which can only be assessed once for all, and must be determined according to the vested rights and interests in the land as they exist at the time.

"Now, what was the nature of the pursuers' right to this farm when the defenders took 66 acres of it to form a reservoir? It was a right to possess it for nineteen years from Martinmas 1891, subject to the double contingency of the tenants being turned out of it by the landlord at the end of six, eleven, or sixteen years, or of their electing to go of their own accord at one or other of these periods. For the loss of the part taken the statute provides, in the first place, a proportional abatement of rent, and so far there is no difficulty. But when further compensation is claimed, it is on the footing that the loss of the part taken deprives the tenant of the profits which he would have made out of that part during the remainder of his lease, and also that it will diminish the profit which he is likely to make out of the part which is left to him.

"Now, profit being the postulate of the claim, it is not to be supposed that the tenant would himself make use of a break in the lease so as to terminate a beneficial contract. Indeed, this power on the tenant's part may be regarded as making the lease more valuable to him, and certainly it can never make it less so. Then, if the break be considered on its other side, as an option on the part of the landlord, it is difficult to see why a third party, like the promoters of an undertaking, coming in under compulsory powers, should take any benefit from the possibility, or even the probability, of the option being exercised so as to turn the tenant out. In short, the existence of the contingency does not destroy the tenant's vested right to possess for the full period, though it makes his right defeasible in a certain event. I do not see my way to hold that a break in favour of the tenant alone would diminish the value of a right which in truth it enhances, nor that a break in favour of the landlord alone ought to be treated as a certainty when in truth it is only a chance. But if neither of these powers standing alone would have the effect for which the defenders contend, it is very difficult to see why the mere combination of the two should make all the difference. . . .

"I do not know whether the arbiters, in arriving at the larger of the two sums, made any allowance for the possibility of the lease being terminated at one of the breaks. Certainly that was quite a proper matter for them to consider, but their award is not before me on its merits, and the decision of the present question cannot be affected by anything which they did or left undone."

[1] Solway Junction Railway Co. v. Jackson, March 12, 1874, 1 R. 831 The Queen v. Kennedy, 1893, L. R., 1 Q. B. D. 533; Bexley Heath Railway Co. v. North, 1894, L. R., 2 Q. B. Div. 597.

No. 25.

Nov. 15, 1895.
Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

arises had an unusual course. Part of the farm of which the pursuers were lessees having been taken compulsorily by the defenders, the pursuers were entitled to compensation for the damage done to them in their tenancy by reason of the severance. Instead of simply nominating an arbiter to estimate the compensation the defenders nominated their arbiter, but went on to bid him assess the compensation according to two alternative formulæ, without allowing the arbiter to choose any other principle of valuation. The pursuers, while protesting against the validity of this limitation of the inquiry, nominated their arbiter; and, so far as appears, the arbiters proceeded without further challenge on the lines laid down in the defenders' nomination. We have now before us the award stating the amount of compensation in either alternative view, and the pursuers call upon us to affirm in a declaratory finding the soundness of one of the defenders' formulæ, and to give effect to it by decerning for the sum which, in this view, the arbiters have found due.

The question which the arbiters ought to have determined was a comparatively simple one. The tenants hold under a lease bearing to be for nineteen years, but with power to either of the parties to put an end to it at the termination of six, eleven, or sixteen years from the tenant's entry on giving six months' previous notice. The tenant thus had right to possess for nineteen years subject to the contingency of the landlord availing himself of one of the breaks. It is plain that the value of the tenant's right under such a lease is less than that of a tenant who holds for nineteen years certain. The difference between the two must depend on a variety of circumstances, giving rise to a proper question of valuation. The circumstances might lead the arbiters to think that the tenants were pretty safe not to be turned out at the first break, but that they would be turned out at the second break, or they might think that they were pretty safe for the whole term of nineteen years, or they might think very little of the chance of their tenancy surviving the first break. But all these contingencies would have to be considered, and allowance made for them, the inevitable result being that the amount awarded must be less than would be due to a tenant for nineteen years certain.

On the other hand, it is equally clear that it would be erroneous in principle to confine attention to the profits to be earned before the first break. The tenant's right is definitely higher than that of a tenant for six years, and its value is necessarily greater. For the reasons already stated, the difference in money may be large or it may be small, but it exists. Accordingly, it seems to me that the sound way of proceeding is to treat the tenant as a tenant for nineteen years, subject to contingencies which must to a greater or less extent diminish the chances of his continuing in possession.

Unfortunately the arbiters have not so proceeded, and were never allowed to do so. The alternative before them was to treat the tenant as a nineteen years' tenant pure and simple, or as a six years' tenant pure and simple.

We are now asked to affirm the alternative of nineteen years pure and simple, and I cannot do so. The arbitration has miscarried, because the arbiters have not been allowed to value the damage done to the tenants, but have, instead, given the figures upon two express hypotheses of valuation, both of which are unsound.

No. 25.

Nov. 15, 1895. Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

The result is that unless the parties can come to an agreement as to the sum which would represent the principle which I have stated, and so save the arbitration proceedings from going by the board, we must grant absolvitor. In any event, we cannot but assoilzie from the declaratory conclusion.

I am glad to see from the last sentence of his opinion that I am at one with the Lord Ordinary on the proper principle of valuation, which is by far the most important question. My difference with his Lordship is merely as to the sound construction of this award. I think that, read along with the submission which it professes to meet, the second alternative takes no account of what the Lord Ordinary says was proper matter for consideration.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

ON 17th December, it having been intimated that the pursuers had agreed to accept the smaller sum fixed by the arbiters in full of their claims, the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dismissed the action, and found the pursuers entitled to expenses.

JOHN B. YOUNG, S.S.C.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 26.

Nov. 16, 1895. Clark & Macdonald v. Bain.

CLARK & MACDONALD, Petitioners.—G. Watt—Graham Stewart.
WILLIAM BAIN, Respondent.—A. M. Anderson.

Process—Decree—Correction by Clerk of Court before extract—Diligence—Suspension—Nobile officium.—In writing the interlocutor in a cause in which the Court had pronounced judgment for £41 in favour of the pursuer, the Clerk of Court, by a clerical error, wrote £14 for £41, and the interlocutor was signed by the presiding Judge. The Clerk corrected the error before extract, but failed to have the alteration authenticated by the Judge. The interlocutor having been extracted, the defender was charged to make payment, and the days of charge having expired without payment being made, the defender's goods were poinded. The defender thereupon presented in the Bill-Chamber a note of suspension of the decree and the proceedings thereon. The agents-disbursers of the pursuer, in whose name decree had been extracted and the charge given, presented a petition praying the Court to confirm and authenticate the Clerk of Court's amendment. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills reported the suspension.

The Court informed the Lord Ordinary on the Bills that the interlocutor as amended correctly expressed the judgment of the Court, and held it to be unnecessary to pronounce any order on the petition.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 2d November 1895, Messrs Clark & Macdonald, S.S.C., Edinburgh, presented this petition, in which they made statements to the following effect:—

On 20th July 1895 the First Division in an action for payment at the instance of Donald Mackenzie, 95 Shepherd's Bush Road, London, against William Bain, accountant, Edinburgh, pronounced a judgment approving the Auditor's report on the pursuer's account of expenses, and decerning against the defender for the taxed amount thereof, being £41, 2s. 8d., and allowing this decree to go out and be extracted

No. 26.

Nov. 16, 1895.
Clark & Macdonald v. Bain.

in name of Clark & Macdonald, S.S.C., agents-disbursers. By an inadvertency the Depute Clerk of Court who wrote the interlocutor inserted in it the figures £14, 2s. 8d. instead of the figures £41, 2s. 8d., and Lord Adam, who was presiding, signed the interlocutor containing the error. This error was corrected by the Deputy Clerk of Court before decree was extracted.

"The petitioners, on obtaining their extract, charged the said defender, William Bain, thereon to pay the sums therein mentioned. Said charge expired without any intimation having been made by the said defender to the petitioners of the alleged default in said interlocutor, but on the petitioners instructing a poinding of the effects of the said defender, he only then presented a note of suspension and interdict of said decree and whole proceedings following thereon, and the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, on 9th October 1895, pronounced an interlocutor sisting execution.

"The defender, William Bain, is insisting in said note of suspension and interdict to the great hurt and prejudice of the petitioners, who are rightly and justly entitled to the said sum of £41, 2s. 8d., which was the taxed amount of said expenses, and which was the sum the Court intended to grant decree for, and believed they were granting decree for.

"That in these circumstances the petitioners are under the necessity of applying to your Lordships to exercise your nobile officium, and to confirm and authenticate the amendment by the Clerk of Court in said interlocutor."

The petitioners prayed the Court "to confirm and authenticate the amendment by the Clerk of Court in the said interlocutor, as if the said amendment had been made and duly authenticated on said 20th July 1895, being the date of the said interlocutor sought to be rectified."

William Bain lodged answers, in which he stated that on 6th and 7th August 1895 copies of the interlocutor containing the figures £14, 2s. 8d. were made in the Register House by his agent's clerk and by himself. He further stated that considering his indebtedness to be £14, 2s. 8d. he had left town for his holidays. On his return two days before the expiry of the charge for payment, he had written to the messenger-at-arms pointing out that "the interlocutor decerning and approving of Auditor's report is for £14 odds and not £41 odds. Notwithstanding this letter, his goods were poinded on 2d October, and he was compelled to take the proceedings referred to in the petition. These proceedings will come under your Lordship's notice in due course, and accordingly this petition is incompetent, or at all events premature."

At the commencement of the debate, the Junior Lord Ordinary (Low), on the suggestion of the Lord President, reported to the Court the action of suspension which was pending in the Bill-Chamber.

Argued for the petitioners;—There was admittedly a clerical error in the interlocutor, and the Clerk of Court was bound to correct it as soon as it was discovered.[1] The answers were clearly irrelevant,

---

[1] Mackay's Manual of Practice in the Court of Session, p. 320; Miller v. Lindsay, June 8, 1850, 12 D. 964, 22 Scot. Jur. 437; Allan v. Wormser, Harris, & Co., June 8, 1894, 21 R. 866, per Lord Rutherfurd Clark, p. 875.

No. 26.

Nov. 16, 1895.
Clark & Macdonald v. Bain.

for there was no dispute that the extract was correct and in conformity with the judgment of the Court.

Argued for the respondent;—A clerical error could only be corrected de recenti and before extract.[1] The former qualification was absent here. The real question was whether the diligence against the respondent was good. The petitioners virtually admitted it was not by coming to the Court and asking to have the warrant for extract and the charge authenticated in order to validate what followed upon it. That question ought to be determined in the suspension in the Bill-Chamber, and the petition was unnecessary.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This question relates to a judgment of this Court, and the parties are agreed that in fact the judgment was given for the sum of £41, 2s. 8d., and not for £14, 2s. 8d.

Lord Low has reported to us the case at present depending before him, and it appears that the judgment was for £41, 2s. 8d.; the interlocutor bears to be for £41, 2s. 8d.; and the extract is for that sum.

Our attention has been drawn to an irregularity which occurred in the history of the interlocutor, which is the written record of the judgment, and it appears to me that, while certainly it would have been in accordance with regular practice that any alteration upon the interlocutor should be authenticated by the Judge who signed it, yet, in this case, the omission is not shewn to introduce any vice into the interlocutor, because, in point of fact, it accords with the judgment of this Court.

It therefore seems to me that the interlocutor has not been successfully impugned, and we, who pronounced it, inform his Lordship, who has reported the case to us, that the interlocutor does correctly record the judgment pronounced by us. Accordingly, I think that we should find that it is unnecessary to dispose of the petition, and that we should state to Lord Low that the interlocutor is in accordance with the actual judgment of the Court.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. It must always be remembered that an interlocutor is merely a brief minute of the judgment pronounced, intended for the use of the Court in the preparation of the form of extract, and that there are no statutory provisions regulating the authentication of such minutes. The signature of the Judge is all that is necessary.

I think with your Lordship that after the interlocutor is signed, the Clerk of Court ought not to make the smallest clerical alteration upon it without submitting it to the approval of the Judge.

In ordinary course, where the correction consists in the deletion of one word or figure and the substitution of another the Judge would initial it, but that is merely for the purpose of preserving evidence of the fact that the correction has been submitted to his approval.

In the present case the clerical correction was not submitted to the Judge, because probably the Clerk of Court thought the parties were agreed that it should be done. The omission of that precaution has led to the present proceedings. But as the Court has now been satisfied that the interlocutor as it stands truly expresses the judgment of the Court, I agree that it is unnecessary that any formal correction should be made. No. 26. Nov. 16, 1895. Clark & Macdonald v. Bain.

[1] Ritchie v. Ferguson, Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 119, 22 Scot. Jur. 3.
[2] Sykes v. Nicol, July 18, 1848, 10 D. 1499, 20 Scot. Jur. 567.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced no order in the petition.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—ALEX. GUNN, S.S.C.—Agents.

SIR JOHN KINGSTON FULLARTON JAMES AND OTHERS (Fullarton's Trustees), First Parties.—Lord-Adv. Sir Charles Pearson—Orr. FRANCIS EDWARD JAMES, Second Party.—Rankine—Pitman. No. 27. Nov. 16, 1895. Fullarton's Trustees v. James.

Trust—Resignation of trustee—Revocation—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 10, Schedule A.—Section 10 of the Trusts Act, 1867, enacts that "any trustee entitled to resign his office . . . may do so . . . by signing a minute of resignation in the form of Schedule A, . . . or to the like effect, and may register the same in the Books of Council and Session, and in such case he shall be bound to intimate the same to his co-trustee or trustees, and the resignation shall be held to take effect from and after the expiry of one calendar month after the date of such intimation, or the last date thereof, if more than one, if the trustee or trustees to whom such intimation was given is within Scotland, or otherwise within three months from and after that date." Schedule A provides, —"I, A B, do hereby resign as from and after the date hereof the office of trustee under," &c.

Held that a minute of resignation by a trustee, in the form of Schedule A, could not be revoked after intimation to the co-trustees, although it did not take effect in terms of the statute till a subsequent date.

ON 11th August 1894 Francis Edward James, who had been assumed some years previously as a trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Gavin Fullarton, of Kerelaw, Ayrshire, executed a minute of resignation (in the form of Schedule A annexed to the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 *), bearing "I . . . . do hereby resign as at and from the date hereof the office of trustee under," &c. 1ST DIVISION.

On the same date he intimated the minute to Sir John Kingston Fullarton James and others, his co-trustees, who were resident in England. An acknowledgment of intimation was annexed to the minute, and was signed by the co-trustees, and the minute, with the

* Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 10, enacts,—"Any trustee entitled to resign his office may do so by minute of the trust entered in the Sederunt Book of the trust, and signed in such Sederunt Book by such trustee, and by the other trustee or trustees acting at the time, or he may do so by signing a minute of resignation in the form of the Schedule (A) to this Act annexed, or to the like effect, and may register the same in the Books of Council and Session, and in such case he shall be bound to intimate the same to his co-trustee or trustees, and the resignation shall be held to take effect from and after the expiry of one calendar month after the date of such intimation, or the last date thereof, if more than one, if the trustee or trustees to whom such intimation was given is within Scotland, or otherwise within three months from and after that date. . . ."

No. 27.

Nov. 16, 1895. Fullarton's Trustees v. James.

acknowledgment of intimation annexed thereto, was registered in the Books of Council and Session on 14th August 1894.

On 20th September 1894 Mr James executed a minute of revocation of his resignation, and, on 17th October, this minute was registered. On 26th October intimation of the minute was made by Mr James to his co-trustees, who replied that he was not entitled to withdraw his resignation.

A special case was presented, to which the trustees were first parties, and Mr James second party, for the opinion of the Court upon the following question:—"Is the party of the second part still entitled to act as a trustee?"

Argued for the first parties;—The Trusts Act of 1861[1] conferred an unqualified power to resign upon gratuitous trustees, unless the contrary were expressed in the deed, and it was under the power so conferred that the second party had resigned. Section 10 of the Act of 1867 provided alternative modes in which resignation might be carried out, but that section did not limit the unqualified power conferred by the earlier Act.[2] The provision that a certain period was to elapse before the resignation took effect was conceived in favour of the remaining trustees, who were not bound to accept the resignation, but might take means to keep the resigning trustee in the trust. But, although the effect of the resignation was delayed, the act of resignation was complete when intimation had been made to the co-trustees, and could not be thereafter revoked.

Argued for the second party;—Section 10 of the Act of 1867 provided alternative modes in which a trustee's resignation could be effected. If the first was adopted, the resignation took effect at once. If the second, the effect was postponed. The first part of the section, which prescribes these alternative modes of resignation was permissive, the second, which dealt with the effect of resignation, was obligatory. As the second party had adopted the second alternative mode, his resolution to resign could not take effect until the expiry of three months from the date on which he intimated it to his co-trustees. The reasonable construction of the Act accordingly was that until the period of three months had expired his resolution to resign not having taken effect might be revoked. It was competent for a trustee to withdraw his resignation after he had intimated it to his co-trustees.[3]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This gentleman, Mr Francis Edward James, resigned his office of trustee, by minute of resignation, executed in the form of Schedule A of the Trusts Act, 1867, recorded in the Books of Council and Session, and acknowledged to have been intimated to the trustees. His resignation was therefore carried out in statutory form.

He now maintains that he effectually recalled his resignation, and he founds his claim to do so on the words in the Act of 1867, which say that a resignation under that Act shall be held to take effect three months after the date of intimation. The question is, What is the effect of those words?

---

[1] 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84.

[2] Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell, Nov. 4, 1874, 2 R. 71.

[3] Blair's Trustees v. Blair, Dec. 12, 1863, 2 Macph. 284, per Lord Kinloch, p. 286, 36 Scot. Jur. 139.

No. 27.

Nov. 16, 1895. Fullarton's Trustees v. James.

The sound view seems to be that they merely continue the resigning trustee in the service of the trust for that period, but do not abate or make revocable the concluded act of resignation. The trustee, according to the theory of the Act, is not to throw the trust into confusion by a sudden resignation, and the remaining trustees are to have time to arrange for his successor, if need be. This view seems to me to satisfy the words in question, and at the same time to harmonise them with the de presenti words of the minute, and the statutory solemnities of recording and intimating, all of which point to an irrevocable act.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The minute of resignation bears that the granter does "hereby resign, as and from the date hereof, the office of trustee," and in that respect it is in accordance with the form prescribed by the statute. So far as the resigning trustee himself is concerned, the act of resignation is complete. There is nothing more which it is necessary or possible for him to do in order to further his resignation. All that is required to relieve him of the duties and liabilities of his office is not an act within his own power, but merely the lapse of a certain period of time. If the statute, while providing that the resignation should take effect within a certain period of the intimation made by the trustee to his co-trustees, had prescribed nothing as to the form in which resignation should be made, I could understand that a more difficult question might have arisen. But the Act prescribes a form of resignation, and requires, when this mode of resignation is adopted, in order to relieve the trustee of his duties and liabilities as trustee, that he must execute and deliver to his co-trustees a written instrument importing an absolute and immediate resignation from the date of the instrument.

It appears to me, therefore, that no real difficulty is raised by the provision of the statute as to the period which is to elapse before the resignation shall take effect.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN were absent.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.—PATRICK C. JACKSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 28.

Nov. 16, 1895.* Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c.

KIRKCALDY DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF FIFE, First Parties.—Dickson—D. Dundas.
POLICE COMMISSIONERS OF BUCKHAVEN, METHIL, AND INNERLEVEN, Second Parties.—Balfour—Lorimer.

Public Health—Water—Whole parish supplied by one system of waterworks—Burgh formed within parish after 1889, and created a special water supply district—Residue of parish formed into a separate water supply district—Management and maintenance—Assessment—County Council—Burgh Police Commissioners—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 50), sec. 99.—Sec. 99 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, enacts,—"Nothing in this Act shall interfere with the

* Decided Nov. 8, 1895.

No. 28.

Nov. 16, 1895. Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c.

formation of police burghs under the provisions of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, and on the formation of any police burgh the Commissioners of Police thereof shall become the Local Authority therein under the Public Health Acts subject to adjustment by the Sheriff in regard to the property and debts and liabilities affected by such change. . . ."

In 1876 the Parochial Board of Wemyss, as the Local Authority under the Public Health Act, 1867, introduced a water supply for the whole parish from a source outside the parish, the only works within the parish being the distributing mains. On the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Kirkcaldy District Committee of the County Council of Fife came in place of the Parochial Board as Local Authority, and the water-works were vested in them. The requisite expenditure was levied upon the whole property in the parish.

In 1891 a district of the parish was created a police burgh, and subsequently formed into a special water supply district. In 1892 the remaining part of the parish was formed into a special water supply district. The existing system of water-works for the supply of the whole parish was continued.

In a question between the District Committee of the County Council and the Police Commissioners of the burgh, held (1) that the water supply and water-works fell to be managed by the subcommittee of the District Committee appointed under sec. 81 of the Local Government Act, 1889, and the Police Commissioners (or so many of the Police Commissioners as the Sheriff should fix as a committee) jointly; and (2) that the Police Commissioners were alone entitled to impose and levy the necessary assessments within the burgh.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a special case presented by the Kirkcaldy District Committee of the County Council of Fife, as first parties, and the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven as second parties, to determine certain questions which had arisen between them as to the management and maintenance of the water-works and water supply of the parish of Wemyss of which the burgh formed a part. The undernoted sections of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, were, inter alia, referred to by the parties,* and the following facts were set forth in the special case:—

* The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), enacts,—Sec. 81. "With respect to special drainage districts or special water supply districts the following provisions shall have effect—(1) Where a special drainage district or special water supply district has been formed in any parish under the Public Health Acts, the district committee may, subject to regulations to be from time to time made with the consent of the County Council, appoint a subcommittee for the management and maintenance of the drainage or water supply works, and such subcommittee shall in part consist of persons, whether members of the district committee or not, who are resident within the special drainage district, or special water supply district. (2) Where a special drainage district or special water supply district is partly within a county and partly within a burgh or police burgh, the subcommittee appointed under the immediately preceding subsection, and such number of the town council or Police Commissioners (as the case may be) of such burgh or police burgh as, failing agreement, the Secretary for Scotland may determine, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, shall be charged with the management and maintenance of the drainage or water supply works within such special district, and the determination of the Secretary for Scotland may provide for the regulation of the proceedings, and for the allocation and payment of the expenses incurred under this subsection. (3) Where a special drainage district or

No. 28.

Nov. 16, 1895.

Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c.

In 1868 the town or village of Buckhaven, and in 1870 the village of East Wemyss, both within the parish of Wemyss and county of Fife, were respectively formed into special water supply districts under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, section 89 (5). At that time the areas of these water districts were wholly landward.

In 1876 the Parochial Board of Wemyss applied for and obtained a provisional order confirmed by Parliament authorising them to introduce a supply of water for the whole parish. The works were vested in and constructed and administered by the Parochial Board of Wemyss as the Local Authority under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867. The water supply so introduced was obtained from a source beyond the parish, the only works within the parish and the special districts above mentioned being distributing mains, excepting a small distributing tank situated within the parish, but beyond the special districts.

The debts due by the special districts of Buckhaven and East Wemyss were taken over and paid by the Parochial Board as the Local Authority of Wemyss, and the special districts were thereafter treated, like the other parts of the parish, as if they had not been formed into special districts. The assessments, however, for the water supply were levied under the Public Health Act, section 94, subsection 1 (which applies to special districts only), and not under subsection 2. To provide funds for the construction of the water-works sums of money were borrowed from time to time by the Parochial Board as Local Authority of the parish, in security of the repayment of which, and of interest thereon, the water assessments of the parish, including the special districts above mentioned, and also the general public health assessments of the parish, were pledged. Such was the position of matters when the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, came into operation, and the parish of Wemyss became part of the Kirkcaldy district of the county of Fife.

In June 1890, the Kirkcaldy District Committee being under the erroneous apprehension that the whole parish of Wemyss had been formed into a special water supply district, a subcommittee was appointed to manage and maintain the water supply works under section 81 (1) of the Local Government Act. The subcommittee consisted of six members of the district committee, and four residenters within the parish of Wemyss.

By an order of the Boundary Commissioners, of date 24th November 1890, a detached portion of the parish of Markinch, known as Innerleven, and which had been formed into a special water supply district in the year 1885, was added to the parish of Wemyss.

On 4th March 1891 the district of Buckhaven, Methil, and Inner-special water supply district is wholly within a police burgh formed after the passing of this Act, the Police Commissioners of such police burgh shall become the Local Authority under the Public Health Acts for such special district, and the assessments in respect of the drainage and water supply shall be levied in the same manner as they were before such district was formed into a police burgh."

---

Sec. 99. "Nothing in this Act shall interfere with the formation of police burghs under the provisions of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862; and on the formation of any police burgh the Commissioners of Police thereof shall become the Local Authority therein under the Public Health Acts, subject to adjustment by the Sheriff in regard to the property and debts and liabilities affected by such change. . . ."

No. 28.

Nov. 16, 1895.
Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c.

leven, all in the parish of Wemyss, was formed into a police burgh, under the provisions of the General Police Act of 1862.

In July 1892 the District Committee extended the special water supply district of East Wemyss (formed as before mentioned in 1870) so as to include the whole parish of Wemyss except those parts of the parish which were embraced in the limits of the police burgh of Buckhaven, &c.

In August 1892 the Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c. extended the special water supply district of Buckhaven (formed as before mentioned in 1868), so as to include the whole burgh of Buckhaven, &c.

In September 1892, in pursuance of section 92 of the Public Health Act of 1867,* a joint committee of the District Committee and the Police Commissioners was appointed for the management of the works, and "to enable the combined authorities of the parish of Wemyss and of the police burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven to bring in an additional supply of water, and to execute and maintain the works."

Thereafter the District Committee and the Police Commissioners approved of a scheme for the new water supply, called the Byres Scheme, and empowered the joint committee to apply for a provisional order for the Byres Scheme, and thereafter to execute the provisional order, and to manage and maintain the works to be so constructed along with the existing works of the combined special water supply district of Wemyss.

The provisional order was obtained, and received the royal assent in 1894. Before, however, the works were executed, questions arose between the Kirkcaldy District Committee and the Police Commissioners as to which was the Local Authority for the administration of the water supply works originally introduced by the parochial board for the whole parish, and of those to be constructed in virtue of the provisional order, and this special case was presented.

The questions of law submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court were:—"(1) Which of the parties to the case is the Local Authority charged with and entitled to the administration of (a) the existing, and (b) the contemplated water supply and water-works (1) within the landward part of the parish of Wemyss; (2) within the police burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven; and (3) within the part outwith both the said police burgh and the said parish? (2) Do the assessments necessary in connection with (a) the existing, and (b) the contemplated water-works fall to be imposed and levied by the County Council over the whole parish; or are the second parties entitled or bound to impose and levy the same within the burghal portion of the said parish?"

The first parties maintained that, looking to the facts that the water supply introduced into the parish of Wemyss by the parochial board, as local authority of the parish, was introduced for the benefit of the whole parish; that the whole of the works, except certain distributing mains, were outside the limits of the police burgh, and partly also outwith the parish of Wemyss; that the cost of the works

* The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), sec. 92, enacts,—"Two or more local authorities may combine together for the purpose of executing and maintaining any works by this Act authorised in regard to water supply that may be for the benefit of their respective districts."

No. 28.

Nov. 16, 1895. Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c.

for the supply of the whole parish, including the burgh, formed a debt upon the parish, including the burgh, and the assessments of the whole parish, including the burgh, were pledged in security for repayment of the money borrowed to construct the works; and that the special water supply districts of East Wemyss and Buckhaven were all formed before the police burgh came into existence, only the extensions and combinations of the same having taken place after the creation of the burgh,—the District Committee was entitled to exercise all the administrative and financial business of the water-works through a subcommittee appointed in terms of section 81 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889; and the County Council was entitled and bound to levy the assessments necessary within the burghal as well as the landward portions of the parish.[1] As the new supply of water about to be introduced was merely an addition to the existing supply, the whole of the works in connection therewith being outside the burgh, and most of them outside the parish, the administration of, and the assessments necessary in connection with, such new or additional supply, must be dealt with upon the footing above indicated with regard to the existing water supply.

The second parties maintained that Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven, being a police burgh formed in 1891 under the General Police Act, 1862, of which the second parties are the Local Authority under the Public Health Acts and the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 81 (3) and sec. 99; and the said police burgh forming a special water supply district, the second parties were entitled to combine with the first parties, the Local Authority of the parish of Wemyss, in maintaining the existing, and executing and maintaining the contemplated water-works, and to exercise in conjunction with them the administrative and financial business of the said water-works, and that the second parties were entitled and bound to impose and levy the water-works assessments so far as within the said police burgh.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The police burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven was formed in 1891. The 99th section of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, determines the effects of this event upon the administration of the Public Health Acts. The Police Commissioners became the Local Authority within the new burgh in succession to, and in place of, the District Committee. The Police Commissioners succeeded the District Committee in all their rights as Local Authority within the burgh, including their property, and became the sole assessing authority.

The application of this law to the present question does not present any difficulty, either in theory or in practice. There was an existing system of water-works supplying both the burgh and the residue of the parish out of which the burgh was carved. The system being one and indivisible, there is a joint interest in the two local authorities, and there must be a joint management and maintenance. As the water-works form "a property affected by the change" from the one Local Authority to the other, the Sheriff is appointed by section 99 to adjust the terms of the new arrangement. The matter is complicated, but only very slightly, by the circumstance that the residue of the parish is a special water supply district; and, accordingly, while the District Committee is the Local Authority, its powers of management and maintenance of these works are exercised through a subcommittee appointed under section 81 (1) of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889. (I may mention, but merely incidentally, and for the avoiding of all doubtfulness, that the statutory recognition of this special water supply district in the Provisional Order Act of 1894 sufficiently establishes the legality of the resuscitation and extension of the long obsolete district of East Wemyss.) It would be within the province of the Sheriff to fix, with due regard to the numerical strength of the subcommittee of the district committee, the number of police commissioners, if the whole are too many to sit as a committee along with the subcommittee of the district committee, so as to duly represent town and country respectively.

[1] County Council of Dumbartonshire v. Police Commissioners of Clydebank, Nov. 16, 1894, 22 R. 64.

No. 28.

Nov. 16, 1895. Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c.

While the management and maintenance of the works will therefore be in the hands of this joint body, it is clear that it has no assessing power in itself. The joint body will, however, have in the course of its management to frame its budget, and make up its mind what money is required each year. This deficit must be divided between the two assessable areas (the special water supply district of Wemyss and the burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven), and the proportion can be fixed by the Sheriff. The sums thus falling on the two local authorities will be raised by assessment laid on, in the burgh by the Police Commissioners as Local Authority, and outside the burgh by the County Council, each authority exercising its own appropriate assessing powers.

What I have said has related to the existing water supply. It all, however, applies equally to the contemplated works. The Provisional Order Act of 1894 expressly authorises the new works as the joint enterprise of the two bodies; and, once those works are completed, the management and maintenance will be in like manner joint. As the old and the new works are to form one system, the new will necessarily come under the management of the same joint body, which by that time will be fully equipped.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare (1) that the whole of the existing and also of the contemplated water supply and water-works fall to be managed and maintained by the subcommittee of the District Committee under section 81, subsection 1, of the Local Government Act, 1889, and the Police Commissioners (or so many of said Police Commissioners as the Sheriff shall fix as a committee) jointly; (2) that the second parties are alone entitled and bound to impose and levy within the police burgh the assessments necessary to raise the due proportion effeiring to the burgh of the moneys necessary to be raised by assessment for the existing and contemplated water-works, and decern."

RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—DOUGLAS & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES HOWDEN (David Simson's Judicial Factor), Petitioner (Reclaimer).—D. Dundas—Howden.
JAMES SIMSON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Guy.

No. 29.

Nov. 16, 1895.

Howden v. Simson.

Trust—Power to make advances out of capital—Discretionary power of trustees—Judicial Factor—Special Powers.—A testator conveyed to certain persons named and to such other persons as should be assumed in terms of law to act in the trust, as trustees for executing the trust, his heritable and moveable estates. He directed his trustees, inter alia, to retain and invest £4000 for behoof of his son D in liferent allenarly and of his issue in fee, and on the death of D without issue to pay the sum to the testator's other sons, subject to the condition that "in case at any time my trustees may in the exercise of their judgment and discretion think it prudent and advisable to pay over" to D "the whole or any part of the principal of the said sum of £4000 as his own absolute property, they shall have, and they are hereby granted full power, authority, and liberty to do so, . . . it being my intention to give to my trustees the same full powers and discretion in giving the said principal sum" to D, "which I myself now possess."

A judicial factor who had been appointed in room of the trustees, who had resigned, presented a petition, bearing to be at D's request, for power to invest a portion of the £4000 in the purchase of an annuity in favour of D and his wife, and the survivor of them.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the petition, on the ground that the trust-deed did not authorise any payment for behoof of D's wife.

The judicial factor having reclaimed, and lodged a minute stating that in his opinion the proposed application of the portion of the trust-estate was prudent and advisable, the Court, holding that the proposed investment, being at D's request, was virtually a payment to D himself, granted the prayer of the petition.

Observations by Lord M'Laren as to the limits of the power of a judicial factor who has come in place of trustees vested with discretionary powers.

(SEE Simson, Jan. 27, 1883, 10 R. 540.)

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

By trust-disposition and settlement executed on 15th and 18th September 1863 by David Simson senior, tenant of Oxnam Row, Roxburghshire, and Mrs Elizabeth Simson, his wife, David Simson conveyed his estates to certain persons named, and to such other person or persons as he should thereafter name, or as should be assumed in terms of law to act in the trust thereby created, and to the acceptors or acceptor, survivors and last survivor of the persons thereby named, or to be named or assumed as aforesaid, as trustees for executing the trust thereby created; whom all failing, then to the nearest heir-male of the last accepting and surviving trustee who should be major at the time and the assignees of his said trustees.

By the sixth purpose of the deed it was provided "that my trustees shall at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death set apart the sum of £4000, and retain and invest the same in their own names as trustees foresaid . . . for behoof of David Simson junior, my son, in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and of his lawful issue in fee . . . Declaring that the interest or annual produce of the said sum of £4000 is intended by me, and shall be held to be a purely alimentary provision, to the said David Simson junior, and shall not be assignable by him in any way, nor for any purpose, nor be subject to the diligence of his creditors: . . . And it is hereby further provided and declared that upon the death of the said David Simson junior without issue then alive, then and in that case I appoint the said sum of £4000 to be divided and paid to

No. 29.

Nov. 16, 1895. Howden v. Simson.

my other sons, George Simson, James Simson, and John Simson, equally among them, share and share alike, and their respective heirs and assignees: But it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the foregoing provisions in favour of my said son, David Simson junior, in liferent, and of his issue, whom failing, in favour of the said George Simson, James Simson, and John Simson, and their foresaids, in fee, are made by me subject to this condition and provision that, in case at any time my trustees may, in the exercise of their own judgment and discretion, think it prudent and advisable to pay over to the said David Simson junior the whole or any part of the principal of the said sum of £4000 as his own absolute property, they shall have, and they are hereby granted full power, authority, and liberty to do so; and they shall be completely exonered thereof by the discharge of the said David Simson junior alone, and shall not thereafter be subject to any claim thereto, or to the part so paid at the instance of his issue, or of my said sons, George, James, and John, or any one of them, or on the part of their respective foresaids, it being my intention to give to my trustees the same full powers and discretion in giving the said principal sum to the said David Simson junior, or withholding the same from him, which I myself now possess; and the said David Simson junior shall have no right or power to claim or demand payment of said principal sum, or any part thereof, from my trustees in case they may not deem it proper to give the same to him of their own free will and motive, they being hereby declared to be the sole and uncontrolled judges in the matter."

The testator died on 12th April 1865. In July 1865 the whole purposes of the trust were fulfilled, with the exception of the sixth purpose. The trustees having all resigned, the Court on 21st May 1875 appointed a judicial factor upon the trust-estate.

On 21st November 1894 the judicial factor presented a petition to the Court, in which he stated "that the income of the estate falling to the liferenter, the said David Simson, is insufficient to meet his wants, and the petitioner has accordingly, at his request, agreed to ask your Lordships for authority . . . to invest a . . . sum of £1000 out of the trust-estate in the purchase of an annuity in favour of the said David Simson and his wife, and the survivor of them. It is believed that the sum of £1000 will purchase an annuity of about £60." He accordingly craved the Court to authorise him to make this investment by purchasing from the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company an annuity on the lives of David Simson and his wife, and the survivor of them.

Answers were lodged by James and John Simson, surviving brothers of David Simson junior, and by the nine children of George Simson, a deceased brother of David Simson junior. They submitted that the petition was wholly unnecessary, and that to grant its prayer would be contrary to the expressed intention of the testator.

On 18th October the Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the prayer of the petition.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The trust-deed authorises the trustees to pay over to David Simson the whole or any part of the sum of £4000 as his own absolute property. Now, in the former petition[1] the Court authorised the trustees to invest a sum of money in the purchase of an annuity for David Simson, on the ground that that was practically giving £1000 of the [1] Simson, 10 R. 540.

No. 29.

Nov. 16, 1895.
Howden v. Simson.

The petitioner reclaimed, and on the suggestion of the Court lodged a minute, in which he stated "that Mr David Simson junior has expressed to him a desire to make some provision for his wife, and has undertaken in the event of his obtaining from the trust-estate a capital sum of £1000 to invest the same in the purchase of an annuity in favour of himself and his wife and the survivor of them. The judicial factor is of opinion that in the whole circumstances of the case such an application of the said money would be prudent and advisable. He accordingly considers that the investment by him of the said sum of £1000 in an annuity as craved in the prayer of the petition would be a prudent and advisable act of the administration. Further, looking to the undertaking by Mr Simson above mentioned, in which the judicial factor reposes confidence, he is of opinion that it would be safe, prudent, and advisable, if the Court should authorise such a course, to hand over a sum of £1000 out of the trust funds to Mr Simson absolutely."

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the application ought to be granted. The testator directed that £4000 should be held in trust by his trustees for behoof of his son David Simson, for his liferent use allenarly, and for his issue in fee; and then he went on to provide that the interest or annual produce of that sum should be held to be a purely alimentary provision for the said David Simson, and should not be assignable by him in any way or for any purpose, or be subject to the diligence of his creditors. If that provision had stood alone there could have been no possibility of the Court or the judicial factor allowing the alimentary liferenter to have, directly or indirectly, any portion of the fee of the estate. But the testator goes on to say,—"It is hereby specially provided and declared that the foregoing provisions . . . are made by me, subject to this condition and provision, that in case at any time my trustees may, in the exercise of their own judgment and discretion, think it prudent and advisable to pay over to the said David Simson junior the whole or any part of the principal of the said sum of £4000 as his own absolute property, they capital to David Simson himself, as he desired that the £1000 should be invested in that way. The factor approved of that being done, all the beneficiaries consented, and the Court said this:—That to say that this is not within the terms of the power is really a play upon words, because to expend £1000 in the purchase of an annuity, at the desire of David Simson, is practically the same thing as paying £1000 directly to himself for his own absolute use and behoof. But then upon the same course of reasoning to expend £1000, or any part of that sum, in purchasing an annuity, not for David Simson, but for his wife, is not in any sense giving the money to him. It is applying the capital of the money for behoof of a person other than David Simson, for which I can find no warrant whatever in the trust-deed.

---

"Now that is the only thing which is asked in this part of the prayer of the petition. It is asked that the authority of the Court should be given to the factor to invest £1000 in the purchase of an annuity for David Simson and his wife. If the application had been one for the advance of £1000 to David Simson, upon the ground that he desired that money to make provision for his wife, that would have been a totally different matter, and would have been a totally different application, raising another and different set of considerations than those we are considering here, and as to which I, of course, indicate no opinion. But I am clear that to apply a part of this capital sum in the purchase of an annuity, not for David Simson but for his wife, would be to go beyond the powers given in the trust-deed. . . ."

No. 29.

Nov. 16, 1895. Howden v. Simson.

shall have, and they are hereby granted full power, authority, and liberty to do so." He further goes on to express his intention of giving his trustees the same discretion in the matter as he himself possesses, and therefore there was a power given to the trustees to discharge the limitations which the truster had put upon the original gift for the protection of his son, and if they found it safe and prudent to do so, to make over to the son any part or the whole of the capital as they in their discretion might think fit.

Now, it appears to me that all of these provisions are made for the benefit of the son. It is for his benefit that the provisions are in the first place restricted so as to exclude the diligence of his creditors; and, in the second place, that the trustees are authorised to withdraw that restriction, and put him in full possession of his own property if they think fit. I do not think that the trustees, or the judicial factor in their place, would be entitled to exercise their power to give any portion of the sum in question to David Simson, unless in the exercise of their judgment and discretion they thought that it was no longer necessary that he should be protected, either with regard to the whole or a part of the sum as the case might be, by the exclusion of the diligence of his creditors, and therefore I think that the first step which the trustees, in the discharge of the duty laid upon them by the truster, are bound to take, in considering whether they are to give or to withhold any part of the money which David Simson may require, is to consider whether in his interest it is prudent and advisable to grant that request.

Now, if the judicial factor had said nothing more than that he "proposed to sink a thousand pounds in an annuity for David Simson and his wife," I should have thought that that was not a sufficient statement to warrant the power to do so being given. The mere fact that he so proposed would not in itself establish, at all events to my satisfaction, that he had, in the exercise of his judgment and discretion, come to the conclusion that it was prudent and advisable to make over such a sum of money as the absolute property of the legatee, because he no longer required the protection which the testator had provided against the diligence of creditors. But he does not confine himself to such a statement at all; he tells us explicitly that he does consider that the investment on the annuity would be a prudent and advisable act of administration, and further, that he is of opinion that it would be safe and prudent and advisable to hand over a sum of £1000 out of the trust-funds to Mr Simson absolutely.

Now, if we have the judicial factor's report to that effect, I do not think we should have any hesitation in allowing him to do what he thinks it advisable to do.

The only ground on which the Lord Ordinary refused the application appears to be that the petitioner desires the money to make provision for his wife, and his Lordship says that "to apply a portion of this capital sum in the purchase of an annuity, not for David Simson but for his wife, would be to go beyond the powers given in the trust-deed." That would have been perfectly sound if the powers in the trust-deed had been confined to the administration of the income of this property during David Simson's life, but the power is to give the whole or part to Simson as his absolute property, and if he is entitled to obtain a thousand pounds for himself, it is surely within that power that he should be entitled to say,—

"I want a thousand pounds, because I wish to purchase an annuity for my wife with it." No. 29.

Nov. 16, 1895. Howden v. Simson.

The purpose to which the money is to be applied is only material in so far as it is an element which the judicial factor very properly took into consideration in determining whether it was a prudent and advisable thing to put the money under this gentleman's control. The logical result of that view would be this, that we should authorise the judicial factor to pay over the £1000 to Mr Simson, and allow him to do with it what he pleases. But I think it is very much more convenient to adopt the course which the judicial factor himself proposes, and that we should authorise him to apply the money for which he is asked. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that we should grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with all that has been said by Lord Kinnear, and will only add a sentence on two points. The exercise of the powers here granted by the testator is a somewhat delicate branch of our jurisdiction, and has often been the subject of discussion. In a case that came before us not very long ago, Robbie's Judicial Factor v. Macrae,[1] we had occasion to consider the limits of the power of a judicial factor who came in the place of trustees vested with discretionary powers, and your Lordships held that a judicial factor could not exercise an unqualified power of selection of the objects of the trust; but it appeared on a review of the cases, including that of Simson,[2] that where a truster had clearly pointed out the objects of a trust, and had given his trustees discretion only as to the mode in which the benefit should be enjoyed, that was a power which could be exercised by a factor, and it would be extremely unfortunate if such powers could not be exercised after the death of the original trustees.

But then I agree with the observation made in the respondents' argument that, where the trust is one involving a large exercise of discretion in disposing of a capital fund, the Court has a certain controlling power. The factor has not merely to come to the Court that we may see that the proposed application of the money is within his power, but he must also set forth his reasons for the proposed exercise of the power that we may see that there is a fair exercise of the discretion which has devolved upon him in succession to the trustees.

The only other point which I desire to note is as to the purpose for which this money is to be applied. Of course the most ordinary case of the exercise of such a power would be where there had been some loss of interest to the beneficiary, and it was necessary that a portion of the capital should be so invested that he might spend the remainder of his days in the same degree of comfort that he had hitherto enjoyed. But the power is not limited to questions of this sort. It is a power to give the beneficiary liferenting the fund the absolute control of a portion of the capital, provided the trustees shall think it a reasonable application of the money. It appears to me to be quite proper for the factor to inquire of the beneficiary what he means to do with the money, for the very purpose of the trust is [1] 20 R. 358. [2] 10 R. 540.

No. 29.

Nov. 16, 1895. Howden v. Simson.

to protect him against the improvident expenditure of his capital. Now, in this case, where it is explained that he proposes to sink the money in an annuity, I cannot doubt that, upon this explanation being made, the judicial factor has a case before him entitled to very favourable consideration, and as he comes to us stating that he approves of the proposed advance, I am of opinion with Lord Kinnear that the power should be granted.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, granted the prayer of the petition, and found the petitioner entitled to the expenses of the petition out of the capital of the trust-estate.

SHIELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—SIBBALD & MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 30.

Nov. 19, 1895. Campbell v. Morris.

HUGH CAMPBELL, Objector (Appellant).—Cullen.
ANDREW MORRIS, Claimant (Respondent).—Blackburn.

Election Law—Service Franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A coachman had the exclusive use and control of a room over the stable furnished as a bedroom, in which he kept his clothes and dressed, but he took his meals in the mansion-house occupied by his master, and slept there as caretaker.

He claimed to be enrolled as a voter in respect that he inhabited the room over the stable as a dwelling-house by virtue of service in the sense of section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.

Held that he was not entitled to the franchise, in respect that the dwelling-house which he inhabited was not the room over the stables but the mansion-house, which was inhabited by the person under whom he served.

Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney.

AT a Registration Court for the county of Perth (Eastern Division), held on 3d October 1895, Andrew Morris, coachman, Ayton, claimed to be enrolled on the Register of Voters for the county (Eastern Division) as tenant and occupant of a house at Ayton. Hugh Campbell, solicitor, Perth, objected to the claim being admitted. The Sheriff (Jameson) admitted the claim, and on Campbell's request stated a case for the opinion of the Court of Appeal as follows:—

"The facts of the case are as follows:—Andrew Morris is coachman to Mr William Livingstone Watson of Ayton, in the parish of Abernethy, and resides there the whole year round. As such coachman he has in respect of his services the sole and exclusive use of a house over the stable which is furnished with beds, and in which he dresses and undresses, and which he also sits in during the day when he has leisure. Mr Watson is for a great part of the year absent in London, and as there are no other men-servants in the mansion-house at Ayton, the claimant has been requested to sleep in the said mansion-house, and has a bedroom there, where he has slept for the last four years, never having slept in the house in respect of which the claim is made. He keeps his box in his bedroom in the mansion-house, but keeps most of his clothes in the house over the stable. He has the custody of the keys of the said house over the stable, and full control of it. . . . . The claimant takes all his meals with the other servants in the mansion-house. He is not married."

The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal was

No 30.
Nov. 19, 1895.
Campbell v. Morris.

"Whether in the circumstances above set forth the claimant is entitled to be put on the said Roll of Voters in respect of section 3 of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3, intituled 'The Representation of the People Act, 1884'?" *

Argued for the appellant;—The "dwelling-house" referred to in section 3 must be taken to be the house in which the claimant slept and took his meals, and not the room which he occupied in his leisure time. As the former was also inhabited by his master, he could not be admitted to the franchise.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The house which he really inhabited was the room over the stables, where he spent his time when he was not required to sleep at the mansion-house for its protection during his master's absence. Moreover, he might inhabit two houses.[2]

LORD KINNEAR.—I think that this is a somewhat narrow case, but I am unable to agree with the learned Sheriff. The clause which we are called upon to interpret is the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.—[His Lordship here quoted the section.]

Now, the claimant is a coachman in the service of Mr Watson, and the case sets out that he sleeps in the mansion-house and takes his meals there. It also sets out that Mr Watson is absent for a great part of the year in London, and that as there are no other men-servants in the mansion-house, the claimant has been required to sleep there in the capacity of watchman. It is further stated that there is a house over the stables furnished with beds, although these are not used, and that he has the exclusive use of it for dressing and undressing, and keeps his clothes there, although he also keeps a box, presumably for his clothes, in his bedroom in the mansion-house.

Now, it appears to me in construing the word "dwelling-house" in its reasonable sense, that the house the claimant inhabits is the mansion-house and not the house over the stables. He is in the same position as many other people who inhabit a dwelling-house and carry on their business in a shop or office elsewhere. It appears to me that the claimant's dwelling-house is the house in which he sleeps and takes his meals day by day.

Mr Blackburn says that he is required to live in the mansion-house as part of his services. In that view he inhabits a dwelling-house by virtue of his service, but the dwelling-house is occupied by the master under whom he serves. I am of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment ought to be recalled.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I think this is a very narrow case, but I am not prepared to differ from your Lordships.

---

* The Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3, enacted,—"Where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."

[1] Adair v. Murray, Nov. 9, 1874, 2 R. 11; Rogers on Elections, vol. i. p. 93.

[2] Sim v. Galt, Nov. 22, 1892, 20 R. 84.

No. 30.

Nov. 19, 1895. Campbell v. Morris.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to expunge the name of Andrew Morris from the register of voters.

DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 31.

Nov. 19, 1895. Stirling v. Fletcher.

HUGH AUSTIN STIRLING, Objector (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie—Lyon Mackenzie.

WILLIAM FLETCHER, Claimant (Respondent).—Younger.

Election Law—Lodger Franchise—Claim and declaration—Presumption—Wilful refusal of claimant to answer citation as witness—The Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 16), sec. 14.—The Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, by section 14, enacted,—"In the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger, the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall, for the purposes of revision, be prima facie evidence of his qualification."

A person, claiming the lodger franchise in respect of a bedroom occupied by him in his father's house, produced at the Registration Court a notice of claim accompanied by the statutory declaration. The claim was objected to upon the allegation that the claimant had no contract with his father. The objector proposed to prove this by the evidence of the claimant himself, whom he had duly cited to attend. The claimant having failed to attend the diet, the Sheriff continued the case to an adjourned diet, to which the claimant was again cited. The claimant again failed to attend, and the objector led no evidence against the claim. The Sheriff sustained the claim.

In a special case obtained by the objector, the Sheriff stated that he considered himself bound by the case of Dalgleish v. Dodds, 22 R. 198, to admit the claim, otherwise he would have held the claimant as confessed, and rejected it.

The Court held that the case of Dalgleish v. Dodds did not apply, and (diss. Lord Kincairney) that the Sheriff should have given effect to his view of the evidence and refused the claim.

Observations upon Dalgleish v. Dodds, Dec. 12, 1894, 22 R. 198, and Weir v. Blackwood, Oct. 19, 1869, 8 Macph. 3.

Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney.

AT a Registration Court for the Eastern Division of the county of Renfrew held on 5th October 1895, William Fletcher, druggist, claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters as a lodger, in respect of a bedroom occupied by him in his father's house at 45 Albert Road, Crosshill. The declaration annexed to the claim was in the statutory terms, and was duly certified.

The claim having been objected to and admitted, the Sheriff (Cheyne), at the request of the objector, stated a special case for the opinion of the Appeal Court. The case stated as follows:—"Hugh Austin Stirling, writer, residing at 188 Albert Road, Pollokshields East, a voter on the Roll, objected to the claim on the grounds that the claimant was not the sole tenant of the bedroom mentioned in his claim, that he had no contract with his father, and that the bedroom was not of sufficient value. He stated that he proposed to substantiate the objection by the evidence of the claimant himself, whom he had duly cited to attend the Court.

"The claimant did not appear in obedience to the citation, and Mr Robert Bird, writer, Glasgow, who attended as his mandatory, stated that he was unaware of the reason of his non-appearance.

"Thereupon the objector moved that the claim should be rejected,

No. 31.
Nov. 19, 1895.
Stirling v. Fletcher.

in respect of the claimant's non-appearance after citation. On the other hand, Mr Bird moved that the claim should be admitted, in respect the objector had led no evidence to rebut the statutory presumption.

"I continued the case to an adjourned Court to be held on 10th October 1895, stating that I would consider what course I ought to adopt if the claimant was cited to such adjourned Court and again failed to attend.

"At the adjourned Court held on 10th October 1895 at Paisley, the objector produced letters of second diligence and execution of citation against the claimant to attend thereat, under certification of being held as confessed, but the claimant did not attend personally, and no satisfactory excuse for his absence was offered by his agent. The objector tendered no further evidence.

"I admitted the claim, stating that I did so reluctantly, and merely because, on full consideration, I thought the case of Dalgleish v. Dodds, Dec. 12, 1894, 22 R. 198, obliged me to take that course; and that, but for the decision in that case, I would, in accordance with previous practice, have held the claimant as confessed, and rejected his claim, because of the disrespect which he had shewn to the Court in disobeying the two citations given to him.

"The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal is:—Does the wilful failure of a lodger claimant to obey a citation given him to appear at the Court in order to be examined as a witness in support of an objection taken to his claim entitle the Sheriff presiding at the Court to hold him as confessed, and to reject his claim?"

"If this question is answered in the affirmative, the name of the said William Fletcher will fall to be expunged from the register of voters."

Argued for the appellant;—The case of Dalgleish[1] was inapplicable. In it the statutory declaration stood uncontradicted because the evidence relied on to rebut the statutory presumption was held to be incompetent. It had been held[2] that the failure of a claimant to appear and produce his title on a second citation justified the Sheriff in rejecting his claim, and in that case it was assumed that certification would have been competent. The obvious inference to be drawn from the claimant's failure to answer the citation was that his claim was unfounded, and the Sheriff ought to have taken this into account.

Argued for the respondent;—The letters of second diligence under certification were incompetent. The statute which regulated the citation of witnesses in the Registration Court, viz., the Burgh Voters (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 58)—extended to counties by the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. cap. 3), section 8 (6)—empowered the Sheriff, by section 24, to grant warrant to cite witnesses, and by section 38 to impose a penalty for wilful failure to obey the citation. He had no power to substitute refusal of the franchise for the penalty provided by the Act. The question in Weir v. Blackwood[2] arose under the County Voters (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 83), which contained no provision like section 14 of the Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885. Failure to answer a single citation was not sufficient,[3] and there was

[1] Dalgleish v. Dodds, Dec. 12, 1894, 22 R. 198.
[2] Weir v. Blackwood, Oct. 19, 1869, 8 Macph. 3.
[3] M'Gowan v. Mather, Nov. 15, 1879, 7 R. 46.

No. 31.
Nov. 19, 1895.
Stirling v. Fletcher.

no reason why failure to answer a second citation should be. It was clear from Dalgleish's[1] case that if the claimant did not appear, and the objector led no evidence, the statutory presumption stood undisplaced. Moreover, the question could not be answered in any way which could lead to an operative decree. This Court had no power to decide anything except the answer to the question stated in the case.[2]

LORD TRAYNER.—The question of law put to us in this case is not stated in such a form as to enable us to give any definite answer to it one way or the other. It is impossible to lay down any abstract rule to the effect that if a claimant wilfully abstains from appearing before the Sheriff when his claim is under consideration, the Sheriff must always in consideration of that fact alone reject the claim. On the other hand there may be circumstances in which the Sheriff would be justified in rejecting a claim in respect of the wilful absence of the claimant.

But there is matter enough in the statement of this case to enable us, I think, to decide the real question which has been raised. The facts are shortly these. The claimant, having lodged his claim, appeared upon the Court day, not personally, but by an agent who held his mandate. The objector to his claim stated that he proposed to substantiate his objection by the evidence of the claimant himself, whom he had duly cited to attend. The Sheriff evidently thought that the claimant was bound to appear personally in answer to the citation, and continued the case to an adjourned diet in order that he might do so, intimating that if the claimant did not appear at the adjourned diet he would consider what course he ought to adopt in respect of his failure. The claimant was thus warned that he was required to attend to give evidence on the subject of his claim. He was cited to the adjourned diet by a citation which bore that if he failed to attend he would be held as confessed. At the adjourned diet the claimant again failed to appear, but was represented by an agent, who did not give any satisfactory reason for the claimant's absence, but argued that he was not bound to attend.

The Sheriff says he was prepared in that state of the facts to reject the claim, but admitted it because he thought he was bound to do so by the decision of the Court in the case of Dalgleish.[1] I think the Sheriff was mistaken in his view of that case. What we decided there was that the evidence tendered by the objector was incompetent, and did not displace the prima facie presumption arising from the statutory declaration. In that case the objector no doubt had cited the claimant as a witness, but in his absence preferred to go on and finish his case without insisting on the attendance of the claimant. That was just the case of a man with an important witness not present going on, and taking the risk of proving his case. I do not doubt, however, that if an objector says he requires the personal presence of the claimant in order to establish an objection to the claim, the claimant is bound to appear, and if he fails to do so wilfully it is right that he should be held as confessed. Such a judgment would not, in my opinion, proceed to any extent upon the ground that the claimant had been guilty of contempt of Court in not obeying his citation, but upon the implied confession that he could not support his claim by his evidence—in short, that the statement on which the claim was based was not true.

[1] 22 R. 198.
[2] Maitland v. M'Credie, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 288.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff's decision in the case should be reversed.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur in what Lord Trayner has said about the case of Dalgleish.[1] I think it does not apply, and need not have prevented the Sheriff from deciding this case according to his own judgment. But beyond that, I regret that I am unable to concur, and am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff should be allowed to stand. The case is of considerable importance, for our judgment will refuse the franchise to forty claimants, and we are told besides that our judgment is desired for guidance in the future. Being of such importance I regret that the question has not been presented in a more satisfactory form. It is not proposed to remit the case for amendment, and if we merely deal with the question which the Sheriff has put,—and I doubt whether we have a right to do more,—I do not see how the judgment can be touched, for it will stand whether we answer the question in the affirmative or in the negative. The Sheriff puts the question whether he was entitled,—that is to say, whether he had the power,—to refuse the claim. If we answer in the negative, that is in accordance with the judgment; but if we answer that he had the power to refuse the claim that would apparently be a totally ineffectual judgment, seeing that the Sheriff has not in fact exercised his power. That no doubt is a technical difficulty. But in a question affecting so many interests I doubt whether we should disregard it. Again, we are accustomed in this Court to consider facts found by the Sheriff, and not the effect of evidence. But here no facts are found except that the claimant has made the statutory declaration, and that he has failed to appear in obedience to citation.

But supposing these difficulties in point of form to be surmounted, then I am of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment is right on the merits. The claimant's application was supported by the usual declaration, and it is enacted by the 14th section of the Act of 1885, 48 Vict. c. 16, that "in the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall for the purposes of revision be prima facie evidence of his qualification." The claimant had therefore some evidence—prima facie evidence only no doubt, open to be rebutted—but such as, unless rebutted by counter evidence, gave him an unquestionable right to be enrolled.

I am of opinion that that is the sole evidence in the case, which indeed is obvious, because the objector led no evidence at all. I think that the statutory evidence for the claimant should therefore receive effect.

But it is said that because the claimant was twice cited by the objector and failed to appear his claim should be refused. The Sheriff suggests that the claim should be rejected by way of punishment for his contempt of Court. I see no reason why he should be denied the franchise because he was disrespectful to the Court. But then it is said that it is to be inferred as matter of fact from his non-appearance that his claim was bad.

[1] 22 R. 198.

No. 31.

Nov. 19, 1895. Stirling v. Fletcher.

The Sheriff has not drawn that inference in fact, and I do not think that it can be legitimately drawn. The claim is objected to on the ground that the claimant has no contract with his father such as his claim alleges, and also that the alleged lodging was not of the requisite value. I cannot see that it can be assumed that there was no contract, or that the premises were not of the requisite value, merely because the claimant failed to appear. The objections were not such as were incapable of being supported by other evidence. The absence of contract might have been proved by the claimant's father, and the value of the lodging by any skilled evidence, and the objector might have secured the evidence of the claimant himself had he used the means which the law puts in his power. He did not take the trouble to do that, and is it to be said that, while he makes no effort to use the rights which the law supplies, the statutory presumption is to be defeated by a counter presumption of which the statute makes no mention? I cannot assent to that.

But then the letters of second diligence contained a certification that if the claimant did not appear he would be held as confessed. I doubt the propriety of inserting that certification in the letters, but I think it makes no difference. It is merely a warning that if the claimant did not appear the Sheriff would do something which I think he had no right to do, and which in point of fact he did not do, but which Lord Trayner proposes that the Court should do now. The mere announcement of the intention of the Judge to pronounce a particular judgment will not validate it unless the judgment is right in itself.

As to the authorities quoted, I would only say that I think that the case of Dalgleish[1] does not apply, for the reasons explained by Lord Trayner, and I am clear that the other cases do not apply for the simple reason that they were all prior to the Act of 1885. With regard to the case of Weir v. Blackwood,[2] I would only say that I do not question that judgment. The case was as to the right of a person to remain on the roll as a proprietor. It was objected that he had no title, and as he produced none, it was quite legitimate to hold, in accordance with a familiar maxim, that as none appeared none existed, and that was a ground sufficient for judgment.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff should be approved and the claim sustained.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with Lord Trayner. I know of no general rule which requires that a claim to vote as a lodger must be rejected because the claimant has not obeyed a citation. But the facts to which Lord Trayner has called attention appear to me to justify the conclusion to which his Lordship has come, and to which the Sheriff desired to come, that in this case the claimant should be held as confessed.

I think it material to observe that the objection is based on an averment of fact, of which the testimony of the claimant would be the best evidence, namely, that there was no contract between him and his father. No doubt the father also might have been called to speak to that fact. But the objector was quite entitled to say that he would prove his case out of the claimant's own mouth, and that he desired no further evidence. The question for the Sheriff seems to me to have been, what inference in fact should be drawn from the claimant's conduct in the circumstances set forth in the case. That is not a question for us, but it involves a question of law, namely, whether the claimant's failure to obey the citation was a fact to be taken into account. I think it ought to have been taken into account; and therefore I cannot assent to the view that there was no evidence before the Sheriff which was admissible to rebut the prima facie evidence of the declaration. There was no oral testimony, but there were very material facts properly before the Court tending to shew that the declaration could not be true; and, whether they are conclusive evidence or not, such facts are evidence. It is just as legitimate for the objector to found on the claimant's disobedience to the citation as it would have been to found upon his conduct if he had been put into the box and had refused to answer a single question.

[1] 22 R. 198. [2] 8 Macph. 3.

No. 31.

Nov. 19, 1895. Stirling v. Fletcher.

Now, if in these circumstances the Sheriff had inferred, as matter of fact, that the claimant could not dispute the allegations of the objector, I should have thought that a perfectly reasonable decision, and at all events a decision which this Court ought not to disturb. But unfortunately the Sheriff gives a reason for holding the claimant confessed which cannot possibly be sustained. The claimant's disrespect towards the Court is no reason whatever for rejecting his claim. Contempt of Court may be punished, if it is grave enough to merit punishment, but it cannot possibly affect the judgment of the Court on the merits. And that creates the only difficulty I have felt in disposing of this appeal.

It is not the function of this Court to find facts on evidence, and the question is whether we have a sufficient finding in fact by the Sheriff. But I agree with Lord Trayner that there is enough in the case to shew that the Sheriff would have rejected the claim as not proved if he had not thought himself bound to decide otherwise by the decision in the case of Dalgleish.[1] He says he would have held the claimant confessed, and that means that he would have held his persistent refusal to come forward and give evidence as equivalent to an admission that he could not deny the facts that had been adduced against his claim. I think that would have been a perfectly right decision; and, if so, it seems to me that the only question we have to consider is whether the reason given by the Sheriff for deciding otherwise is valid or not. Now, I agree with your Lordships that the case of Dalgleish[1] has no bearing whatever on the question. It appears that in that case a claimant did not appear in answer to his citation as a witness. But the Sheriff was not moved to reject the claim on that ground alone, and did not do so. The objector proceeded to lead evidence against the claim, and the question stated for this Court was whether the evidence so adduced was competent, and the case decides nothing more than that it was not competent, and ought not to have been received. The point seems to be that it appears incidentally that the claimant's failure to obey a citation was not treated as conclusive against him. Now, that may have been perfectly right, for the conclusions to be drawn from the claimant's conduct must depend on the circumstances of the case. But whether it was right or wrong was not the question before this Court. The circumstances of the

[1] 22 R. 198.

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1895. M'Lachlan v. Bell.

and according to the pursuer, what he is told by the bankrupt is, that the room contained effects belonging entirely to the pursuer. Was the judicial factor bound to accept that, and to desist from verifying the statement of the bankrupt? It appears to me that that is entirely out of the question. The bankrupt is not a person whose word is to be final as to what are the contents of particular rooms, and, accordingly, I think it clear that this judicial factor was entitled to prosecute his mission and examine the house for the purpose of preserving the estate. I think therefore that he was entitled, if the door was locked, to make his way in by forcing the lock.

If that be the case, the claim for damages falls to the ground, for the pursuer has no case such as this, that, assuming the judicial factor to be lawfully in the room, he proceeded to do something unlawful, namely, to damage and injure her property. Her case falls to the ground completely, if her proposition in law is bad, namely, that the judicial factor had not the right to force his way into the room. It seems to me also that that being the legal act complained of, it is not an act giving a claim of damages to the bankrupt's wife, for non constat upon this record that the wife suffers any damage at all. If the opening of the place was an invasion of the legal rights of anybody, it was the farmer whose door was forced open that has a right to complain. I think this action is clearly irrelevant, and that on the shewing of the pursuer no legal wrong has been done.

Lord Adam.—I am of the same opinion. This is the case of a judicial factor appointed on a bankrupt estate, and, as we all know, that is not a common appointment, and is only made in cases of emergency where it is necessary to preserve the bankrupt's estate until the appointment of a trustee. I am of opinion that it was the duty of the judicial factor so appointed to take possession of and inventory the whole of the bankrupt's estate, and that, when he was in this house, and legally in this house, it was his duty to see and inventory and take possession of the whole contents of the house. It was no reason for his not doing so that someone came forward and said, "These particular articles in the bankrupt's house do not belong to him." It might be so, but he had nothing to do with that. The articles were in the bankrupt's house, and presumably in his possession at the moment. I think the factor would not have been doing his duty if he had not taken possession of the whole articles which presumably were in the bankrupt's possession at the time. If in the performance of his duty he came to a locked door in the house, was he to take the bankrupt's word, or the bankrupt's wife's word, that that room contained property belonging exclusively to her? I think he would not have been doing his duty to the estate if he had remained satisfied with that declaration. It was his duty to see and to inventory what was in that room, and accordingly it was in the discharge of his duty that he had the door opened. What is fatal to the pursuer's case is that the room, if it was in possession of anyone, was in possession of the husband. If anyone was injured, it was not the bankrupt's wife but the bankrupt. I suppose the husband and the judicial factor in his place could have opened the room if they liked. Where then is the legal wrong to the wife? I cannot see it. It was not

No. 32.

Nov. 20, 1895.
M'Lachlan v. Bell.

the wife's door that was broken open, it was a door in the possession of the husband, the bankrupt. I therefore agree with your Lordship that we must assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action. I do not think that the cases cited to us by Mr Smith as to the duties of sheriff-officers and messengers-at-arms have anything to do with the case.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defender.

GEO. MESTON LEYS, Solicitor—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 33.

Nov. 20, 1895.*
Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

GIRVIN, ROPER, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Jameson—Burnet.
ANDREW TAIT MONTEITH, Defender (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell—W. Thomson.

Foreign—Principal and Agent—Mercantile Agency—Liability of undisclosed foreign principal on contract made by agent.—A foreign principal sent an order to an agent in Scotland in the following terms:—"Buy cargo Californian wheat well forward immediately remittance ready telegraph."

The agent, without further communication with the principal, went to London and purchased a cargo of wheat from a grain merchant there, under a contract which contained a stipulation that for the purposes of legal proceedings "this contract shall be deemed to have been made in England to be performed there . . . and the Courts of England shall have exclusive jurisdiction over the disputes which may arise under this contract. Such disputes shall be settled according to the law of England. . . ."

The merchant knew that the agent was acting for a foreign principal, but did not know the principal's name. The agent having failed to pay the price the wheat was resold by the merchant, who then brought an action in Scotland for the loss sustained on the resale against the principal, whose name he had ascertained, and against whom he had founded jurisdiction by arrestments. The defender pleaded that he was not liable to be sued on the contract, in respect that he had not given the agent authority to make him a party to the contract. Held (1) that the question whether the foreign principal was liable to be sued on the contract was a dispute arising under the contract, and fell to be determined according to the law of England; (2) that according to that law a foreign principal was not bound by the contract of his agent unless he had given the agent authority to make him a party to the contract; and (3) that the order contained nothing which amounted to such an authority—and defender assoilzied.

Opinions reserved as to whether on the question of the liability of a foreign principal the laws of England and Scotland are identical.

Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Company, 18 R. 975, commented on.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

ON 2d June 1894 Girvin, Roper, & Company, grain-merchants, London, raised an action against Andrew Tait Monteith, who was resident in British Columbia, but against whom jurisdiction had been founded by arrestment.

The action was for payment of £2122, 11s. 2d. in name of damages for breach of a contract alleged to have been made by Younger & Monteith on the defender's behalf.

The material facts in the case as ascertained by proof were as follows:—

On 18th December 1893 the defender sent instructions by telegraph

* Decided Nov. 13, 1895.

No. 33.
Nov. 20, 1895.
Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

to Younger & Monteith, who were grain-merchants, George Street, Edinburgh, in the following terms:—"Buy cargo Californian wheat well forward immediately remittance ready telegraph." The defender did not give Younger & Monteith any instructions in connection with this order, except those contained in the telegram.

Mr Younger, the sole partner of Younger & Monteith, on 19th December 1893 went to the office in London of Messrs Dowker & Company, corn-brokers, and instructed them to buy the required cargo of wheat. Messrs Dowker then purchased from the pursuers a cargo at the price of £11,803.

The substance of the telegram was communicated to the pursuers, and they knew that Younger & Monteith were acting for a foreign principal, but the name of the principal was neither asked for nor given. The name of Younger & Monteith was inserted in the contract as apparent principals.

The contract was in the following terms, inter alia:—"London, Decr. 19th, 1893.—Bought of Messrs Girvin, Roper, & Co., London, for a/c of Messrs Younger & Monteith, Edinburgh, through Messrs A. Dowker & Co., London, on the printed conditions and rules endorsed on this contract. A cargo of.....Californian wheat . . . Buyer and seller agree that, for the purpose of proceedings either legal or by arbitration, this contract shall be deemed to have been made in England to be performed there, any correspondence in reference to the offer, the acceptance, the place of payment or otherwise notwithstanding, and the Courts of England or arbitrators appointed in England, as the case may be, shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any award made in pursuance of the arbitration clause hereof, have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes which may arise under this contract. Such disputes shall be settled according to the law of England, whatever the domicile of the parties to this contract may be or become. . . ."

The cargo was deliverable at any safe port in the United Kingdom, with an option to the purchaser to send the ship to certain ports on the Continent. The price was to be paid by cash in London in exchange for shipping documents, or at seller's option by buyer's acceptance of shipper's or seller's "drafts domiciled in London," with documents attached.

The pursuers took a bill from Younger & Monteith for the price, and the shipping documents were made out in their favour. On the arrival of the cargo Younger & Monteith failed to take up the documents and to meet their acceptance.

The pursuers then resold the cargo at a loss of £2122, 11s. 2d.

On 31st March they wrote to Younger & Monteith that they had called upon the defender to pay the loss, but that he repudiated liability. "If he is successful in this repudiation we shall, of course, look to you."

The pursuers, on 5th April, rendered to Younger & Monteith a debit note for the loss, and intimated that, in the event of the same not being paid, they would "take all necessary steps for the recovery of the same."

They afterwards raised the present action against the defender.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defender having broken the contract entered into by his agents on his behalf, is liable in the damages occasioned by the breach. (5) The question as to the liability of the defender to the pursuers not being a question arising

No. 33.

Nov. 20, 1895. Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

on the interpretation of the said contract of sale, the provisions of the said contract regarding the law of England are inapplicable.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The defender having given no authority to Messrs Younger & Monteith to pledge his credit, and the contract having been entered into with them as principals, according to the custom in the foreign trade and the law of England, the defender is not liable to be sued thereon by the pursuers.

Evidence was led as to the English law on the subject of foreign principals, the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord M'Laren.

On 3d April 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) sustained the fourth plea in law for the defender, and assoilzied him.*

"OPINION.—(After narrating facts)—There is no dispute as to the breach of contract, nor as to the measure of damages; but the defence is that the defender gave no express authority to Younger & Monteith to pledge his credit to the pursuers; that, without such authority (he being a foreign principal) his credit was not, and could not be pledged; and therefore that by the law of England (which the defender says must rule) the pursuers have no recourse or action against him.

"The first question thus comes to be, whether the law of England is to rule. If in this, as in so many branches of the law merchant, the laws of England and Scotland were identical, the question would be one of merely academic interest. But I am by no means satisfied that they are. After a careful examination of the dicta in Millar v. Mitchell, 22 D. 833, and of the judgment of the First Division in Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Company, 18 R. 975, it rather seems to me that the law of Scotland admits to a very modified extent the presumption which exists in England, that the credit of a foreign principal is not pledged in a contract made by an agent at home. The latter case in particular (as I read it) practically comes to this, that the presumption (if it exists at all) is displaced by evidence of the mere fact of agency. It therefore becomes a question of practical importance to determine which law is to be applied.

"Now, the written contract of 19th December 1893 provides that for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, the contract shall be deemed to have been made in England and to be performed there, that the Courts of England shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes which may arise under it, and that such disputes shall be settled according to the law of England, whatever the domicile of the parties to the contract may be or become. Is this, then, a dispute arising under the contract? If it is, the pursuers themselves have stipulated that it shall be settled according to the law of England. I cannot doubt that it is. The pursuers' right of action depends on the contract; they have no other. It is said that the question is not one as to the interpretation of the contract, but one depending on the collateral contract of agency between the defender and Younger & Monteith. No doubt the contract of agency must be examined, but only for the purpose of determining whether the defender is liable on the contract of sale, and the results derived from an examination of the one contract must be applied to the other before any conclusion can be reached. I am unable to hold that the question who is liable on a contract can ever be anything but a dispute arising under that contract. But the pursuer urges another argument against the applicability of English law. He says:—'Be it that this is a dispute arising under the contract, it is a question depending for its solution upon a presumption, and presumptions, being truly a part of the law of evidence, are to be determined by the lex fori.' Now, nobody doubts that when the Courts of one country are called upon to adjudicate upon a contract made in another, they must be guided by their own rules of procedure and of proof. The well-known

No. 33.

Nov. 20, 1895. Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The question which had arisen was not a dispute "under" the contract of sale.[1] It had no concern with the interpretation or effect of that contract, or the rights and incidents arising from it. The question was whether the defender was a party to the contract. That was anterior to and outside the contract itself, and not "under" it. It arose rather under the contract of agency between the defender and Younger & Monteith, and it fell, therefore, to be determined by the law of Scotland, the agents being domiciled in Scotland. If the law of Scotland were applicable, then as soon as agency was proved the principal was liable whether he were a home principal or a foreign principal. The Lord Ordinary was right in the view he took of the effect of the Scots decisions on that point.[2] Even if it were held that the action had to be determined by the law of England, the telegram from the defender to his agents satisfied the requirements of that law. It was intended that the telegram should be shewn to wheat sellers, and the words "remittance ready," meant that the full price was ready case of Don v. Lippman, in 1837 (2 Sh. & Macl. 682), settled that these rules include local laws relating to prescription. But that is on the ground that whatever relates to the remedy, as distinguished from the substance of the obligation itself, is to be governed by the lex fori; and Lord Brougham was at pains to shew (pp. 728-9) that the parties could not at the time of making the contract have had the remedy in view, because in that case they would have been contemplating, not the performance of the contract, but the breach of it. Even as regards prescription the rule would seem to be different where the set period, as in the case of the septennial limitation of cautionary obligations, is of the essence of the contract (Alexander v. Badenach, 1843, 6 D. 322). Now, it seems to me that the question whether a foreign principal, known to exist though undisclosed as to identity, has rendered himself liable under a contract, is a question which relates not to the remedy but to the nature of the obligation, and, moreover, is one which the parties must have had in view as among those which they agreed should be determined according to the lex loci contractus. In resorting to that law this Court is not called upon to violate any of its own curial rules, any more than the House of Lords did in Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery Co. (L. R. 1894, App. Ca. 202), when effect was given to an English clause of reference to arbiters unnamed. All it has to do is to inquire, according to its own rules, and by evidence satisfactory to itself, whether a presumption existing in the law by which the parties contracted has or has not been overcome. I therefore hold that the law of England must be applied.

---

"I was favoured with some interesting evidence on that law, which, of course, I am bound to treat as a question of fact. The result seems to me to be this, that a presumption exists in that law against the credit of a foreign principal being pledged in any contract made by his agent in this country, and that the presumption can only be overcome by evidence of authority to do so. I refrain from saying express authority, though that phrase has the high authority of Lord Blackburn, because Mr Boyd, the pursuers' skilled witness, demurred to it; and certainly he adduced, in the course of his very able review of the cases, strong reasons for holding that the authority may be implied either from the terms of employment as agent, or from a course of dealing. But I think it is plain that the authority, if not express, must be implied from something much more direct than the

---

[1] Maspons y Hermano v. Mildred, 1882, L. R., 9 Q. B. D. 530; Piercy v. Young, 1879, L. R., 14 Ch. Div. 200.

[2] Millar v. Mitchell, Feb. 17, 1860, 22 D. 833, 32 Scot. Jur. 346; Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co., June 19, 1891, 18 R. 975.

No. 33.

Nov. 20, 1895.
Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

to be forwarded by the foreign principal, the true buyer. The principal hoped by using these words to induce a sale, and that was tantamount to an authority to the agent to pledge his—the principal's—credit.

Argued for the defender;—The contract on which the pursuers laid their action was the contract of sale. The defender disputed his liability on that contract, and that was clearly a dispute arising "under" it. The question, therefore, by the agreement of parties, fell to be determined by the law of England. By that law there was a presumption against the liability of a foreign undisclosed principal. To overcome that it was necessary to prove a distinct authority to the agent to pledge the principal's credit.[1] It was impossible to spell out of the telegram any such authority. The Scots law was really to the same effect, but assuming that the presumption was not so strong, there was no warrant for the inference drawn by the Lord Ordinary in the cases cited by his Lordship that proof of agency was sufficient to rebut the presumption.

---

mere fact of agency. I am not concerned to inquire what the origin of the presumption was. Some lawyers have referred it to the improbability of the English merchant giving credit to the foreigner. Others have viewed it rather from the foreigner's standpoint. Perhaps it partakes of both elements; but whatever may have been the original motive, the rule has come to tell quite as much in favour of the foreigner as of the merchant at home.

"Has the presumption, then, been overcome in this case? On that point I am simply exercising the functions of a jury, subject to what I think would be the direction of an English Judge, viz., that it cannot be overcome merely by the fact of agency. There was here no general appointment and no course of dealing. There was simply the telegram instructing the particular purchase. In the case of Hutton v. Bulloch, L. R., 9 Q. B. 576, Lord Esher (then Mr Justice Brett) says,—'It is now settled that it is not in ordinary course for the foreign merchant to authorise the English merchant to bind him to the English contract.' Can I imply from the words in the telegram, 'remittance ready,' that the defender, contrary to 'ordinary course,' authorised Younger & Monteith to pledge his credit to the pursuers? I think not. I regard these words as merely an assurance to the agent that the price (or the difference in case of loss on a resale) would be forthcoming. Such an assurance might make the agent more ready to undertake the liabilities of a principal (as in point of fact he did), but it did not, I think, express or imply any willingness on the part of the foreign principal to establish privity of contract with the English seller.

"That, I think, is sufficient for the decision of the case in favour of the defender. If Younger & Monteith had had authority to pledge the defender's credit, I do not think it would have been necessary to shew that they did in fact pledge it by express words. Neither do I think that the pursuers would have lost their right to sue the defender by sending the debit note of 5th April to Younger & Monteith after they knew the defender's identity. No doubt there is a duty of election in such circumstances, but according to the evidence of the defender's skilled witnesses it is not made irrevocably by such a proceeding.

"One point only remains to be dealt with. It was argued for the pursuers that the English presumption against the liability of a foreign principal applies only where the agent is subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts. There is no decision to that effect, and I doubt whether an agent in Scotland can be regarded as a foreigner in the same sense as a

---

[1] Hutton v. Bulloch, 1874, 9 Q. B. 572, Brett, J., at p. 576; Elbinger Actien Gesellschaft v. Claye, 1873, 8 Q. B. 313.

No. 33. At advising,—

Nov. 20, 1895. Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case raises an interesting question in relation to the liability of an undisclosed foreign principal upon contracts entered into on his behalf by an agent in this country. (His Lordship then narrated the facts.)

Now, even if there were more doubt as to the proper locus of this contract than I can entertain, I should hold that the parties had settled the question for themselves by agreeing that the contract should be treated for all purposes as a contract made in England and to be performed there. This is in legal effect as if the parties had set forth a summary of the known rules of the law of principal and agent as administered by the Courts of England, with this addition,—"We agree that these rules shall be incorporated with our contract, and shall regulate the rights and liabilities arising under it." I do not know that the law has set any limit to the right of parties to interpret their contracts by setting up systems of rules which are made part of the particular contract, and it is no objection to such a system or scheme of interpretation that the law of England is made the canon of interpretation rather than a private code; because wherever the contract has to be enforced, the law of England applicable to the question in dispute can always be ascertained. If this were taken to be to certain effects a contract to be performed in Scotland, I should still be of opinion that the rights arising out of it are governed by the law of England, because the parties have so agreed. But independently of agreement I have no doubt that it is an English contract. London is known to be a principal centre of the corn trade, and when the defender telegraphed to his agent and principal in Vancouver. The language of English Judges when dealing with this subject has often been wide enough to cover the case of an agent residing in the United Kingdom. Neither do I see why a foreign principal should be thought more likely to give authority for the pledging of his credit because his agent resides in a different part of the United Kingdom from that in which the third party resides. But in this case, I think, the agent made himself subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts by the terms of the contract. When I put some questions to Mr Boyd about the practice of the English Courts with regard to service out of the jurisdiction, I had not observed the clause in the contract providing that any party to the contract residing either in Scotland or Ireland was, for the purpose of legal proceedings, to be held as residing at the offices of the London or Liverpool Corn Trade Association, and that service of proceedings there was to be deemed good service. I cannot doubt that this imported a consent by Younger & Monteith to waive any objection to the jurisdiction of the English Courts, and, of course, any judgment obtained against them in England could have been carried into effect under the Judgments Extension Act.

---

"I would only add that the question here is much more than a technicality. The defender is undoubtedly liable to Younger & Monteith, but he has claims against them which, so far as I see, he could not plead against the pursuers, because the law of England seems to be that a plaintiff suing an undisclosed principal is not liable to have the state of accounts between the principal and the agent pleaded against him unless he has, by his conduct, induced the principal to alter his position prejudicially by payments made subsequent to the contract. Here the payments were all antecedent to the contract, and were in no way affected by any action on the part of the pursuers."

former partner instructing him to buy a cargo of wheat he did not mean that the purchase was to be made in Edinburgh, but rather wherever an advantageous bargain could be made, and subject to all the usual conditions. Mr Younger, as I conceive, was entitled to make the purchase in the London market, and for a price payable there. In this view also the law of England is applicable to the rights arising under the contract.

I now come to the particular question as to which the parties are in dispute. It is this—The sellers, Messrs Girvin, Roper, & Company, having discovered that Younger had a principal behind him, are suing Monteith, and they claim to be entitled to do so under the rule which in general gives to the party enforcing a contract made with an undisclosed principal an election to sue either the principal or the agent who represented him in making the contract. In defence it is pleaded that a foreign principal is not liable to be sued on the contract, unless he has given authority to his agent to make him a party to the contract. I am not now quoting from the defender's pleas; I am not sure that I should agree with any of the defender's propositions in the precise terms in which they are stated. But I am putting in my own words the substance of what was maintained in the argument addressed to us.

If this proposition be true, then the action must fail; because at the time the contract of sale was made between the pursuers and Mr Younger, Mr Younger's only authority to act for the defender was the telegram I have quoted. Now, as I read this order, it neither empowers the addressee to make his principal a party to the contract of purchase and sale, nor inhibits him from so doing, but simply instructs the agent to make a contract in the usual form. The question then is, what is the true doctrine of the law of England regarding the liability of a foreign principal. The authorities have been very distinctly brought before us in the statements of the English counsel who gave evidence on this subject. I am glad to be able to say that there is less difference of view in the opinions of these learned gentlemen than we often find in cases of expert evidence, and this is only what I should expect from members of the bar when giving their opinions on a case. But, of course, it is necessary that we should consider the authorities; and without entering on a discussion, which I conceive to be unnecessary for the purposes of the present case, I accept the statement of Lord Esher, quoted by the Lord Ordinary, as entirely satisfactory and sufficient, with reference to the question I am considering. "It is now settled that it is not in ordinary course for the foreign merchant to authorise the English merchant to bind him to the English contract"—Hutton v. Bulloch.[1] From this it follows that an order to purchase a cargo, expressed in the general terms which I have read, would not amount to an authority to make the foreign principal a party to the English contract, and therefore there is no relation of contract between the pursuers and the defender. This is my opinion on the merits of the case.

While my opinion on all essential points is in entire agreement with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary under review, I should desire to reserve my opinion on the question first considered by his Lordship, viz., whether on the question of the liability of the foreign principal the laws of England and Scotland are identical. The Lord Ordinary observes, under reference to the cases of Millar v. Mitchell,[1] and Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Company,[2] that the law of Scotland "admits to a very modified extent the presumption which exists in England that the credit of a foreign principal is not pledged in a contract made by an agent at home." Now, there can be no doubt that the known principles of the law of Scotland in relation to mercantile agency are largely founded on the decisions of the English Courts of law; and it was certainly not my intention, nor, so far as I know, the intention of any of my colleagues who took part in the decision of the case of Bennett,[2] to introduce a new distinction between the laws of England and Scotland in relation to principal and agent. In the judgment the question of the principal's title to sue is treated as a question of general mercantile law or usage. It was not a case of singular employment like the present; there was a standing agreement in writing between the principal in Australia and his agent in London, under which the powers of the agent were carefully limited, and his accountability to his principal defined; and we were of opinion that in such a case the principal was in the position of a party to the contracts made for him by his agent, although his name was not immediately disclosed. It may be inferred from my opinion in Bennett's[2] case that I am not prepared to subscribe to an expression attributed to Lord Blackburn to the effect that there is a presumption of law against the foreign principal being bound. But, on a reconsideration of the English authorities, I see no reason to believe that the case of Bennett[2] would have been decided differently in England supposing the law of England were applicable, except that the question as to the extent of the agent's authority would most probably have been determined by a Judge and jury instead of by the Court. If there be any divergence of view in this class of cases I think that at most it is no more than such as occasionally occurs where co-ordinate Courts of the same country have to apply known principles of law to different states of fact.

[1] L. R., 9 Q. B. 576.

No. 33. Nov. 20, 1895. Girvin, Roper, & Co. v. Monteith.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action, and if your Lordships agree with me the reclaiming note will be refused.

The Lord President, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear concurred.

The Court adhered.

Boyd, Jameson, & Kelly, W.S.—W. & J. Burness, W.S.—Agents.

No. 34. Nov. 20, 1895. Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

The Waverley Hydropathic Company, Limited, First Parties.—Cullen.
David Barrowman and Daniel Lamond, Second Parties.—M'Clure.
John Ferguson, Third Party.—Cook.

Company—Preference Shares—Ultra vires—Allottees of illegal preference shares, not ordinary shareholders, but creditors of company.—A limited company which, by the terms of its memorandum and original articles of association, was precluded from creating preference shares, by special resolution resolved that the remaining unissued shares of the nominal capital

[1] 22 D. 833. [2] 18 R. 975.

No. 34.

Nov. 20, 1895.

Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

should be preference shares subject to these conditions: that they should bear a fixed rate of dividend; that any failure of the annual profits to meet the dividend should be made good from the profits of subsequent years; that after ten years the company had right to redeem these shares at par; that preference shareholders were not entitled to vote or take part in any meeting, or in the management of the company, or to share in the rights of ordinary shareholders. Preference shares were applied for and allotted.

In a special case presented by an allottee of preference shares and the company, the company contended that, although the preference given to these shares was invalid, the allottee was to be regarded as a holder of ordinary shares.

Held that, as the allottee of preference shares had not applied for or agreed to take ordinary shares, he was not to be regarded as an ordinary shareholder, but as a creditor of the company, and that he was entitled to repayment of the price of the shares, with interest at 4 per cent, less any dividend which he had received.

2D DIVISION.

THE WAVERLEY HYDROPATHIC COMPANY, LIMITED, were incorporated, under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, upon 28th May 1869, for the purpose of erecting a hydropathic establishment at Melrose. The memorandum of association provided,—"(Fourth) the liability of the members is limited; (fifth) the capital of the company is twelve thousand pounds sterling, divided into four hundred and eighty shares of twenty-five pounds each." The articles provided for the increase of the company's capital, but did not confer upon the company power to issue preference shares. By various resolutions duly confirmed, the nominal capital of the company in 1872 stood at £36,000, divided into 1440 shares of £25 each. Of these shares 880 were issued and fully paid up, making a paid-up capital of £22,000.

At a general meeting on 9th April 1874, by special resolution, certain amendments upon the articles of association were confirmed. They contained provisions regarding new capital, and provided, inter alia,—"(6) New capital shall be subject to all the provisions herein contained, and when paid up shall participate in all the privileges pertaining to the pre-existing capital, or the new capital may be raised by preference stock, bearing a fixed rate of dividend, as the company may then determine." The part of this article authorising the issue of preference stock was inconsistent with the memorandum and the original articles of association.

The following special resolution was passed at a general meeting of the company held on 15th April 1876, and confirmed at a subsequent general meeting held on 1st May 1876:—"That the remaining unissued 560 shares of the nominal capital of the company shall be preference shares; and that the directors may, from time to time, with the consent of a general meeting, issue such portions thereof as such meeting may authorise, subject always to the following conditions, viz.,—(1) That such preference shares shall be payable in full within one month after allotment. (2) That such preference shares shall bear a yearly rate of dividend, to be fixed by the general meeting at which such preference shares shall be authorised to be issued; and that such dividends shall be payable yearly out of the first annual profits of the company, to be expressly set apart for that purpose, before paying a dividend to the ordinary shareholders. (3) That in case the profits of any year shall not be sufficient for the payment of said preferential dividend, such profits shall be divided, so far as they will extend, among the holders of such preference shares, pari passu, and the deficiency shall be made good out of the profits of succeeding years. (4) That, for behoof of the company, the directors shall have a prior right to purchase at par, from the registered owner thereof, any of such preference shares, for which instrument of transfer may be presented for registration; or, at any time after ten years from the date of issue, the company shall have power to purchase or redeem at par any of such preference shares from the holder thereof, who shall be bound to transfer said preference shares to the company on being required to do so. (5) That, in the event of a winding-up of the company before said preference shares shall be redeemed by the company, the holders thereof shall rank pari passu and be entitled to be repaid at par said preference shares, out of the free assets of the company, with all deficiencies of dividends, should the profits in any year not be sufficient to pay the fixed rate of dividend at which such shares shall have been issued, and that in preference and priority to the holders of the ordinary shares of the company. But interest shall in no event be chargeable upon such deficiencies of dividend. (6) That such preference shares shall not entitle the holder thereof to any vote, or to be present at any meeting of the company, or to take any part in the management of the affairs of the company, or to participate in any of the rights or privileges pertaining to the ordinary shareholders under the articles of association."

No. 34.
Nov. 20, 1895.
Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

In terms of this resolution 419 of the remaining unissued 560 shares were from time to time issued by the directors with the consent of general meetings of the company as preference shares, producing a capital of £10,475. The form of application for these shares was in the following terms:—"I hereby make application for an allotment to me of preference shares of £25 each of the Waverley Hydropathic Company, Limited, at the fixed rate of dividend of 5 per cent per annum under the conditions mentioned," &c. The form of allotment was, "I beg to inform you that the directors have allotted to you preference shares of £25 each," &c. There were at the date of the special case after mentioned twenty-one persons holding in all 195 preference shares who did not hold any ordinary shares of the company. Since 31st July 1878 no dividend was paid upon the ordinary shares of the company. Dividends were from time to time paid upon the preference shares down to 1888.

In view of the fact that the original articles of association did not provide for the issue of preference shares, a question was raised in connection with a proposed scheme of reconstruction of the capital account of the company whether the issue of said shares was ultra vires of the company.

This special case was accordingly presented by (1) the Waverley Hydropathic Company, Limited; (2) David Barrowman, an original allottee of eight preference shares, and Daniel Lamond, a bona fide onerous transferee of twelve preference shares; and (3) John Ferguson, an ordinary shareholder of the company.

The second parties maintained that the shares were valid, as preferential shares, and that the holders had a preferential right to the profits and assets of the company. They maintained further that if it were found that the shares were invalid as preferential shares, then they were not ordinary shareholders but creditors of the said company to the amount paid by them for preference shares, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent from the date of such payment, less the amount of sums received by them in name of dividends upon supposed preference shares, or with such interest, if any, in addition to the said sums paid as dividends as might be reasonable; or otherwise, and in case it were found that the second parties were at present ordinary shareholders of the company, the second parties maintained that they were entitled to rescind the agreement in virtue of which they became such shareholders, and to claim repayment of the amount paid for the shares, with interest. The third party, on the other hand, maintained that it was ultra vires of the company to confer upon the holders of the said shares any preferential right, that these shares were not preference but ordinary shares, and that in any event the holders thereof by applying for and obtaining them became members of the company, with the rights and liabilities of ordinary shareholders, and were not now entitled, in respect of their delay and acquiescence, to rescind their agreement to become shareholders. The first party maintained that the second parties were not creditors of the company, but shareholders, preferential or ordinary, as the Court might determine. They also maintained that the second parties were not now entitled to rescind their agreement to become shareholders. Such rescission, if demanded and given effect to in the case of all the preference shareholders, would involve the company in insolvency.

No. 34.

Nov. 20, 1895.
Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

The following were the questions of law:—"(1) Are the said preference shares valid to the effect of entitling the second parties, as the holders thereof, to a preference over the profits and assets of the company? (2) If the first question is answered in the negative, are the second parties ordinary shareholders of the company in respect of the said shares? or (3) Are they creditors of the company to the amount paid for said shares, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of such payment, less the amount of sums received by them in name of dividends or composition for dividends upon said shares?"

Argued for the first parties;—The second parties were not creditors of the company. They were shareholders, either preferential or ordinary as might be determined. They were not entitled to rescind their agreement to become shareholders. Such a course would be disastrous to the company, and render it insolvent. Apart from this liability, the company was solvent.

Argued for the second parties;—They were not ordinary shareholders, but creditors of the company to the amount paid by them for preference shares, with interest at five per cent from the date of payment, less the amount received as dividends. The resolution to issue preference stock was ultra vires of the company, and everything following on that illegal action was null. The result of the illegality was not to alter the character of the stock from preference to ordinary stock, but to render the issue nugatory.[1] Besides, the terms of the issue were such as to negative ordinary shareholdership. But if the shares were not valid, the money paid for them must be returned.[2] If the second parties were held to be ordinary shareholders they were entitled now to rescind the contract and claim repayment on the ground of misrepresentation and essential error.

Argued for the third party;—The shares issued were the remaining unissued shares of the ordinary capital, with what purported to be

[1] Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Company v. Riche, June 1875, 7 Eng. and Ir. Ap. 653; Buckley on the Companies Acts, p. 181.

[2] In re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society, Dec. 1882, L. R., 23 Ch. Div. 440, per Jessel, M. R., p. 460.

No. 34.
Nov. 20, 1895.
Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

preferential conditions added. The allottees by accepting these became members of the company.[1] They acted as members so far as was competent to them, and drew dividends. It was no doubt now admitted that no valid preference was given to the allottees. But there was no mistake as to the facts, only a mistake as to the law. In such circumstances the parties were held to have agreed so far as they had legally contracted, the illegal conditions being refused effect.[2] The second parties were therefore shareholders and not creditors. It was too late now to rescind. Matters were no longer entire. The business had been conducted for nineteen years on the footing that the second parties were members of the company. Rescission now would result in insolvency.[3] Third parties had bought shares on the faith of the second parties being shareholders.

It was ultimately admitted that the issue of preference shares was ultra vires.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The second parties in this case bought some years ago from the Hydropathic Company certain shares on the footing that they were preference shares, and subject to various conditions. These conditions are peculiar. The fourth of these conditions is that the company has a right, in the event of a transfer, to purchase the shares at par, and at any time after ten years they have right to redeem any of such shares at par. That is a privilege given to the company which is quite inconsistent with the idea that these shares are ordinary shares. Then again under the sixth condition the holders of these shares are not to be entitled to vote or be present at the meetings of the company, or to take part in the management of the company's affairs, or to participate in any of the rights or privileges of the ordinary shareholders. Now this is a restriction of the rights of the purchasers of the preference shares which puts them outside of the ordinary category of shareholders altogether. There is a further provision applicable to these preference shares, and to no others, viz., that they are to receive a certain fixed rate of dividend, and if the profits are not sufficient in any year to pay the dividend, the deficiency is to be made good out of the profits of subsequent years. This again places these shares in a position as unlike that of ordinary shares as possible.

It has now turned out that the issue of preference shares was unauthorised by the articles of the company, and it is not now contended that these shares are preference shares.

In these circumstances the only question which arises is whether the contention of the ordinary shareholders is sound, viz., that as the persons who took these so-called preference shares cannot take them on the conditions in the special resolution, they must now be held to be ordinary shareholders liable to the obligations and entitled to the privileges of ordinary shareholders. I cannot see how this contention can be held to be sound. I do not see any ground for holding that persons who definitely bargained to become preference shareholders can now be held to be ordinary shareholders, when it is found out that the company exceeded its powers in creating preference shares. I therefore am of opinion that the second question must be answered in the negative.

[1] Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 23.

[2] Ooregum Gold Mining Company of India v. Roper, March 14, 1892, L. R., App. Cas. 125; In re Railway Time Tables Publishing Company, ex parte Sandys, 1889, L. R., 42 Ch. Div. 98; Liquidator of Milford Haven Fishing Co., Limited, v. Jones, March 20, 1895, 22 R. 577; United Ports Insurance Co. (Perret's case), Jan. 30, 1873, L. R., 15 Eq. 250.

[3] Lawrence's case, 1867, L. R., 2 Ch. Ap. 412; Kincaid's case, 1867, L. R., 2 Ch. Ap. 426.

No. 34.

Nov. 20, 1895.

Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

The only question remaining is that involved in the third question of law, what is the position of the persons who took the shares believing them to be preference shares? It appears to me that the third question must be answered in the affirmative. These persons handed over their money to the company on conditions which the company could not make, and received certain privileges which the company could not give. The only course left is that the company must restore all the money they received from the persons with interest, minus the amount of the dividends paid on the so-called preference shares.

LORD YOUNG.—The shares to which this case refers were applied for and allotted under a resolution of the company, passed on 15th April 1876. The question lying at the root of all the others is, whether this resolution was legal—whether it was within the power of the company. The parties are agreed that it was not, that it was invalid, and that the allotment of shares under the resolution was not good.

But the substantial question between the parties is not whether the allotment was good, but what was the position of parties after the allocation was made. If the first question is answered in the negative, are the holders of the shares ordinary shareholders, or in other words, is the allotment in terms of the resolution to be so altered as to make it an allotment of ordinary shares, contrary to the terms of the resolution? I have no hesitation in answering that question in the negative. It was ultra vires of the company to issue these shares, and that being so the issue must be held to be of no effect at all. It is impossible to change the contract between the parties into an issue of shares of a totally different character from that specified in the contract.

The next question is, what is the position of a person who took these shares, believing them to be preference shares, which the company was authorised to issue? I am of opinion that he is entitled to the remedy of restoration, the ordinary remedy under similar circumstances. There may be cases where an illegal term in a contract may be struck out, leaving the contract to stand without it. But this is not a case of that class. The company desire to change the bargain into something totally different from what it originally was. In such circumstances the proper remedy is restoration, the allottee getting back his money with ordinary interest, I do not say at such a high rate as five per cent, but that can be arranged.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. With the consent of all parties, the first question is to be answered in the negative. It appears to me that this answer, taken in conjunction with the facts before us, leads to a similar answer being given to the second question. If the second parties are not preference shareholders they are not shareholders at all. They applied for and received shares which the directors had no power to give, and when that has been shewn, it follows that there is no contract between the parties. These shareholders never asked for ordinary shares and never got them, for the possession of ordinary shares would have entitled them to receive more than 5 per cent, if the company had earned sufficient to distribute a larger dividend, and would have empowered them to attend the meetings of the company, and to take part in the management of the company's affairs, privileges from which they were excluded. Looking at the clauses of the resolution, the two classes of shares are as separate and distinct as two things could possibly be. The preference shares being once held invalid, there is no reason for holding that their owners are ordinary shareholders in the company.

No. 34.
Nov. 20, 1895.
Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman.

What, then, is the position of the original allottees of these shares? I think their position is that of creditors of the company, and that they are entitled to receive back the money which they paid to the company with interest, less any dividend which they have received. As to the rate of interest, if it cannot be made a matter of agreement between the parties, I should think that 5 per cent was too much, and should be inclined to award something less. As to the position of transferees, I express no opinion, as we have not before us the information necessary for forming one.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the first and second questions therein stated in the negative, and in answer to the third question therein stated, find that the first of the second parties is a creditor to the amount paid for said shares, with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per centum per annum from the date of such payment, less the amount of sums received by him in name of dividends or composition for dividends upon said shares; and further, find that the facts stated in the case are not sufficient to enable the Court to answer the question so far as affecting the second of the second parties."

ANDREW TOSH, S.S.C.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 35.
Nov. 21, 1895.
Wallace's Executors v. Wallace.

FORBES WALLACE AND ANOTHER (Wallace's Executors), First Parties. —Johnston—Neish.
ANNIE AMELIA WALLACE, Second Party.—Johnston—Neish.
JAMES NEWTON WALLACE, Third Party.—Macfarlane.

Succession—Testament—Words importing gift of heritage—Heritage carried by residuary clause.—A testator left the estate of N to his nephew, and after various legacies he provided as follows:—"I leave as my residuary legatee my niece Annie Amelia Wallace, who will pay my funeral expenses and any debts I may justly owe."

The nephew died six months before the testator, who was aware of his death, but made no alteration on his will.

Held that the estate of N was carried by the residuary clause.

2D DIVISION.

GEORGE JOHNSTON WALLACE, of Newton Hall, Fifeshire, died at Newton Hall on 24th June 1895, leaving a holograph last will and testament dated 18th March 1884, which, after bequeathing certain specific legacies, proceeded as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath to my nephew Adolphus Wallace, tea-planter, India, the estate of

No. 35.

Nov. 21, 1895.

Wallace's Executors v. Wallace.

Newton Hall, . . . and with the said estate, the mansion-house, also the furniture and household furnishings, silver, silver-plate, &c., subject, however, to the following conditions, viz.:—That the mansion-house with its furniture, &c., and furnishings shall remain and be held by Annie Amelia Wallace for her use and benefit, and for the use and benefit of her sister Margaret Wallace, and for the use and benefit of her sister Priscilla Isabella Wallace, so long as they remain unmarried. —Annie Amelia Wallace to have the control and management of household matters so long as she remains unmarried. . . . I give, devise, and bequeath to my niece Annie Amelia Wallace (as a token for her devoted attention to my every want since I returned from India) my estate known as Kuttehla Grant, in Goruckpore, N. W. P., India."

Then, after a number of other specific bequests, the will concluded: —"I leave as my residuary legatee my niece Annie Amelia Wallace, who will pay my funeral expenses and any debts I may justly owe." Adolphus Wallace, Annie Amelia Wallace, and another were appointed executors.

Adolphus Wallace, who was the eldest surviving son of the testator's brother John Wallace, now deceased, had he survived the testator, would have been his heir-at-law, but he died unmarried on 1st November 1894. In consequence of his predeceasing the testator the bequest of the estate of Newton Hall and other subjects in his favour lapsed. The testator was aware that his nephew Adolphus Wallace was dead.

Annie Amelia Wallace claimed that, subject to the liferent use created in favour of herself and her sisters, the residuary bequest in her favour carried the property of Newton Hall and personal effects enumerated in connection with it.

James Newton Wallace, the heir-at-law of the testator, maintained that the special bequest of Newton Hall and other subjects having lapsed, the estate was not carried by the residuary bequest, but became intestate succession, and that the heritable subjects, subject to the liferents, fell to him as heir-at-law of the testator.

A special case, which set forth the facts above narrated, was presented by (1) the executors, (2) Annie Amelia Wallace, and (3) James Newton Wallace, for the opinion of the Court on the following question of law:—"1. (a) Is the heritable estate of Newton Hall, comprised in the lapsed bequest to Adolphus Wallace, carried, subject to the liferents, by the bequest of residue in favour of the second party? or (b) Is the third party, subject to the liferents, entitled as heir-at-law to the heritable estate comprised in said bequest to Adolphus Wallace?"

Argued for the third party;—The bequest to Adolphus Wallace had lapsed; the terms of the residue clause were not sufficient to carry heritage, and accordingly the estate of Newton Hall became intestate succession. Before the date of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, no doubt intestacy would have been assumed. Section 20 of that Act, which dispensed with the word "dispone" in mortis causa deeds, left the present question open to argument. The terms of the provision in favour of the second party excluded the idea of heritable estate. "Residuary legatee" referred prima facie to moveable estate.[1] She was left legatee in that class of property which was usually carried by such a bequest. At the time of making it the [1] Urquhart v. Dewar, June 13, 1879, 6 R. 1026; Erskine Inst. iii. 9.

No. 35.
Nov. 21, 1895.
Wallace's Executors v. Wallace.

testator had disposed of all except moveables. Only executors were appointed, and not trustees. The funeral charges, for which the second party was made liable, were usually laid on the moveable estate. They were included in what was the ordinary counterpart of a right to moveable estate. The terms of the bequest did not express or imply the intention of the testator to dispose of the heritage.[1] To hold that a residuary clause imported a disposition of land would be going further than the Court had gone before.

Argued for the second party;—The language of the residuary clause was sufficient to carry Newton Hall. The provisions of section 20 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1868, ruled here. It was clear from various considerations that the residuary clause was used with reference to heritage. The will dealt with the whole estate both heritable and moveable. The second party was favoured by the testator, while the third party was not benefited. The testator knew of the death of Adolphus Wallace, and had time to alter his will if he had thought it necessary. He had not done so. Lastly, there was always a presumption against intestacy. In all the cases cited the wills considered had dealt with moveable estate and had not referred to heritage. Similar words in less strong circumstances had been held to carry heritage.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late George Johnston Wallace, eleven years before his death, executed a last will and testament by which he disposed of all his heritable estate, and after giving certain legacies, appointed a niece, the second party, to be his residuary legatee. The questions in this special case relate to a property called Newton Hall, in the mansion-house of which he had resided before his death. This property he bequeathed with all the stock upon it, and the furniture in the mansion-house, to a nephew, subject to the use of the house and its contents by the second party and her sisters as long as each of them remained unmarried.

The nephew died six months before the testator, and the testator made no alteration upon his will. The questions are whether the property, the gift of which to the nephew lapsed by his death, goes to the second party as residuary legatee, or falls into intestacy and goes, as regards heritable property, to the heir-at-law of the deceased, and as regards the moveables, to the next of kin?

It is plain that the testator intended by his will to dispose of his whole estate, including in it all his heritable estate. It bears upon the face of it that he had a special regard for the second party, the deed narrating expressly the great kindness and attention he had received from her, and his desire to benefit her accordingly. There is nothing to indicate that in appointing her his residuary legatee he desired to keep back from her anything which he had not specially appropriated to some other relation. The nephew having died several months before the testator's death, there is no good reason for supposing that the testator did not desire that the property which by that event fell into the residue of his estate, because no longer destined to any particular person, should not be disposed of as the rest of the estate

[1] Campbell v. Campbell, Nov. 30, 1887, 15 R. 103; Grant v. Morren, Feb. 22, 1893, 20 R. 404.

[2] Forsyth v. Turnbull, Dec. 16, 1887, 15 R. 172; M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod, Feb. 28, 1875, 2 R. 481.

No. 35.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Wallace's Executors v. Wallace.

was intended to be by his appointment of the second party to be his residuary legatee. And as that appointment was made in such general terms, and the testator made no alteration on it, and as it admits of being construed to refer to heritable as well as moveable estate under the existing law, there seems to be no good ground for holding that he died intestate as regards this property. On the contrary, I think that it must be held that under her appointment as residuary legatee the second party takes this property, which at the time of the testator's death stood in the position of not being specially disposed of by the will.

If this view be sound, then it must also follow that the moveables connected with the property of Newton Hall are in the same position. I think that the first alternative of the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the language of the residuary clause in the will before us is habile to convey heritage to the residuary legatee named, and that it does convey heritage to her, if the whole tenor and contents of the will are sufficient to instruct that the testator intended thereby to deal with heritage as well as moveables. I think he did so intend. The will was a universal settlement; it disposed of the testator's whole estate. He had destined the property of Newton Hall to his nephew, who was his heir-at-law, but that nephew predeceased the testator, as the testator knew. In these circumstances had the testator intended to convey Newton Hall to the third party, he would probably have done so by a codicil. He must have known that the third party could not take the property under the will as it stood, in which the third party is not even named. But the probability is that nothing was added to the will, and no new provision made concerning the property in question, because the testator regarded the lapsed legacy as falling back into residue which had already been conferred on the second party. The special favour with which the testator regarded his niece (the second party) strengthens this view. The testator, having made no new provision with regard to the property of Newton Hall, must have intended it to go either to his residuary legatee or to be treated as intestate succession. The latter view is opposed to all the probabilities of the case, and is indeed negatived, I think, by the fact that the testator had originally disposed of his whole estate by the will before us, and intended his property to descend according to his directions, and not according to the disposition of the law.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the first branch of the first question in the affirmative and the second branch in the negative.

HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S., Agents.

No. 36.

Nov. 21, 1895. Kennedy's Trustees v. Sharpe.

WILLIAM GOSS AND OTHERS (Kennedy's Trustees), First Parties.—Constable.
WILLIAM GOSS AND WILLIAM BROWN (Kennedy's Executors), Second Parties.—Sandeman.
MRS CATHERINE SHARPE AND HUSBAND, Third Parties.—Constable.
JOHN HOGARTH KENNEDY AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Sandeman.

Insurance—Insurance by widower for benefit of children—Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 2.—The Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act, 1880, sec. 2, enacts that "a policy of assurance effected by any married man on his own life, and expressed upon the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife or of his children," shall be deemed a trust for their benefit.

Held that a widower was a "married man" in the sense of the Act.

2D DIVISION.

MR JOHN KENNEDY, Baintbari, Bengal, insured his life with the Scottish Imperial Insurance Company for the sum of £1000. The policy, which was dated 10th October 1889, bore to be for the benefit of any child or children of the assured who might survive him. Mr Kennedy at this time was a widower with three children.

On 14th January 1893 Mr Kennedy married again, and on 14th April 1893 died survived by his widow and by the children of his former marriage. There were no children of the second marriage. He left a will dated 13th April 1893 in which he directed the sum insured to be sent out to India for investment, and the profits paid to his wife and children in equal parts.

The testator appointed Mr William Goss, of Ballabari, and Dr William Brown, of Rungamati, and his wife as joint trustees.

William Goss and William Brown obtained probate as executors of the testator in India.

Mrs Kennedy subsequently married James J. Sharpe.

The trustees having obtained the sum in the policy, a question arose as to the disposal of the fund.

In a special case John H. Kennedy and others, the testator's children, the fourth parties, claimed to have right to the whole fund under the Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act.*

The testator's widow, Mrs Sharpe, and her husband, the third parties, maintained that the Act did not apply, as the testator was a widower, and not a married man, at the date of the policy.

The following were the questions of law:—"(1) Did the policy of assurance in question constitute an effectual trust under the Married

* The Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 2, enacts,—"A policy of assurance effected by any married man on his own life, and expressed upon the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife, or of his children, or of his wife and children, shall, together with all benefit thereof, be deemed a trust for the benefit of his wife for her separate use, or for the benefit of his children, or for the benefit of his wife and children; and such policy, immediately on its being so effected, shall vest in him and his legal representatives in trust for the purpose or purposes so expressed, or in any trustee nominated in the policy, or appointed by separate writing duly intimated to the assurance office, but in trust always as aforesaid, and shall not otherwise be subject to his control, or form part of his estate, or be liable to the diligence of his creditors, or be revocable as a donation or reducible on any ground of excess or insolvency. . . ."

Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act, 1880, of the sum thereby secured for behoof of the fourth parties solely? or (2) Did the proceeds of the policy form part of the estate of the assured at the date of his death?"

No. 36.

Nov. 21, 1895.

Kennedy's Trustees v. Sharpe.

LORD YOUNG.—The question is whether this policy constituted an effectual trust under the Act of 1880. I am of opinion that it falls within the Act, and thus the proceeds must go to the children of the deceased by the first marriage.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—JAMES AYTON, S.S.C.—Agents.

FRANCES ANN HESTER CRUIKSHANK, Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—M'Clure.

THE NORTHERN ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Crole.

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.

Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

Insurance—Accident Insurance—Condition—Warranty—Answers to questions by company—Agent and Principal—Personal Bar.—The widow of a person who had been killed by accident raised an action against an accident insurance company upon a policy taken out by the deceased. The defenders pleaded that the policy was void, in respect that it was subject to the condition that the declaration by the insured, upon which it was granted, was true; that in answer to the question in the proposal, "Are there any circumstances which render you peculiarly liable to accident?" the deceased had stated, "Slight lameness from birth," and had signed a declaration in the following terms:—"I hereby declare and warrant that the above statements are true"; and that the answer and declaration in material respects were false.

It appeared from a proof that the deceased, while staying in a hotel in England, met an agent of the defenders' company with whom he was not acquainted, and was induced by him to make a proposal for an insurance; that the agent wrote the answers to the questions in the proposal as the deceased dictated them; that deceased was and had been from childhood extremely lame, and could not have walked across a room without shewing the extent of his lameness. Several witnesses deponed that the deceased had told them that he walked across the room at the hotel before the agent, but the agent deponed that he never saw him rise from his seat. It was proved that some years after the deceased had fallen into a fireplace in his bedroom and had received injuries from which he died next day.

The Court held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) (1) that the deceased's statement as to his walking across the room was true; (2) that as the defenders' agent must have seen the extent of his lameness, the defenders were not entitled to take advantage of any misdescription of the lameness in the proposal, as the knowledge of their agent was their knowledge; and (3) that no breach of warranty had been proved.

Observations on the construction to be applied to a declaration in a proposal for insurance against accident—"I have not had paralysis or a fit of any kind."

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895. Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

ON 20th February 1883 George Macaulay Cruikshank, patent agent and consulting engineer, Glasgow, effected an insurance with the Northern Accident Insurance Company, Limited, whereby the company promised on the death of the insured by accident to pay to his representatives the sum of £1000.

On 24th January 1894 Cruikshank, who was lame, fell into a fireplace in his house, and was so burned that he died on the following day.

Mrs Frances Ann Hester Cruikshank, his widow and executrix, called on the company to pay the contents of the policy, and upon their refusal raised this action against them for payment of £1000.

The defenders stated:—"The said policy proceeded on a written proposal signed by the deceased on 16th February 1883. The fifth question in said proposal is as follows, viz.:—'Are there any circumstances which render you peculiarly liable to accident?' The answer given to the said question by the deceased was, 'Slight lameness from birth.' There is also a declaration in said proposal in the following terms, viz.:—'I hereby declare and warrant that the above statements are true; that I have not had paralysis, or a fit of any kind, or been ruptured; that I have no physical infirmity . . . and I agree that this declaration shall be the basis of the contract between me and the Northern Accident Insurance Company, Limited.' The said proposal is produced, and founded on. By the said policy it is, inter alia, provided as follows, viz.:—'Provided always that this policy is granted upon the express condition that the aforesaid declaration is true in all respects, and that if either this policy, or any renewal thereof, has been obtained through any material misrepresentation or concealment by or on behalf of the insured, then this policy shall become absolutely void, and all premiums paid in respect thereof be forfeited to the company.' The said answer and declaration are in material respects false and untrue. The said George Macaulay Cruikshank had a malformation in both feet, and had suffered from paralysis almost all his life. At the time the said declaration was made his right leg was totally paralysed, and his left leg was also paralysed to a very great extent. . . . If the defenders had been made aware of the true physical condition of the deceased they would not have entered into the said contract. The defenders aver that the deceased well knew that he was not a fit subject for accident insurance."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defenders having been fully aware of Mr Cruikshank's condition when they accepted his proposal and issued the policy, the defences should be repelled.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The said policy is void, having been granted on the express condition that the said declaration was true in all respects, and the said declaration having been untrue, as condescended on.

A proof was allowed, in which the defenders led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.

On 27th August 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.—It is not disputed that the description given by Mr Cruikshank of his lameness in the proposal upon which the policy in question was issued was not in fact true. He described his lameness as slight, while, as a matter of fact, he was extremely lame. If, therefore, the

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The statement in the proposal for insurance and the warranty in the declaration were untrue in fact, and the policy was void. The contract was in writing, and the statements were of the nature of warranty, and not merely declarations of belief. The insured was a business man and knew the nature of the forms he was signing. If he did not read them sibi imputet. He must be taken to have known that the agent could only contract for his employers in one way, and was not empowered to waive any condition. It was therefore irrelevant to prove any antecedent communings between the insured and the agent, which led the agent to accept the insured in the face of peculiar risk. If he did waive the usual conditions he acted ultra vires. The knowledge of the agent would not be imputed to the defenders if the result of it was that the policy was a fraud upon them.[1] But the weight of the evidence was to the effect that the agent did not see the condition of the insured. The statement that the lameness was slight was untrue. The insured was very lame. The best evidence of this was that his infirmity was the cause of his death. The degree of lameness was policy was issued upon the faith of the statement made in the proposal, and of nothing else, the policy would be void.

---

"The pursuer, however, avers that Mr Black, the defenders' general agency superintendent, through whom the insurance was effected, saw Mr Cruikshank, and was fully aware of his condition.

"It appears that in 1883 Mr Cruikshank and Mr Black met by chance in a hotel in Manchester and got into conversation. Mr Black asked Mr Cruikshank if he was insured against accidents, and upon the latter replying in the negative, proposed that he should take an insurance with the defenders' company.

"In regard to what followed, the evidence is conflicting.

"Mr Black says that he only saw Mr Cruikshank sitting at table, that he did not see him walk, nor did he see his lower limbs, and that he accepted the proposal upon the faith of Mr Cruikshank's statement that he was only slightly lame.

"Upon the other hand, the evidence for the pursuer is as follows:—When Mr Cruikshank returned from Manchester he told his wife that he had taken out an insurance against accidents. He then told her in detail how it had come about. He said that he had met the insurance company's agent by chance in the hotel at Manchester, and that the agent proposed that he should take out an insurance against accidents. He then said to the agent that he must first see the subject with which he had to deal, and he accordingly rose and walked across the room. The agent said that his lameness did not matter, because people in his condition took more care than those who had no physical infirmity, and that the risk to the company was therefore not greater. The matter was then concluded, the premium was paid, and a covering-note given.

"Shortly afterwards Mr Cruikshank saw Mr M'Creadie, his law-agent and intimate friend, and mentioned that he had taken out an insurance against accidents. Mr M'Creadie then asked if the company knew of his condition, and Mr Cruikshank told him the same story which he had previously told to his wife.

"Subsequently Mr Cruikshank was in the private room of Mr Napier, station-master at Uddingston, waiting for a train, when the conversation turned upon insurance against accident. There had been a railway accident

---

[1] Bawden v. London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Assurance Company [1892], 2 Q. B. 534; Weems v. Standard Assurance Company, March 5, 1884, 11 R. 658, Aug. 1, 1884, 11 R. (H. L.), 48.

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895. Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

material to the risk, and the answer should have been such as to put the defenders on their inquiry whether to accept the risk. The Lord Ordinary thought the insured was very lame. (2) The pursuer was forced to contend for the use of the word "paralysis" in a very limited sense. This contention was unfair, for the term embraced many kinds, such as "creeping paralysis," and "infantile paralysis" which might form a source of physical disability. The result of the evidence was that the condition of the insured resulted from infantile paralysis.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary's view of the evidence and his reasoning were sound. The issue of the policy was an acceptance of the statements of the insured with a perfect knowledge of the state of the case.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a peculiar case in some respects. The late Mr Cruikshank is proved to have suffered an accident shortly after his birth, the result of which was that he was lame for the rest of his life.

While he was staying in a hotel in Manchester he met Mr Black, who in the neighbourhood, and Mr Napier was the agent for an accident insurance company, and that led to the matter of insurance against accident being spoken of. Mr Cruikshank told Mr Napier that he had been insured for a number of years, and then he gave him the same narrative of what had happened as he had previously given to his wife and Mr M'Creadie. He also got up and walked round the table to illustrate what had passed in the hotel at Manchester.

---

"Now, no suggestion can be made against the credibility of these three witnesses—Mrs Cruikshank, Mr M'Creadie, and Mr Napier—and it is certain that Mr Cruikshank narrated to them the story which they told in the witness-box.

"The question is whether the story was true? Now, even if Mr Cruikshank had been a person who was likely to invent a story of the sort, which he was not, it is impossible to suggest any motive which he could have had for doing so. It is to my mind incredible that he should have told a made-up story to his wife immediately after his return from Manchester, and repeated it subsequently to his law-agent and to Mr Napier.

"What, then, is to be said of the evidence of Mr Black? Mr Black did not give his evidence with very great confidence. Although he at first said positively that he had not seen Mr Cruikshank except sitting behind a table, when pressed in cross-examination as to whether he had not seen Cruikshank walk, he very much took refuge in want of recollection. And Mr Black's hesitancy appeared to me to be even more marked in his manner than in the words which he used.

"I have, therefore, no doubt that the story told by Mr Cruikshank was true; and if so, I am of opinion that the defenders are not entitled to take advantage of the misdescription in the proposal of Mr Cruikshank's physical condition. The knowledge of their agent was their knowledge.

"A more difficult question arises upon the general declaration at the end of the proposal. It is, so far as material, in the following terms:—'I hereby declare and warrant that the above statements are true; that I have not had paralysis or a fit of any kind, or been ruptured; that I have no physical infirmity.'

"Mr Cruikshank's signature is appended to the declaration, and it is argued for the defenders that the declaration was not true in respect (1) that he had a physical infirmity, and (2) that he must have had infantile paralysis.

"The only physical infirmity which Mr Cruikshank had was his lameness, and if that was disclosed in the answers to the questions in the earlier

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

was in the employment of the defenders at the time as an inspector of agents, and Mr Black was in the habit of getting insurances when he could, and such applications were accepted by the defenders. In course of conversation he impressed the advantages of accident insurance upon Mr Cruikshank, who admitted its importance, and expressed himself as willing to take a policy. Then and there Mr Black settled the business on behalf of the company, as far as it was possible to conclude it at the time. In exchange for a covering-note Mr Black received a premium, and the matter was concluded subject to the approval of the board.

Now there are two things which are said to support the refusal of the company to pay the sum in the policy. It is said that a false assertion occurs in the statement which Mr Cruikshank signed describing his condition, and the falsity is said to be contained in the words "slight lameness." It is to be noted that these words occur in answer to this question,—"Are there any circumstances which render you peculiarly liable to accidents?" This answer is accordingly to be read in full as follows:—"I part of the proposal, I think that that was sufficient. The declaration must, I think, be read in the light of the previous answers, and anything which is disclosed in the answers does not require to be excepted from the declaration.

---

"But then it was said that the lameness was caused by infantile paralysis, and that as the declaration was a warranty, it was not material to inquire whether Mr Cruikshank was or was not aware that he had had paralysis.

"It appears that when in a subsequent year Mr Cruikshank was insuring his life, he told the doctor of the insurance company that his lameness had been the result of a fall which he had when an infant. He told his wife the same thing. Now if the lameness resulted from a fall, the probability is that the spine received some injury, and that partial paralysis of the legs ensued.

"Why the lameness is entered in the proposal in question as being from birth it is impossible to say. The answers in the proposal are filled in in Mr Black's handwriting, and the words 'from birth' appear to have been filled in after the original answer 'slight lameness' had been written. It may be that Mr Cruikshank gave Mr Black the same account of the origin of his lameness as he gave to others (at least I see no reason why he should not have done so) and that the words 'from birth' were added as a short way of describing a lameness which commenced at a time which Mr Cruikshank could not remember. But however that may be, the statement as it stands must be taken as Mr Cruikshank's statement, and the policy dealt with upon that footing.

"Now in the first place I do not think that it is proved that Mr Cruikshank ever had infantile paralysis. No doubt the evidence renders it highly probable that the lameness was caused by partial paralysis brought on by a fall in infancy. But I do not think that upon the medical evidence the defenders' case can be put higher than one of probability.

"Further, although the declaration is a warranty, it is to be remembered that it is intended to be made by members of the general public desiring to insure against accidents. Therefore in a case of lameness following upon a fall in childhood, where the scientific cause of the lameness is paralysis induced by an injury to the spine, I do not think that the policy would be void because the proposer did not know, and therefore did not state, that his lameness was caused by paralysis, if he stated truly and accurately the extent and nature and origin of his lameness. Now here, according to the view which I take of the evidence, the defenders knew, through Mr Black, how lame Mr Cruikshank was, and what was the nature of his lameness. They knew that the right leg was shorter than the left, and was almost

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

have suffered from slight lameness from birth, which renders me peculiarly liable to accidents." Accordingly, so far as the statement goes, there is nothing to suggest that it was false. The only suggestion of falsehood is in connection with the use of the word "slight." Now, that is a word which may be used by different persons according to the variety of the views which they are in the habit of taking of things. It was proved that Mr Cruikshank was a man of considerable activity, and with the help of his crutch and stick could get along at a very good rate—2½ to 3 miles an hour. His lameness did not prevent him being a very active man of business. If a man can only move with the greatest slowness his liability to accidents is totally different from the state of a man who is capable of active and quick movement. It is a question of interpretation. One man could truthfully use the word "slight" where another would use the word "great." Taking the word by itself, I see in it no ground for holding that it was a false statement. It is important that the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that Mr Black, who wrote this answer from Mr Cruikshank's dictation, saw Mr Cruikshank walk, and saw the extent of his lameness. There is trustworthy evidence to the effect that this was matter of conversation between them, and Mr Black expressed the opinion that a man with such an infirmity was a safer subject of insurance, because he was accustomed to take greater care of himself. Mr Cruikshank shortly afterwards stated to more than one person what had taken place, and Mr Black's evidence to the contrary is not in my opinion satisfactory.

Therefore, so far as this question is concerned, I think there is no ground for disturbing the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

The next question is, whether the defenders are not liable because of the declaration made by the insured, and which is said to be a warranty of what it contains. It is entitled "declaration," but thereby the insured did declare and warrant that the above statements were true, and that he had not had paralysis or a fit of any kind. I think that amounts to a declarapowerless. They had knowledge therefore which suggested that Mr Cruikshank might have had infantile paralysis. But then it is said that Mr Cruikshank made an untrue statement as to the origin of his lameness. As regards that, the burden of proof is upon the defenders, and upon the evidence I am unable to say for certain that the statement was untrue. Mr Cruikshank told his wife and the doctor of the Life Insurance Company that he had had a fall when an infant, to which his lameness was attributed, and he must be taken to have told Mr Black that he had been lame from birth. It is not said that Mr Cruikshank made a wilfully false statement, and no one now can tell for certain whether the latter statement was in fact true or false. The origin of the lameness was not a matter within the personal knowledge of Mr Cruikshank. He had been lame ever since he remembered, and the defenders knew that that was the case. No one suggests that if it had been stated that the lameness was due to a fall in infancy, instead of from birth, that would have made any difference in the risk. The important matters were the nature and extent of the lameness, and that Mr Cruikshank had been lame ever since he remembered. The defenders were aware of all that, and therefore they knew all that was necessary to enable them to consider whether they should refuse the proposal, or charge a higher premium, or demand a medical examination.

---

"Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree."

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co. Limited.

tion that the insured had not suffered from paralysis arising from some organic cause, and does not suggest to the ordinary mind paralysis which may ensue from an accident to a limb. There is no evidence that the insured thought that he suffered from any form of paralysis, and if this is to be regarded as a warranty, I think it can only be so regarded with reference to that kind of paralysis which is the result of disease and not the result of accident.

I am of opinion that there is nothing either in the statement or the declaration entitling the defenders to say that they were deceived by the statements of Cruikshank, or that he warranted them as against the condition of lameness in which he was.

LORD YOUNG.—The late Mr Cruikshank obtained the policy in 1883, and kept it up until the accident which caused his death in 1894.

The defence to this action on the policy is that the conditions expressed in the policy were not complied with.

All the facts of the case and the views of both sides were very fully and with most commendable fairness put before us by Mr Crole in his opening speech, and I do not think that he suggested that this case raised a question of good or bad faith. The good faith of the deceased is not in dispute. But it is said that, assuming this good faith, the conditions of the policy were not complied with. If that is true the defence must prevail, the good faith of the deceased notwithstanding.

Now, the conditions referred to are contained in a "declaration" made by Mr Cruikshank (and the title is not unimportant), whereby he did "declare and warrant that the above statements are true; that I have not had paralysis or a fit of any kind, or been ruptured; that I have no physical infirmity."

The statement which is represented as being untrue is the statement in the form of proposal for the policy, and consists of an answer to this question,—"Are there any circumstances which render you peculiarly liable to accidents?" The answer is,—"Slight lameness from birth." Of course these words must be prefaced by the monosyllable "yes," for if there were no circumstances rendering him peculiarly liable to accidents there would be none to specify, and the answer would be "no."

It appears from the evidence that Mr Cruikshank had been lame from his earliest infancy. It seems that he had been let fall while an infant, and so injured as to be lame for life. Thus, perhaps, strictly speaking, his lameness was not from birth, but I do not think that anything turns upon a distinction between injury received before birth or immediately after. But this lameness is characterised by the word "slight," and I think we must look at the evidence to say what effect ought to be given to this adjective applied to the lameness stated as rendering the insured peculiarly liable to accidents. I am inclined to accept the view of the Lord Ordinary on the evidence, and to conclude that the lameness was such as to be manifest to anyone who saw Mr Cruikshank upon his feet. When Mr Black proposed that he should take out a policy I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking it proved that Mr Cruikshank rose and walked across the room. Mr Black, who wrote the replies in the form of a proposal, having seen this lameness, described it as slight, and reading this word so written, I cannot regard it as an untrue answer on which a defence to this action can be founded. I think that this lameness was expressly described as making Mr Cruikshank peculiarly liable to accidents, and that the degree of this lameness being so written by the agent of the defenders cannot be founded on by the defenders as untrue. Taking this as a written contract, the terms of which must be complied with, I think that so far the plea stated in defence to this action, that the conditions of the contract were not complied with, must fail.

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

With regard to the declaration that the insured had not had paralysis or a fit of any kind, I think that we must take the language of the declaration in the sense in which it was probably and reasonably understood. I think that when a man applies for insurance, and states that he is afflicted with lifelong lameness which renders him peculiarly liable to accidents, and also states that he has not had paralysis or a fit of any kind, he is not to be understood as declaring that paralysis in any form was not the source of the lameness which was disclosed. I think the fair view is that "paralysis" is to be taken in connection with the words "fit of any kind." Paralysis is commonly understood as a fit or shock. I do not think it is commonly used so as to suggest such paralysis as is the result of a fall causing lameness. I think the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it was not proved that Mr Cruikshank ever had paralysis, and I agree with him. There are certain attacks of illness which produce forms of paralysis. I suppose that a fainting fit is while it lasts a species of paralysis. It is a paralysis of the nerves of motion. But I do not think that the word "paralysis" is used in this declaration as designative of the less serious seizures to which the term might with more or less accuracy be applied. I think it is used as applicable to that graver form of attack which is associated with lesion of the brain. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it is not proved that Mr Cruikshank had paralysis in any sense in which the word is used in this declaration. But the declaration proceeds,—"I have no physical infirmity," and the question is, what bearing this declaration has on the liability of the defenders when taken in connection with the lameness of the insured? I do not think it is to be taken literally, for I suppose there is not any human being, or indeed any animal, free from physical infirmity. An ear which hears less distinctly than the other, an eye which sees less clearly than its fellow, a weak voice, might each be described as physical infirmity. The effort would be endless to attempt to express the varieties of physical infirmity to which all living beings are liable.

But in what sense, then, did the defenders understand this declaration on the part of a man who had declared that he had slight lameness from birth? I think the two statements must be taken together. I think the insured must be taken to have meant that he had no physical infirmity except the lameness which I think was fairly disclosed. I am therefore of opinion that the declaration cannot be read as importing a warranty that the insured was absolutely free from all physical infirmity.

I can understand that the defenders might at any time during the currency of the policy have desired to know what was the kind and extent of the lameness of the insured, but they were quite satisfied to take it as it

No. 37.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

stood, the insured remained in good health, and I am not surprised that the defenders did not desire to have any further information as to his condition.

On the whole matter I conclude, along with the Lord Ordinary, that the defence of breach of warranty existing in misstatements in the proposal of insurance, and in the declaration, is not proved.

LORD TRAYNER.—I entirely concur, and can add nothing usefully to what has been said. I therefore agree that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MARTIN & M'GLASHAN, S.S.C.—J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 38.

Nov. 21, 1895.*
Ivory v. Macrae.

WILLIAM IVORY (Sheriff of Inverness-shire), Objector.—Ure—Blair.
DONALD MACRAE, Respondent.—Lorimer—Trotter.

Election Law—Returning officer's charges—Presiding officers and clerks—"Travelling expenses"—Hotel expenses—Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 49), sec. 3, Schedule, Part I.—The schedule to the Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1891, bears,—"The following are the maximum charges to be made by the returning officer, but the charges are in no case to exceed the sums actually paid or payable. Part I.—Counties and districts . . . For each presiding officer £3, 3s. If the presiding officer is obliged to leave home in order to perform his duties in connection with the election a further fee of £1, 1s. shall be allowed him for each night he is absent . . . For travelling expenses of presiding officers and clerks per mile £0, 1s. 0d. No travelling expenses to be allowed beyond the limits of the sheriffdom."

Held (diss. Lord Adam) that the expression "travelling expenses" in the schedule included hotel and other personal expenses necessarily incurred by a presiding officer.

Election Law—Returning officer's charges—Deputy returning officer—Ballot Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 33), sec. 8.—Held that a deputy returning officer, remunerated as such, was not entitled to any fee for acting as a presiding officer at a parliamentary election.

ELECTION PETITION.
Lord Adam.
Ld. M'Laren.
Ld. Kyllachy.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

ON 13th June 1895 an election was held for the county of Inverness-shire. The Sheriff (Ivory) thereafter, in terms of the Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 58), sec. 3, transmitted to the election-agents of the candidates an account of his expenses in connection with the election.

On the application of the agent for Mr Donald Macrae, one of the candidates, the Auditor of the Court of Session taxed the account.

On 29th July the Auditor issued a report, in which he taxed the account at £469, 9s. 7d.†

---

* Decided Nov. 15, 1895.

† "The sums taxed off the foregoing account consist, with the exception of a few items of inconsiderable amount, of charges by presiding officers and their clerks for hotel bills and other personal expenses.

"The charges of returning officers are regulated by the Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1891, the particular allowances under the various heads of charge being specified in the schedule appended to the Act. The allowance to each presiding officer is £3, 3s., with £1, 1s. additional for

No. 38.

Nov. 21, 1895. Ivory v. Macrae.

On 7th August the returning officer lodged with the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions a note of objections as follows:—"The report of the Auditor is objected to in so far as he has disallowed or taxed off (1) the sum of £90, 17s. 5d., representing, with the exception of one or two items of very small amount, charges by presiding officers and their clerks for hotel bills and other personal expenses; and (2) the sum of £3, 3s., the amount of the fee charged by Mr Duncan Shaw, Writer to the Signet, Inverness, for acting as presiding officer at Inverness on the polling day."

Mr Duncan Shaw was deputy returning officer, and was remunerated as such.

Argued for the objector;—(1) The hotel and personal expenses were ex hypothesi necessary expenses, and must be covered by some allowance contained in the schedule of the Act of 1891.* They were not covered by the £3, 3s. and £1, 1s. allowed respectively to presiding officers and clerks, for these allowances were expressly described as "fees." They were as little covered by the sums allowed to the officers and clerks of £1, 1s. and 10s. respectively per night, for these sums were intended to be a remuneration for services, being described in each case as "a further fee." They must then come under the expression "travelling expenses." That expression, in its ordinary sense, included not only the expenses of locomotion but also personal outlays incidental to travelling, such as hotel bills. The addition of the expression "per mile, one shilling," did not limit the meaning of the expression to expenses of bare locomotion, for one shilling per mile was not enough for posting, and was far too much for railway fares. The amount was roughly calculated on an average to meet the cost of travelling generally. (2) The deputy returning officer was under the Ballot Act, 1872,† entitled to act as a presiding officer, his right to a fee not being excluded by the "necessary modifications" referred to. In any view, as the returning officer himself was present on the polling day, the deputy was superseded. He was therefore acting as a presiding officer, not qua deputy returning officer, but in virtue of an appointment like any other person, and was equally entitled to a fee.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) In its ordinary sense "travelling expenses" certainly did not include hotel bills and personal expenses.

---

each night absent; and to each clerk £1, 1s., and 10s. for each night absent, with travelling expenses in both cases within the limits of the sheriffdom. There is no mention in the Act of any further allowance to presiding officers or clerks, and I do not consider that I am entitled to pass any charges which are not distinctly specified in the schedule. I have accordingly restricted the allowances to the above rates, with the addition of actual outlays for travelling expenses, so far as in my opinion reasonable and proper."

* Quoted in rubric.

† The Ballot Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 33), sec. 8, enacted,—A deputy returning officer, duly appointed in terms of the Act, "may exercise any powers and do any things which the returning officer is authorised or required to exercise or do in relation to such election."

The First Schedule—Part I.—Rules for Parliamentary Elections, Rule 47, bears,—"The returning officer may, if he think fit, preside at any polling station, and the provisions of this Act relating to a presiding officer shall apply to such returning officer, with the necessary modifications as to things to be done by the returning officer to the presiding officer, or the presiding officer to the returning officer."

No. 38.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Ivory v. Macrae.

In the undernoted tables of fees * "personal expenses" and "allowance for maintenance" were mentioned as something in addition to "travelling expenses." It was impossible to suppose that "travelling expenses," calculated at so much a mile, could include hotel bills and personal expenses. These outlays were intended to be met out of the sums allowed to presiding officers and clerks for each night in which they were necessarily absent in connection with their duties. (2) The deputy returning-officer was entitled, but not obliged, to act as a presiding officer, but he was not entitled to anything besides his remuneration as deputy returning officer whatever work he might have done.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The question which we have to dispose of is raised in an appeal from the taxation of the account of election expenses for the county of Inverness.

The Auditor, in that part of the account which consists of sums paid by the returning officer for the expenses of his deputies and clerks, has disallowed the expenses of subsistence of the polling officers and their clerks while absent from Inverness on their official duties, and has allowed only the cost of locomotion—railway, steamboat, and carriage fares. This, I presume, proceeds upon the view which was maintained at the bar, that the Act of Parliament, in empowering the returning officer to charge the travelling expenses of his assistants in the accounts meant only to give travelling expenses in the most restricted sense which can be put on these words. The returning officer, in appealing against this decision, maintains that travelling expenses include all the expenses necessarily incurred by these gentlemen during their absence from home on their official duties, it being common ground that there is a maximum sum imposed by the Act which is to be calculated at the rate of one shilling per mile.

In dealing with a question of this kind, the consideration which first presents itself to my mind is, that a returning officer incurring expense in the public service is, in accordance with the usual practice in every branch of the public service, entitled to be reimbursed out of moneys voted by Parliament. That is his general right, and his general right is fully recognised in the Act of Parliament under consideration, as it has been in previous Acts of Parliament. No doubt it may be inferred from the circumstance that a limit is fixed to the expenditure, that there was some apprehension that returning officers might be disposed to pass expenses upon too liberal a scale unless some check were applied. It is possible that in certain cases the necessary expense might exceed the assigned limit, and that the returning officer might be out of pocket. But I hardly think it would be a sound condition of a construction of this Act to begin by assuming that the Legislature intended as an ordinary, or, at least, not very exceptional result of the working of this Act, that necessary expenses incurred by a public servant in the discharge of his official duties should be left as a personal burden upon himself.

---

* Table of Fees for Conveyancing and General Business, 1876, Table IX. (34) (b) and (c), and Table of Fees for Law-Agents under A. S. 15th July 1876, I. 6 (1) (b) and (c).

No. 38.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Ivory v. Macrae.

I have then to consider which of the constructions contended for is mostly in accordance with the principle which I have stated, and with the probable intention of the Legislature. It is a perfectly possible construction of the words "travelling expenses" that these words should include the expenses of subsistence in a hotel or lodgings as well as railway and steamboat fares in cases where the persons concerned were necessarily absent from their homes for more than one day. I will go further, and say that this is not only a possible construction but is in my judgment the true meaning of "travelling expenses," according to the ordinary use of such language. Of course that is only a matter of impression, and my impression may not be the same as that of some of my colleagues, but I have always understood travelling expenses, when used without qualification, to include the whole cost and inconvenience to which a person is put by being absent from home. But probably if the statute had either imposed no limit, or if the limit had been expressed in a different way, this would not have been disputed, because the argument in support of the other construction is that the limit is in the form of so much per mile on the distance travelled. It is quite true that this is a limit more appropriate to travelling proper than to the calculation of hotel expenses, because it goes without saying that no man calculates the cost of his living by the mile. At the same time it must be observed that the schedule does not mean or say that the account is to be rendered for an amount of so much per mile, but only that the amount of one shilling per mile is to be taken, and that the account is only to be allowed in so far as it is within that limit. If the limit had been fixed at so much per day, a precisely similar argument might have been raised. It would then have been said that the words "travelling expenses" meant only hotel expenses, and did not cover railway or steamboat fares, because people do not pay their railway fares at so much a day. To have had a double limit would have been rather a conflicting business, and I do not see very well how any satisfactory results would be got out of a double limit.

It was most probably considered that if only one limit was to be taken, the limit of so much per mile would be a good practical mode of fixing the maximum, because on the average a person's total expenditure on a journey is roughly proportionate to the distance travelled. Especially would this be the case in Highland counties, where it is only on account of the long distances to be travelled to certain of the polling-stations that it is necessary for the polling officer and clerks to be absent from home for more than a day. For these reasons I am of opinion that the Act of Parliament should receive a liberal construction in favour of reimbursement to the returning officer of all his necessary expenses within the limit, and accordingly that the objections to the Auditor's report under this head should be sustained.

With regard to the other objection, which only involves three guineas, it is urged that the deputy returning officer for Inverness was not also entitled to remuneration as a polling officer. I am of opinion, in common with all your Lordships, that this objection is well founded, and that whoever was appointed as a deputy returning officer, and remunerated as such, is not also entitled to additional remuneration for acting as a polling officer, which he was not obliged to do.

No. 38.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Ivory v. Macrae.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I come to the same conclusion, and in doing so I start with this, that somewhere in the Act—somewhere in the schedule—provision must be found for the expenses in question. They are ex hypothesi necessary expenses, and it must, I think, be assumed that they are met or covered by some payment or allowance contained in the schedule. Now, that being so, the first point is, whether they can be held as covered by the fees of £3, 3s. and £1, 1s. respectively, which are allowed for the day of the poll, or by the additional fees of £1, 1s. and 10s. respectively which are allowed for every night for which the presiding officer or clerk is absent from home.

Now, it appears to me that that suggestion is excluded, for two reasons. In the first place, these payments or allowances are expressly described as "fees,"—that is to say, as remuneration for services rendered or time occupied. In the next place, at least in the case of clerks, the total fees allowed would often, if not generally, be inadequate to meet the clerks' personal outlays, much less to meet those outlays and leave any reasonable remuneration. I refer particularly to cases, by no means uncommon in Scotland, where the polling official requires, in order to perform his duty, to spend four or even five days away from home, living necessarily in hotels, and paying for everything on a corresponding scale. Now, I at least am not able to believe that anything of that kind was intended by the Legislature. On the contrary, I feel bound to assume that polling officials were intended to have at least some remuneration—remuneration not only for their services on the polling day, but also for the time necessarily occupied in travelling to and from their stations. And therefore I am forced to the conclusion—at least I think so—that the expense in question—the personal outlay of these officials—is not covered by their fees, but must be found under some other head of the schedule.

But the only other head of the schedule under which any allowance is made to the presiding officer and clerk is that of "Travelling Expenses," and I agree with your Lordship that that is a category under which the expenses in question may quite well be brought. Personally I confess I have no particular difficulty in so holding. In the usual and popular sense, in the sense in which we should construe the expression in any private contract (a contract, e.g., between employer and employed), travelling expenses do not include merely the bare expenses of locomotion. They also include those personal outlays which are incidental to travelling, and which we all know are a necessary part of the expenses of travelling. And I see no reason why we should be astute in construing this statute or this schedule to restrict the expression in the way now proposed.

It was urged, however, and this was really the main argument, that the maximum allowance for "travelling expenses" is fixed at so much per mile; and that is said to be a limit appropriate only to mere locomotion. Well, it may be that a traveller's personal outlays are not always proportional to the length of his journey. But the object of the Act was not to fix a charge but to impose a limit, and it may very well have been considered that in fixing a limit for the total cost of a journey, the length of the journey afforded a measure—rough perhaps, but as good as any other—of the maximum cost. As I have already said, the object is not to fix a charge but only to fix a limit, and in this connection it is not unimportant to observe that the limit fixed by the schedule (1s. per mile) is certainly not appropriate to any known mode of locomotion. It is not enough for posting, the minimum charge for which is, as we all know, 1s. 3d. per mile. And it is far too much for railway fares, which in this country never exceed 3d. per mile. On the whole, therefore, while I do not say that the question is free from doubt, I concur with the judgment which your Lordship proposes.

No. 38.
Nov. 21, 1895.
Ivory v. Macrae.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—A returning officer in Scotland is entitled to recover from the candidates his "reasonable charges," not exceeding the sums mentioned in the schedule to the Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1891, "in respect of services and expenses of the several kinds mentioned in the said schedule, which have been properly rendered and incurred by him for the purposes of the election." What the Auditor on taxation has to do, therefore, as regards expenses (when there is a question of expenses incurred by the returning officer) is to inquire—(1) Whether the charges are reasonable; (2) whether they are within the maximum; (3) whether they are of the kinds mentioned in the schedule; and (4) whether they have been properly incurred for the purposes of the election.

No question arises in the present case as to the first, second, or fourth of these heads. The charges in themselves are not said to have been unreasonable; they are within the maximum; and they were incurred for the purposes of the election. The question is whether they are of any of the several kinds mentioned in the schedule. And here I desire to express my concurrence with the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division in re Election for South-Eastern Division of Essex, 1887, L. R., 19 Q. B. D. 252 (at p. 260), when they say, "We do not think that the Legislature intended to enact that no possible service or expense rendered or incurred by the Sheriff should be payable by the candidates merely because it does not come verbatim et literatim within the several descriptions in the schedule, provided it be a service or expense of one of the kinds mentioned." Be it observed that the learned Judges were there construing the English Returning Officers Act of 1875, the leading clause of which is in terms identical with the Scottish Act of 1891. Indeed, the whole of the Act of 1891 is modelled on the English Act, with certain slight modifications not material to the present question.

If, then, a Sheriff finds it necessary, in the exercise of his discretion, to despatch a presiding officer or a clerk to a polling-station at such a distance from his home that he must spend one or more nights at a hotel, does his hotel bill fall within the schedule? It is natural to expect that it should, for when a man is sent away from his home on business not his own, it is according to common experience that his expenses, not only of locomotion, but of living, are paid for him. The contrary, of course, may be arranged, or the fee paid may be so large as presumably to cover everything. But where the fee is no more than fair remuneration for time spent and services rendered, it is, I should say, invariable to allow all reasonable outlay which is incidental to the journey, and not merely the bare expense of locomotion.

No. 38.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Ivory v. Macrae.

Now, the phrase in the schedule under which this kind of expense must be brought (if it is to come within the schedule at all) is "travelling expenses of presiding officers and clerks." That seems to me a wide enough phrase to cover hotel bills. If a man were dispatched by his employer (say) to Paris, and was promised his "travelling expenses," the private contract would, I think, be so construed. I admit that the phrase might have been made more specific, but if the English Judges were right in holding (as I think they were) that a particular head of expense need not come verbatim et literatim within the schedule, provided it be, in a reasonable sense, of the kind there mentioned, it is of no consequence that hotel bills, or personal expenses, or expenses of maintenance, are not specifically mentioned.

Nor do I think it enough to deprive the phrase "travelling expenses" of its generic meaning, that the maximum rate is fixed by reference to the distance travelled. It is easy, no doubt, to deride the notion of paying for food at so much a mile. But locomotion is the primary item in travelling expenses, and the distance a man travels may very well be taken as a rough but not inappropriate test of the total cost of his journey, both for conveyance and maintenance. This consideration receives weight from the fact that the mileage rate is obviously fixed without reference to any particular mode of locomotion. It is too little for posting; it is a great deal too much for any kind of public conveyance.

The alternative view is that Parliament intended, either that the returning officer should bear these charges himself, or that he should succeed in finding presiding officers and clerks willing to pay them out of their own pockets. I cannot readily believe that Parliament intended either of these things. It was suggested in argument that hotel bills might fairly be met by these officers out of the additional fee of one guinea, and ten shillings respectively allowed for each night they are absent from home. But this is in effect to say that a man is to get no more for two days' work than for one. The normal fee of £3, 3s. in the case of the presiding officer, and £1, 1s. in the case of the clerk, is allowed by the schedule as the appropriate remuneration for one day's work done at the man's own door. If he is taken away from home, and has to spend two days on public duty, he is not extravagantly paid by getting in all £4, 4s., or £1, 11s., as the case may be, without having to bear charges which would go far to swallow up what is described as a "further fee." The "further fee," like the original fee, is, I am persuaded, intended, not as reimbursement for outlay, but as remuneration for time spent and services rendered.

I therefore agree with Lord M'Laren and Lord Kyllachy that the Auditor was wrong in taxing off these charges, and that they ought to be allowed.

With regard to the fee charged for the deputy returning officer acting as a presiding officer, I think the Auditor was right, because the deputy returning officer is the alter ego of the returning officer, and is subject to the same disabilities. In saying this I do not wish to be held as implying that in this particular case (which was a bye-election) it was competent to appoint a deputy returning officer at all. That is a point which, although mooted

No. 38. in argument, does not arise for decision, and I desire to reserve my opinion upon it.

Nov. 21, 1895. Ivory v. Macrae.

LORD ADAM.—My opinion differs from that of your Lordships, and, as that is so, I desire to state shortly the reasons which have brought me to that result. It is agreed on all hands that, unless the expression "travelling expenses" in the schedule to the Act of Parliament includes hotel expenses, hotel expenses cannot come under any other category of expenses allowed by the statute. I agree with Lord M'Laren that if the expression "travelling expenses" had been unqualified by any other words, incidental expenses, such as expenses on the way, and hotel expenses at the end of the journey, might well have been included under such a general expression. But when I read that travelling expenses are to be calculated at so much per mile, I find it so extremely difficult to see how travelling expenses calculated at a rate per mile can refer to hotel bills that I cannot agree with your Lordships. Such a rate refers my mind directly to the road, and it appears to me to be impossible to come to any other conclusion than that travelling expenses, which are to be calculated at so much per mile, mean travelling expenses proper, namely, the expenses of locomotion only. I cannot suppose that it was intended that hotel bills should or should not be chargeable according to the greater or less expense incurred in actual locomotion. Lord Kyllachy referred to the case of remote counties, where travelling facilities were few, and the polling places distant from any rails.

Now, it will be observed that the fund assumed to be provided, or available for payment of these hotel expenses, &c., is the difference between the actual amount paid for locomotion and the maximum amount of 1s. a mile allowed by the Act; so that if the journey is made by rail, say at 3d. a mile, there would be a surplus over for payment of these expenses. If, however, the journey is made by road, there would be no surplus at all, for the maximum sum allowed for travelling, 1s. a mile, would presumably be exhausted in paying the actual expenses of locomotion—posting, &c. The result is that there would be nothing left to pay these expenses in the cases where presumably they would be most frequently and necessarily incurred. I think the matter is provided for by another clause of the schedule, by which a guinea and ten shillings are allowed in the case of presiding officers and their clerks respectively for each night necessarily absent in connection with their duties.

I think the Legislature intended that they should get three guineas and one guinea for their labours on the polling day, one guinea or ten shillings for each night necessarily absent, and their actual travelling expenses of locomotion, and nothing more. I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the Auditor should be upheld.

On the other question I concur with your Lordships.

THEIR LORDSHIPS pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the objection to the Auditor having taxed off the said account the sum of £90, 17s. 5d. sterling, representing charges of presiding officers and their clerks for hotel bills and other personal expenses, and allow said charges: Repel the objection to the Auditor having taxed off said account the sum of £3, 3s. sterling, the amount of the fee charged by Mr Duncan Shaw, W.S., deputy returning officer, for acting as presiding officer at Inverness on the polling day: Disallow said last mentioned charge, and decern: Find the returning officer objector entitled to expenses," &c. No. 38. Nov. 21, 1895. Ivory v. Macrae.

J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—JOHN PITKEATHLY, L.A.—Agents.

JOHN H. DOUGLAS & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Dickson—Aitken.
MRS ELIZABETH MILNE, Defender (Respondent).—Salvesen—W. Thomson.

No. 39. Nov. 21, 1895.* Douglas & Co. v. Milne.

Sale—Warranty—Sale of goods for specific purpose—Implied condition of fitness for purpose not superseded by express warranty.—Where goods are sold for a specific purpose, the implied condition that the goods must be fit for that purpose is not superseded by an express warranty which is not inconsistent with it.

A wood-merchant accepted an order from a fish-curer for a quantity of staves. The contract bore that the staves were to be of certain dimensions, and "of good, sound, bright, dry, merchantable quality," but was silent as to the purpose for which they were required. The merchant, however, knew that they had been ordered for making herring pickle barrels. A quantity of staves of the description expressed in the contract, but made of wood too porous for retaining pickle, and therefore unfit for making the barrels, having been tendered to the fish-curer, held that he was entitled to reject them.

1st DIVISION. Lord Low.

ON 1st August 1893 James Milne, fish-curer in Aberdeen, sent an order in the following terms to Messrs John H. Douglas & Company, wood-merchants, London:—"Please ship to me soonest possible this season 40,000 superficial feet of 31 in. by $\frac{5}{8}$ in. white wood fir (spruce) staves, and 7000 superficial feet 36 in. by $\frac{3}{4}$ in. heading, at 52s. 6d. per 1000 superficial feet for the staves, and 57s. 6d. per 1000 superficial feet for the headings, c.i.f. Aberdeen. The staves and headings to be of good, sound, bright, dry, merchantable quality, and the measurement and my selection, if necessary, at Aberdeen to be made by Customs bill of entry measurer, the buyer and the sellers paying the measuring charge equally between them. Terms, nett cash on delivery."

The order was accepted by Messrs Douglas & Company, by a letter dated 10th August 1893, and a month later they sent to Aberdeen a cargo consisting partly of staves and headings of the dimensions ordered.

Milne refused to accept the goods, on the ground that they were not conform to contract.

Douglas & Company then raised an action against Milne for payment of the price of the goods. Milne having died while the action was pending, Mrs Elizabeth Milne, his widow and executrix, was sisted as defender in his place.

The defender stated that "the staves and headings were sold to the defender for the express purpose of being used in the manufacture of herring pickle barrels. At all events the pursuers were made aware of the purpose for which the goods were required by the defender, and it was a condition of the sale that the said goods should be rea-

* Decided Nov. 13, 1895.

No. 39.
Nov. 21, 1895.
Douglas & Co. v. Milne.

sonably fit for such purpose. This they were not." Such staves "require to be made of wood which will not allow the pickle to percolate through it. The pursuers knew this." Two barrels which the defender constructed to test the wood "were quite useless, as the water percolated through them."

The defender pleaded;—(1) The goods being disconform to contract and unsuitable for the purpose for which they were sold, and the defender having timeously rejected the same, he should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) allowed a proof, the result of which, for the purposes of this report, sufficiently appears from his Lordship's opinion.

On 31st May 1895 the Lord Ordinary sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and assoilzied her from the conclusions of the action.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—There was a written contract here. There was no mention in it of the particular purpose for which the wood was required, and it contained no warranty that the wood was fitted for making herring pickle barrels. The defender was not entitled to go outside the terms of the writing and import into the contract a condition that was not expressed.[1] An express warranty could not be extended by implication.[2] It might be admitted that the staves, &c., were intended for barrels, but there were many kinds of barrels, and for making some of these the wood supplied was well adapted. The goods therefore were "merchantable according to the denomination of the commodity."[3] The Lord Ordinary was wrong on the facts.

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was right on the facts. The pursuers knew perfectly well for what purpose the wood was required. The express warranty must be read with reference to

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The defence is that the staves and headings were not good and merchantable, in respect that they were made of porous wood, and could not be made into barrels capable of retaining pickle.

"It is plain upon the face of the letters that the goods ordered were materials—staves and headings—for the construction of barrels. It is also proved that staves and headings of white fir wood, of the dimensions specified in the letters, are used for the purpose of making barrels for pickled fish, and for no other purpose. That is the known and ordinary purpose for which such staves and headings are used, and there is no doubt that the pursuers knew perfectly well that that was the purpose for which the defenders ordered them.

"In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the condition that the staves and headings should be good and merchantable meant that they should be good and merchantable for the purpose of making pickle barrels. Indeed, if that condition had not been expressed in the contract, I think that it would have been implied, because the goods were ordered by the purchaser without sample or previous inspection, and the construction of pickle barrels was the purpose for which such goods were ordinarily used.

"The question therefore seems to me to resolve into one of fact, namely, whether the staves and headings were good and merchantable for the purpose of pickle barrels?

"In my opinion, that question must be answered in the negative. . . ."

[1] Hutchison & Co. v. Henry and Corrie, Nov. 26, 1867, 6 Macph. 57, 40 Scot. Jur. 36; Christie v. Hunter, March 16, 1880, 7 R. 729, at p. 730.

[2] Dickson v. Zizinia, Jan. 18, 1851, 20 L. J. C. P. 73; Benjamin on Sales, 663, 607.

[3] Bell's Prin. sec. 98; Gardiner v. Gray, March 6, 1815, 4 Camp. 144.

No. 39.

Nov. 21, 1895.
Douglas & Co. v. Milne.

that purpose, and amounted therefore to a warranty that the wood was fit for making herring pickle barrels. In any view, that it was so fit was an implied condition of the contract, and there being nothing inconsistent between the implied condition and the express warranty, the latter did not supersede and exclude the former.[1]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—(After stating that he agreed with the Lord Ordinary in his view of the evidence)—The question therefore comes to be—the main question which was argued—whether the defence is well founded in law. Assuming the facts to be as I have stated, I do not understand it to be disputed that when goods are ordered for a particular and specific purpose it is an implied condition, according to the law of Scotland, that the goods furnished must be fit for that purpose. But then it was said that when the parties had expressly contracted as to the nature and quality of the goods to be sold, the law will not imply any additional condition which they have not expressed; and the case of Dickson v. Zizinia[2] was cited in support of that doctrine. That case appears to me to be inapplicable. The contract was for the purchase of a specific cargo of corn actually shipped at the time on board a certain vessel by the plaintiff; but by the law of England, as explained in the judgment, there is no implied warrant in the sale of a particular chattel. Therefore if there were any warranty it must be found not in the general implication of law but in the contract itself; and the question therefore was not whether a warranty was implied by law, but whether an express warranty that the corn was good and merchantable at the time of shipment could be extended by implication from other parts of the contract to mean that it was in good and merchantable condition for a foreign voyage. The Court held that that stipulation could not be extended beyond the language employed; but that was a decision on the construction of a particular contract, and it seems to me to have no bearing upon the question in dispute. The cases of Cooper & Aves[1] and Bigge[3] are more in point. The result of these decisions is that when goods are ordered for a particular purpose the implied condition that the goods to be furnished must be fit for that purpose will not be excluded by any express warranty or condition which is capable of standing along with it. In the contract now in question there is no stipulation in the slightest degree inconsistent with the condition that the staves to be supplied shall be fit for herring barrels; and therefore it appears to me that on the principles explained in the case of Cooper & Aves[1] and the other English case to which I have referred, it must be held that, inasmuch as the goods were ordered for the specified and particular purpose of making herring barrels, the law super-adds to the express condition that they are to be of good, sound, bright, dry, merchantable quality the other implied condition that they are to be fit for the specified purpose.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—J. DOUGLAS GARDINER & MILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

[1] Jones v. Just, 1868, L. R., 3 Q. B. 197; Cooper & Aves v. Clydesdale Shipping Co., March 19, 1863, 1 Macph. 677, 35 Scot. Jur. 383.
[2] 20 L. J. C. P. 73.
[3] 31 L. J. Exch. p. 301.

No. 40.

Nov. 22, 1895.
County Council of Renfrew v. Trustees for Orphan Homes of Scotland.

THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF RENFREW, First Parties.—D. Dundas—R. E. M. Smith—R. S. Brown.
ROBERT BINNIE AND OTHERS (Trustees for the Orphan Homes of Scotland for Destitute Children), Second Parties.—Balfour—Clyde.

Process—Special Case—Competency—Absence of Lis.—Held that a special case which was brought for the purpose of ascertaining the true construction of an Act of Parliament, but which disclosed no controversy between the parties, was incompetent.

1st DIVISION. THIS was a special case presented by the County Council of Renfrewshire, as parties of the first part, and Robert Binnie and others, trustees of the Orphan Homes of Scotland for Destitute Children, as parties of the second part.

The statements in the case were to the following effect:—The second parties were heritably vested as trustees in subjects in the parish of Kilmalcolm, known as "The Orphan Homes of Scotland for Destitute Children," and these subjects were entered in the Valuation-roll for the county of Renfrew as occupied by "trustees for managers and children." The trustees were accordingly assessed by the County Council for consolidated rates in respect both of ownership and occupancy for the year from 15th May 1894 to 15th May 1895. Mr Quarrier (the manager of the orphanage), as representing the second parties, appealed against this assessment.

The Rates Appeal Committee of the County Council held that the term "Ragged School" used in the Sunday and Ragged Schools (Exemption from Rating) Act, 1869* (32 and 33 Vict. cap. 40), applied to the orphanage, and accordingly they discharged the occupiers' rates on the orphanage, but refused the appeal as regarded the proprietors' rates.

Mr Quarrier appealed to the County Council, and maintained that the Act gave power to the County Council to exempt the trustees as owners as well as occupiers from payment of rates.

"The County Council could not accept the interpretation put upon the Act of 1869 by Mr Quarrier, and a motion was proposed that the appeal be refused, to which an amendment was proposed and carried that a 'special case be submitted to the Court of Session by the council and the appellant in order to ascertain the extent, if any, to which the council have power to relieve the property referred to of assessments, and that after the decision of the Court has been got, the appeal be dealt with by the council, and relief given to that extent.' Mr Quarrier stated that he acquiesced in this course."

The present special case was accordingly presented.

It is not necessary to quote the questions originally stated in the case, as the parties stated at the outset of the discussion that they proposed to substitute the following:—"(1) Are the subjects assessed a Sunday school and a ragged school, or a Sunday school, or a ragged school, within the meaning of the Act 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 40? (2) If so, have the first parties as a rating authority power in virtue of said Act to relieve

* Section 1 provides,—"From and after the 30th day of September 1869 every authority having power to impose or levy any rate upon the occupier of any building, or part of a building, used exclusively as a Sunday School or Ragged School, may exempt such building, or part of a building, from any rate for any purpose whatever which such authority has power to impose or levy. . . ."

No. 40.

Nov. 22, 1895.

County Council of Renfrew v. Trustees for Orphan Homes of Scotland.

the said subjects or any part of them—(a) from the consolidated rates levied in respect of the ownership of the subjects; (b) from the consolidated rates levied in respect of the occupancy of the subjects?"

The case contained no statement of opposing contentions.

In support of the competency of the case if thus amended the parties argued;—A special case was competent wherever the parties were agreed upon the facts, and there was a question of law which might be raised by a declarator. The present case was equivalent to a declarator at the instance of the second parties, that (1) the subjects in question fell within the definition of ragged school in the Act of 1869; (2) that the County Council had power to exempt under the Act; and (3) that they were bound to consider Mr Quarrier's appeal. Such a declarator was competent.[1] The present case was practically an action to declare the meaning of the Sunday and Ragged Schools (Exemption from Rating) Act, 1869. Such a declarator was competent whenever there was a subject in dispute, and parties who had an interest to raise the question.[2] These conditions were satisfied here. If the County Council assessed Mr Quarrier, he might bring the assessment under review by a suspension of a charge for payment or a reduction, and he was therefore entitled to have his liability determined ab ante in the present proceedings.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The shape of the special case as it stands in type was such that it was announced at the outset that the parties proposed to substitute certain queries for those which are in the original case. We have before us this proposed amendment, and we have to consider whether it renders the case one which we can entertain. The first question is, "Are the subjects assessed a ragged school and a Sunday school, or a ragged school, or a Sunday school, within the meaning of the Act of 1869?" Now upon that query, the first question is, Who are the disputants? There are none; because, instead of dispute, there is practical agreement. The County Council have not on this question joined issue with Mr Quarrier, and they contend—and the special case defines their contention and its grounds for our consideration—nothing which is negative of the first query. On the contrary, I think the fair reading of their case is, that their desire is that that question should be affirmed. Now, it will not do for this Court, in questions of assessments, to give an answer to a query where there is no dispute, and no parties who take opposite views. Therefore I think that that question will not do. Then, as Lord Adam has pointed out, the second question is entirely dependent upon our answering the first in the affirmative. For it begins, "If so," &c. That seems to form a short and conclusive objection to our entertaining this second query. But I must go on to observe that I do not think the parties here have arrived at any stage at which there is such a lis or controversy that the Court is entitled to step in. If the County Council had disposed of Mr Quarrier's appeal in a way adverse to him, I can understand his challenging the legality of their decision in this form, or in a declarator. If it appeared, for instance, that the County Council had re-

[1] Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company v. Meek, Nov. 21, 1849, 12 D. 153, opinion of Lord Fullerton at p. 158, 22 Scot. Jur. 17.

[2] Leith Police Commissioners v. Campbell, Dec. 21, 1866, 5 Macph. 247, opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk at p. 251, 39 Scot. Jur. 100; Hogg v. Parochial Board of Auchtermuchty, June 22, 1880, 7 R. 986.

No. 40.

Nov. 22, 1895. County Council of Renfrew v. Trustees for Orphan Homes of Scotland.

fused to consider some question on which a right to exemption depended, it is not too bold to say that the remedy might have been found. But they have not done so; and for aught that appears, they might exempt Mr Quarrier.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with what has been said. No doubt a special case is a very valuable and quick and cheap mode of getting the opinion of the Court on matters appropriate for decision in that way. But it appears to me that in this case the form of a special case has been used where there is no dispute between the parties. About the first question there is no controversy. Mr Quarrier maintains that this orphanage is a ragged school, and it is set forth in the case that the County Council admit that it is a ragged school. There is accordingly no proper lis or case which can be brought before the Court in the shape of a special case. Then look at the other question. One would naturally suppose that the County Council would be the parties to maintain that they had the power of exemption. It is not likely that a board of any sort would be willing to deny that they had a right to exercise a certain discretion; yet here it is Mr Quarrier who wants to insist that his opponents have it, and his opponents, as I understand, are supposed to say that they have not got it. I do not think the question is a proper one for the judgment of the Court. Supposing we did decide these questions, our judgment might come to nothing if the County Council chose to say "We will exercise our discretion."

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I do not say that it would not be possible to obtain a judgment upon some of the questions indicated by Mr Clyde in the course of his argument as being those questions upon which the judgment of the Court is desired, and I do not say that it would be impossible to obtain those judgments in the form of a special case. But I agree with your Lordships that this case cannot be entertained, because it discloses no controversy between the parties. Neither in its form nor in its substance does it appear to me to raise any question on which the parties are opposed. The proper mode of stating a special case is, to set out in the first place an articulate statement of the facts on which the parties are agreed, and then to set out, as clearly and articulately, the opposing pleas of the parties. Here we have no opposing contentions. We may gather that different views of the statute may be maintained, but we have no statement of opposing pleas by the parties to the case. I therefore agree with your Lordships that this case as it now stands cannot be entertained.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT refused the motion for leave to amend, and dismissed the case.

F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 41.

Nov. 22, 1895. Wordie's Trustees v. County Council of Lanarkshire.

JOHN WORDIE AND OTHERS (William Wordie's Trustees) AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Johnston—A. S. D. Thomson.
THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF LANARKSHIRE, Defenders (Respondents).—C. J. Guthrie—Cullen.

Public Health—Special water supply—Agreement between Local Authorities—Assessment—Ultra vires.—A Parochial Board, as the Local Authority

No. 41.

Nov. 22, 1895. Wordie's Trustees v. County Council of Lanarkshire.

for the parish under the Public Health Act, 1867, having formed a Special Water Supply District, entered into an agreement with the Police Commissioners of a neighbouring burgh, whereby, in consideration of obtaining a supply of water for the Special Water District, the Parochial Board agreed to assess the inhabitants of the Special Water District at the same rate as the inhabitants of the burgh were assessed, and to pay over the proceeds to the Commissioners. Held that the agreement prescribed a mode of assessment for the Special Water District which was not in accordance with the statutory powers of the Local Authority imposing the assessment, and that, in so far as it did so, it was invalid.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

IN May 1875 the Parochial Board of the parish of Cadder, as Local Authority for the parish under the Public Health Act, 1867, entered into an agreement with the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Kirkintilloch, as the Local Authority for the burgh, whereby the latter (the first parties) agreed to supply water to a Special Water Supply District in the parish of Cadder, and the Parochial Board of Cadder, as Local Authority (the second parties) agreed, so long as the agreement subsisted, to "assess and levy from the inhabitants of the said Special Water Supply District upon the rental of property within the said district as appearing from the Valuation-roll aforesaid an equal rate of assessment with the rate of assessment levied by the first parties (i.e., the Commissioners), and their successors for the same year on the inhabitants within the burgh of Kirkintilloch, and the second parties shall pay over to the first parties the amount of each year's said levy on the 10th day of January in each year, less charges of collection and assessments irrecoverable."

In 1883 it was determined by an arbiter that under this agreement woodland and land used for agriculture within the special district fell to be assessed at one-fourth of the annual value, that being the statutory mode of assessment for like subjects within the burgh.

In 1887 the Parochial Board of Cadder entered into a similar agreement with the Police Commissioners for the drainage of a Special Drainage District of the parish, and for the assessment of the inhabitants of the drainage district at the same rate as the inhabitants of the burgh.

In 1889 the powers and duties of the Parochial Board of Cadder, as Local Authority under the Public Health Acts, were transferred by the Local Government Act, 1889, to the County Council of Lanark.

In levying assessments for the year 1894-95 upon the inhabitants of the above-mentioned Special Water Supply and Special Drainage District the County Council assessed the woodland and agricultural land within the special districts upon their gross valuation, under deduction of 10 per cent.

John Wordie and others, trustees of the deceased William Wordie of Millersneuk, as proprietors of that estate, which was included in the Special Water Supply District, objected to this mode of assessment, and brought the present action against the County Council to have it declared that the foresaid agreements and decree-arbitral were binding upon the defenders, and that so long as the agreements above mentioned subsisted, the defenders, in assessing for the purposes of water and drainage within the Special Water and Drainage Districts, were only entitled to assess woodland and agricultural land belonging to the pursuers upon the nearest aggregate sum of pounds sterling to one-fourth of their annual value as entered in the Valuation-roll.

The Police Commissioners of Kirkintilloch were not called as defenders.

No. 41.

Nov. 22, 1895. Wordie's Trustees v. County Council of Lanarkshire.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title or interest to sue. (2) All parties not called. (4) On a sound construction of the agreements and decree-arbitral, they do not bear the meaning contended for by the pursuers, and the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) Separatim, on the assumption that the agreements and decree-arbitral have the meaning and effect attributed to them by the pursuers, they are in contravention of the Public Health Acts and the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, and ultra vires of the predecessors of the defenders, who are not bound thereby, and should be assoilzied.

On 6th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) sustained the first and second pleas in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof, dismissed the action.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The decree-arbitral was decisive on the meaning of the agreements, and the defenders, as the successors of the Parochial Board, were bound by the agreements as so construed. The pursuers, as interested parties, had a title to sue.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuers not being parties to the agreements had no title to sue for their enforcement. Further, they were mistaken in their interpretation of the agreements, which merely bound the Local Authority to pay to the Commissioners of the burgh a contribution of a certain amount. Assuming that the pursuers rightly construed the agreements, they were ultra vires of the Local Authority, and therefore not binding on the defenders, as no Local Authority could levy assessments except in accordance with its statutory powers.

Lord President.—This action is clearly unmaintainable, but I think that the true objection to it is founded upon a broader ground than that stated by the Lord Ordinary.

The action in substance, and indeed in expression, is an application to the Court to have it declared that the County Council is bound to levy the assessments in a manner for which there is no statutory warrant. The pursuers are ratepayers, and are bound to pay only such assessments as the assessing body has a right to impose. Now they say that the predecessors of the County Council, the Parochial Board, agreed with the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Kirkintilloch, that the latter should let them have a supply of water for their Special Water Supply District; so far the proceeding was quite regular and proper, but they go on to say that the agreement prescribes as a consideration for the supply that the Parochial Board should not pay a contribution to the Police Commissioners, but should assess the inhabitants of the Special Water Supply District in the same manner as the people in the burgh are assessed by the Police Commissioners. No doubt it is competent for the Local Authority to enter into an arrangement by which they should get a supply of water and pay for it, and they may fix the amount to be paid by any standard of calculation which they choose to imagine, but their contribution, whatever it is, must be raised in a manner allowed by their own assessing powers. It would be competent for them to stipulate that they should pay either a lump sum or a proportion of the total liability, provided that the Local Authority raise the funds according to their statutory powers. But what never can be done is that the assessing body should acquire right to levy assessments otherwise than is allowed by statute, and therefore the agreement, so far as it pre-

No. 41.

Nov. 22, 1895.
Wordie's Trustees v. County Council of Lanarkshire.

scribes a non-statutory mode of assessment, is entirely invalid. Accordingly, the County Council have no course open to them but to disregard the agreement, and to satisfy what they are bound to pay by levying assessments in the only lawful way. On that ground I think that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, but I am not satisfied that the pursuers would have no title to sue on the agreement on the assumption that it was a lawful agreement. I think if the agreement had merely regulated the amount of contribution, and the assessments had been in excess of this, it would be by no means clear that the pursuers could not found upon it. But this is to imagine a different case from what we have here.

LORD ADAM.—I agree. I think your Lordship has put the case upon the right grounds.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with all that your Lordship has said, and have nothing to add, except that, if the agreement could be construed as meaning that the Parochial Board should be bound to contribute towards the expense of the special water supply a sum not exceeding the amount which would be raised by an assessment on one-fourth of the value of lands, then I do not say that effect could not be given to it. But I quite agree with your Lordship that that is not the meaning of the agreement. It is not an undertaking to contribute a sum, but to levy an assessment.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defenders.

MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 42.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

JAMES HOOD AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—Shaw—Ure—Dewar.
JOHN EDWARD GORDON, Respondent.—Dickson—C. N. Johnston—Wilson.
THE LORD ADVOCATE.—Ferguson, A.-D.

Election Law—Petition against return of Member—Bribery—Treating—Illegal practices—Statement of particulars—Specification.—In an election petition held that in the "statement of particulars" provided by rule 1 of the Additional Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1869, (1) with reference to allegations of bribery and treating, it was necessary to set forth the places where the alleged acts were committed, and the form in which the bribery was effected; (2) with reference to allegations of illegal payments made by political associations or clubs, it was necessary to state the individuals through whom the alleged payments were made, and the particular items complained of.

Election Law—Jurisdiction—Diligence for recovery of documents—Citation of witnesses and havers—Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 125), secs. 2, 26, and 58.—Held that the Judges in an election petition have no jurisdiction to grant a diligence for recovery of documents prior to the trial, but may grant warrant to cite witnesses and havers in common form.

Observations on Moore v. Kennard, 1883, L. R., 10 Q. B. D. 290.

(SEE previous report, supra, p. 4.)

ELECTION JUDGES.
Lord M'Laren.
Ld. Kyllachy.

On 19th October the petitioners lodged an amended petition, and on that date the Election Judges pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Appoint the trial of said petition to be proceeded with within the Court-House at Elgin, upon Tuesday the 19th day of November 1895, at ten o'clock, and ordain the petitioners, not later than three weeks before the said date of the trial, to lodge with the Principal Clerk of the First Division of the Court of Session, and serve upon the respondent, at the office of his agent in Edinburgh, a written statement setting forth the particular acts of bribery, treating, undue influence, and corrupt and illegal practices as to which they purpose to lead evidence at the trial." *

No. 42.
Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

In the statement of particulars prepared by the petitioners in terms of the above interlocutor, they set forth in articles I. and II. twenty-seven cases of bribery and twenty-four cases of treating. In regard to these charges, they set forth the names of the persons said to have been bribed or treated, their numbers on the roll of electors, and the persons by whom the alleged acts of bribery or treating were committed. As regarded the charges of bribery, the month only was specified, in some cases a latitude of from two to three months being taken. As regarded the charges of treating, in nine of the alleged cases the day of treating was specified, while in the remaining fifteen cases the month only was stated.

In regard to the alleged illegal and corrupt practices the petitioners set forth,—"(III.) . . . In or about the month of February 1894 the said John E. Gordon announced, and it became publicly known, that he intended to present himself for election, and in point of fact the candidature of the said John E. Gordon then began. In the months of February, March, April, and May 1894, he held meetings in forty or fifty different places throughout the constituency, engaged in a house-to-house canvass, and performed other election work, all with a view to his election and return. And subsequent thereto he also performed such work. In respect of all such expenses and work sums of money were paid and disbursed by him and others on his behalf, including the said John Wink † and the said John Foster, and the societies and others mentioned in subsection 2 hereof, in respect of the conduct and management of the election, which expenses are not included in said return. And your petitioners intend to prove that the said John E. Gordon and his said agent well knew that all such expenses ought to have been included in said return, yet they knowingly and illegally failed so to include it. And further, your petitioners intend to prove that sums of money not included in said

* The Additional Parliamentary Election Petition Rules of 1869 provided,—Rule 1. "Evidence need not be stated in the petition, but the Court, or either of the Election Judges, may, on the requisition of the respondent, order the petitioner, within such period previous to the day fixed for the trial of the petition as may in the circumstances be deemed right, to lodge with the principal clerk, and to serve on the respondent or his agent, in the manner prescribed with regard to election petitions, a written statement of such particulars as may be necessary to prevent surprise and unnecessary expense, and to ensure a fair and effectual trial."

Rule 2. "No evidence shall be received at the trial except as to matters within the written statement ordered as aforesaid, and tending to support the same, or matters which have been already sufficiently set forth in the petition, without the leave of the Court or the Judge, and upon such conditions as to the postponement of the trial, payment of costs, and otherwise, as may be ordered."

† Mr Wink afterwards became Mr Gordon's election agent, and Mr Foster was the organising secretary of the associations referred to in numbers (6) and (7) of the list referred to on p. 173, post.

No. 42.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

return were paid to agents, and organisers, and canvassers, by the said John E. Gordon, or by others in respect of the conduct and management of said election, with the knowledge and concurrence of the said John Edward Gordon, and of his said election agent. And the said agents, and organisers, and canvassers disbursed said sums of money for the purpose of conducting and managing said election. The petitioners believe and aver that the sum so expended amounted to not less than £700.

"(Second) That the following societies, clubs, or associations were the agents of the respondent in said election, and were recognised by him as agents:— . . . 6. The Elgin and Nairn Conservative Association, whose offices are in Elgin, and whose secretary and treasurer is John Wink, solicitor, Elgin, and the district committees connected therewith. 7. The Elgin and Nairn Liberal Unionist Association, whose offices are in Elgin, and whose secretary and treasurer is Hugh Stewart, solicitor, Elgin, and the district committees connected therewith. . . .

"The said associations mentioned in the foregoing list, and numbered 6, 7 . . . hereof, had numerous meetings during the course of said candidature, namely, from January 1894 till the date of the election, with reference to and for the purpose of promoting said candidature.

"That the said nine societies, clubs, or associations, from January 1894 until subsequent to said election, incurred expenses and expended money in conducting and managing said election, supplied literature, appointed agents and canvassers, and performed other work with the knowledge of the respondent and the said John Wink, and in the promotion of his candidature—they acting as his agents in said matters."

To this statement the respondent lodged, upon 31st October, a note of objections, in which he objected that the statement of particulars did not (a) as regarded the alleged cases of bribery sufficiently specify the dates, places, nature, and amount of the said several alleged bribes; and (b) as regarded the alleged cases of treating did not sufficiently specify the dates, places, or the nature and character of the alleged treating. As regarded the third article of the statement he objected "that there is no relevant averment under the third head of the statement of particulars; and further, that there is no sufficient specification as to the place or places, the time or times, or the details of the alleged payments, disbursements, or liabilities, and no sufficient specification of the persons, societies, clubs, or associations concerned in the matters complained of, or by whom the said disbursements, payments, and liabilities were made or incurred."

Argued for the respondent;—As the charges of bribery and treating were of the nature of crimes, both the locus and the modus must be stated. In the case of bribery it was essential that the modus should be stated, in order that the respondent might have notice of the particular form of bribery alleged.[1] The latitude as to time was too great.[2] As regarded the statements in article III. the names of the individuals who made the payments, and not merely the names

[1] Eastern Division of Manchester Case, 1892, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 120; Rogers on Elections, vol. ii. p. 200; Day's Election Cases, p. 153; Rogers on Elections, Appendix 4, Forms 38 and 39, pp. 655 and 656; Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 102), secs. 2 and 4.

[2] Eastern Division of Manchester Case, 1892, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 120, per J. Cave, p. 121; Day's Election Cases, p. 154.

No. 42.
Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

of the associations, must be specified.[1] It was also necessary to state the nature of the expenditure complained of, what was paid in cash, the persons to whom and by whom the payment was made, and the place and date of each payment. The private transactions of political associations could not be inquired into, and so far as the statement contained averments relating to such associations it was irrelevant. On all the points contended for the practice in England was in favour of the respondents; and even assuming there was a difference between the English and Scots practice, which was not admitted, the English practice was to be preferred, in respect that there was more experience in England of the practice in the House of Commons' committees prior to the transference of election petitions to legal tribunals. The practice before the committees was to be followed where there were no special rules of Court.[2]

Argued for the petitioners;—The Scots practice was in accordance with the course followed by the petitioners.[3] The form of order in England[4] was different from that in the interlocutor of 19th October, and the particulars stated by the petitioner sufficiently complied with that interlocutor. As regarded article III., the petitioners were prepared to give the dates and places of the meetings which they alleged were paid for by the associations, but it was impossible for the petitioners to ascertain the names of the individuals who made the payments, and it was not reasonable to require them to do this.

LORD M'LAREN.—As regards the statements in articles I. and II. dealing with the charges of bribery and treating, I am of opinion that there is insufficient specification. The statement of particulars ought to specify the places where the alleged acts of bribery and treating were committed, and in the case of bribery, the form in which the bribery was effected. It does not appear that in any of the cases in Scotland cited to us this question was argued to the Court or judicially determined. In England the practice is in accordance with the ruling I have indicated. If the petitioners are not aware of these particulars, and are unable to specify them, that ought to appear in the statement.

The petitioners have indicated their intention to amend the statements in articles I. and II. to this effect, and I propose that we should allow such amendments to be made. As regards article III., dealing with illegal payments, or payments not included in the return of expenses, I think the respondent's objection ought to be sustained. There are no relevant averments in that article upon which the petitioners would, in my opinion, be entitled to an allowance of proof. It is not enough to say that political associations or clubs made payments in contravention of the statute. There must be specific averments as to the individuals through whom the alleged payments were made, and the particular items of which the petitioners complain.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

---

[1] Hexham Case, referred to on p. 14 of Day's Election Cases; Rochester Case, referred to ibidem, pp. 98 and 104.

[2] Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 124), sec. 26.

[3] Boyd and O'Kane v. Stewart (Wigtown Burghs Case), July 13, 1880, 7 R. 1170; Juridical Styles, vol. iii. p. 855.

[4] Rogers on Elections, vol. ii. p. 200.

No. 42.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

On 2d November the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the amended petition, together with the statement of particulars and the note of objections thereto for the respondents, and heard counsel for the parties thereon, sustain the respondent's objection to the third head of the said statement of particulars, reserving to the petitioners to put in a new statement under this head: Also allow the petitioners to amend the other articles of the statement of particulars, such amendments to be lodged by Wednesday next."

Along with their original statement of particulars the petitioners lodged a specification of writings for the recovery of which they craved a diligence. The respondent objected, on the ground that it was incompetent for the Election Judges to grant the diligence.*

Argued for the petitioners;—A diligence for the recovery of documents was granted in the Wigtown case,[1] and also in the unreported Dumbartonshire case. In the latter, though no objection was taken on the particular ground of competency, the diligence was undoubtedly opposed. Section 26 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, if considered in connection with section 2, was intended to provide a rule for dealing with contingencies to which the ordinary procedure of the Court was inapplicable or inadequate. The English cases were not applicable, because there was no procedure in England analogous to the Scottish diligence.

Argued for the respondents;—It had been settled in England that the diligence craved here was incompetent.[2] The power of the Court to exercise its ordinary jurisdiction in the case of election petitions, conferred by section 2 of the Act of 1868, was "subject to the provisions of this Act," that is, subject, inter alia, to the provisions of section 26, which expressly provided that the procedure before the Parliamentary committees should be followed in the absence of a rule

---

* The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 125), enacted, section 2,—"The expression 'the Court' shall, for the purposes of this Act, in its application to England, mean the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, and in its application to Ireland, the Court of Common Pleas at Dublin, and such Court shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have the same powers, jurisdiction, and authority with reference to an election petition, and the proceedings therein, as it would have if such petition were an ordinary cause within their jurisdiction."

Section 58.—"The provisions of this Act shall apply to Scotland, subject to the following modifications:—

"(1) The expression 'the Court' shall mean either Division of the Inner-House of the Court of Session, and either of such Divisions shall have the same powers, jurisdiction, and authority with reference to an election petition in Scotland, and the proceedings thereon, which by this Act are conferred on the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster with respect to election petitions in England."

Section 26.—"Until rules of Court have been made in pursuance of this Act, and so far as such rules do not extend, the principles, practice, and rules on which committees of the House of Commons have heretofore acted in dealing with election petitions shall be observed so far as may be by the Court and Judge in the case of election petitions under this Act."

[1] Boyd and O'Kane v. Stewart, July 13, 1880, 7 R. 1170.

[2] Moore v. Kennard, 1883, L. R., 10 Q. B. D. 290; Wells v. Wren, 1880, L. R., 5 C. P. D. 546.

No. 42.

Nov. 23, 1895. Hood v. Gordon.

of Court dealing with the question. It was never the practice of Parliamentary committees to grant a diligence for the recovery of documents before the trial, and there was no special rule. There was no precedent in Scotland. In the Dumbartonshire case, in which a diligence was granted, the question of competency was not considered, but only questions relating to the particular articles of the specification. The petitioners' application was therefore incompetent, and should be refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—The debate to which we have listened raises a question of some general importance in election law, and which has not yet been decided in Scotland either by the Election Judges or by one of the Divisions of the Court. It is true that in the report of the Wigtown Burghs case[1] it is stated that a diligence to recover documents was granted, but there is nothing in the report which suggests that this was the subject of discussion. No opinions are reported, and it is stated in Mr Blair's Election Manual (p. 278) that in point of fact the question of the competency of granting a diligence was not raised. Then my colleague, Lord Kyllachy, states that it is within his knowledge of the Dumbartonshire case, where such an application was also granted, that the question of competency or of consistency with the past election law and practice was not raised.

Therefore it appears to me that the point is open so far as regards previous decisions of this Court. Now, at the time when these orders were pronounced the question seems to have been not very much considered either in Scotland or in England, and we find that in the Stafford Election Petition in 1869,[2] an order for the recovery of documents, of vouchers, and orders for payment by the respondent, was granted by a Judge of very high authority—Mr Justice Blackburn.

The question, however, was raised in England in the two cases that have been cited, and a very authoritative judgment was given in the case of Moore v. Kennard,[3] after consideration of all that had been done before, and of the policy of the statute under which the jurisdiction is exercised. The judgment of the Court in that case does not appear to proceed upon anything technical or peculiar to the practice of the English Courts. It is not because an English Common Law Court does not usually grant an order for recovery against parties other than the parties to the case, but because in the opinion of the Judges who decided the case the practice of Parliamentary Committees was entirely adverse to such a proceeding, and because, under the statute which guides the Courts, the law and practice of Parliament is referred to as a guide in all matters that are not regulated by the statute itself, or by the rules and orders made in pursuance of it.

Now, even if I had more difficulty than I have on this subject, I should consider that this case was an authority to be deferred to, because it is a judgment of a co-ordinate Court on a question of practice on the same statute, a statute which is intended to be worked in precisely the same way throughout the United Kingdom with reference to the pre-existing practice, which was the practice of Parliamentary committees sitting to try election

[1] Boyd and O'Kane v. Stewart, 7 R. 1170.
[2] 20 L. T. 237.
[3] L. R., 10 Q. B. D. 290.

No. 42.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

petitions both for Scotland and for England. But I do not entertain any doubt as to the soundness of that decision.

On the contrary, my view entirely coincides with what was expressed by the English Judges. I think it is not contemplated in the statutes constituting this Court that there should be any preliminary proceedings involving proof, but that the whole of the matters of fact, including documentary as well as parole evidence, are to be investigated at the trial. It is not to be overlooked that the probability is that such an investigation would not lead to any useful results, but I do not proceed on that, but rather on a more general view, that it was not intended that any such powers should be exercised. If it were necessary that a certain document should be on the table of the Court for consideration, I have no doubt whatever that we have jurisdiction to make an order; for example, in the case of the orders that are granted for recovery of ballot papers and counterfoils, not only in questions of enumeration but also for the purposes of scrutiny. That, of course, is a proceeding directed for a quite different purpose from the present, and my opinion is that the diligence moved for should be refused.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion. We are here exercising statutory jurisdiction, that is to say, jurisdiction subject to the provisions of the Act of 1868. Now, one of the provisions of that Act is the provision contained in section 26, "that until rules of Court have been made in pursuance of this Act, and so far as such rules do not extend, the principles, practice, and rules on which Committees of the House of Commons have heretofore acted in dealing with election petitions shall be observed, so far as may be, by the Court and Judge in the case of election petitions under this Act."

Now, that being so, two things are admitted—first, that according to the practice and rules of Parliamentary committees, the recovery of documents antecedent to the trial of the case was not permitted; second, that that being the rule of Parliament, no rules of Court have yet been made conferring upon Election Judges such a power. Whether it would be a convenient power—whether it would be a power that could be properly exercised consistently with the scheme of the Act of 1868 and of the Corrupt Practices Act—I do not find it necessary to say; but no such rule has yet been made. That is enough. I therefore on principle entirely agree with the views expressed by the English Judges in the cases which have been quoted, and I also agree with your Lordship that even if we had doubts on the subject we should hesitate to differ.

THE COURT accordingly refused the motion.

On 6th November the petitioners, in terms of the interlocutor of 2d November, lodged an amended statement of particulars.

On 12th November the petitioners presented a note in which they craved warrant to cite witnesses and havers to attend the trial. A list was subjoined of the names of the witnesses and havers whom the petitioners proposed to cite.

Counsel for the respondent objected to warrant being granted for the citation of havers on the ground that no power to cite havers

No. 42.
Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

was given by the Election Petition Rules, 1868—(Rule 23 and Schedule D.)

LORD M'LAREN.—No specification has been granted here; on the contrary, after consideration, that was refused, and all that can be done under the warrant asked for is that a notice may be given to the witness of the documents that it is desired he should bring with him. Then it must be left to the witness to act as he thinks proper. If he thinks that the documents asked for are altogether outside the scope of the inquiry, and such as the Election Judges would not call upon him to produce, he may act accordingly, but if, on the other hand, documents which might throw light on the proceedings are called for and he does not bring them, there may be a question of the adjournment of the trial, and a question of expenses. We thought that it was not in accordance with the general law of elections to grant recoveries before trial; therefore it rather appears to me that in granting diligence against witnesses and havers, we imply nothing more than that the witnesses may be called upon to produce documents relative to the case, the relevancy to be determined, of course, by the Court.

LORD KYLLACHY.—A citation of havers merely gives the witness notice that he is called upon to produce documents at the trial. Whether he shall produce them at the trial will depend upon what we decide upon objection by him, or upon objection by the other side, or upon objection by ourselves. This is the usual form of diligence which is granted in the Outer-House where proofs are allowed. The diligence is granted against witnesses and havers, and it often happens that the haver states, "I thought this document had nothing to do with the case, and could not have imagined that the Court would call upon me to produce it," and the haver has been sent back for it, and that involved certain consequences. After all it merely means that he comes with a document prepared to produce it if called upon.

THE COURT accordingly granted warrant to cite witnesses and havers in usual form.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 43.
Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

JAMES HOOD AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—Shaw—Ure—Dewar.
JOHN EDWARD GORDON, Respondent.—Dickson—C. N. Johnston—Wilson.
THE LORD ADVOCATE.—Ferguson, A.-D.

Election Law—Election Petition—Expenses incurred in the conduct and management of the election—Return of expenses—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 51), secs. 8 and 28.—The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 8, enacts,—"Subject to such exception as may be allowed in pursuance of this Act, no sum shall be paid and no expense shall be incurred by a candidate at an election, or his election agent, whether before, during, or after an election, on account of, or in respect of, the conduct or management of such election in excess of" the scheduled allowance.

In February 1894 A was invited by a local Conservative Association to become the Unionist candidate for the county in the event of a Parliamentary election. A, in reply, stated, that in the event of an election he would consider the matter. Between that time and October he spent several weeks in the constituency, and addressed a large number of political meetings. He was absent from the county from the end of October till the end of May 1895, when he returned.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.

Hood v. Gordon.

On 21st June the ministry were defeated and a dissolution became imminent. A then became the recognised Unionist candidate.

Held that the expenses incurred by A prior to 21st June 1895 were not expenses incurred "on account of, or in respect of, the conduct or management of" the election in the sense of sec. 8 of the Act.

Election Law—Election Petition—Polling Agent—Employment as subagent—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 51), sec. 17.—Held that the fee paid to a person as polling agent for a Parliamentary candidate was not to be regarded as to any extent a payment to him as a subagent merely because the polling agent voluntarily canvassed certain electors.

Election Law—Election Petition—Expenses—Political Associations.—In an election petition raising a question as to the sums to be included in the respondent's account of election expenses, it was proved that for two years prior to the election he had contributed £120 per annum to a local political association. The petitioner proposed to ask a witness to state the amount of the contributions by other persons. The Court disallowed the question.

Observations (per Lord M'Laren) on the expenditure of political associations.

Election Law—Election Agent—Payments.—Observation upon the duty of an election agent in regard to payments.

ELECTION JUDGES. Lord M'Laren. Ld. Kyllachy.

(SEQUEL of previous case.)

The trial of the petition began at Elgin on 19th November, and evidence was first led in regard to the charge of illegal practices under the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883.* On this

* The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 51), enacts :—

"Sec. 8. (1) Subject to such exception as may be allowed in pursuance of this Act, no sum shall be paid and no expense shall be incurred by a candidate at an election, or his election agent, whether before, during, or after an election, on account of, or in respect of, the conduct or management of such election in excess of any maximum amount in that behalf specified in the first schedule to this Act." In the schedule a maximum scale of expenditure is stated proportionate to the magnitude of the constituency.

"(2) Any candidate or election agent who knowingly acts in contravention of this section shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

"Sec. 17. (1) No person shall, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate at any election, be engaged or employed for payment or promise of payment for any purpose or in any capacity whatever, except for any purposes or capacities mentioned in the first or second parts of the First Schedule to this Act, or except so far as payment is authorised by the first or second parts of the First Schedule to this Act." The persons who may be employed, as enumerated in the schedule, are, an election agent, who has the general supervision of the candidate's affairs, and for each district a subagent, polling agent, a clerk, and a messenger.

"Sec. 28. Except as permitted by or in pursuance of this Act, no payment and no advance or deposit shall be made by a candidate at an election or by any agent on behalf of the candidate, or by any other person at any time, whether before, during, or after such election, in respect of any expenses incurred on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of such election, otherwise than by or through the election agent of the candidate, whether acting in person or by a subagent; and all money provided by any person other than the candidate for any expenses incurred on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election, whether as

No. 43.

Nov. 28, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

branch of the case the petitioners in their amended statement of particulars amended articles I. and II. of the original statement of particulars in terms of the judgment of the Court giving effect to the respondent's objections to it.* As regarded article III., the petitioners amended it by setting forth in detail, so far as known to them, (1) the expenses of meetings addressed by Mr Gordon from February to October 1894; (2) certain expenses of advertising the said meetings, railway fares, and hiring by the respondent and by John Foster† during the said months, and personal expenses of the respondent, "the details of which are unknown to the petitioners, but which they aver amounted to not less than £250." "(Third), that the whole expenses of the meetings, canvass, and other election work above referred to, including the expenses specified in the first and second heads hereof, were incurred in respect of the conduct and management of the election, and with the knowledge and concurrence of the respondent," and were paid partly by the said John Wink and partly by the said John Foster. "That at the date of said payments the said John Wink and John Foster were agents of the respondent for the purposes of said election and candidature, and it was well known to the respondent that the expenses in question were being paid by them. That the respondent and the said John Wink well knew that said expenses ought to have been included in the return respecting election expenses lodged by the said John Wink, and that they were not so included, and that in this respect the said return, and the declarations as to expenses lodged by them respectively, are false."

They further stated (art. IV.),—"That the said John Foster was employed by or on behalf of the respondent, as an agent, in January or February 1894. That he continued to act as an agent until after the election. That throughout said period he was recognised by the respondent as such. That he introduced the respondent to voters, held meetings, canvassed, and did all manner of election work. That he was paid for such work a sum of not less than £300; and that he received in addition large sums of money, amounting to not less than £200, for the purpose of conducting and managing said candidature and election. That said respective sums were so received and disbursed by him in the conduct and management of said candidature and election. That this was well known to the respondent and his said election agent, yet they wilfully failed to include the money so paid to Foster, and the money disbursed by him, in the said election return."

Art. V. set forth that "the petitioners intended to prove that the said election is illegal, in respect that the respondent paid personal expenses incurred by him on account of, or in connection with, or incidental to said election, in excess of £100, and otherwise than through his election agent, in contravention of section 31 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883."

In art. VI. they stated,—"(1) that the total number of voters in said combined counties is 5669. (2) That in said combined counties, the maximum amount which the respondent was legally entitled to gift, loan, advance, or deposit, shall be paid to the candidate or his election agent, and not otherwise."

---

"Sec. 31. (1) The candidate at an election may pay any personal expenses incurred by him on account of or in connection with or incidental to such election to an amount not exceeding one hundred pounds, but any further personal expenses so incurred by him shall be paid by his election agent."

* Ante, pp. 172 to 175. † See note, p. 172.

spend in the conduct and management of said election, exclusive of personal expenses and sums paid to the returning officer, was £890. (3) That the sums expended as specified in articles III. and IV. amount in all to £700 or thereby. These sums being added to the amount set forth in the said return (exclusive of personal expenses and sums paid to the returning officer)—£854, 12s. 11d.—largely exceed the said maximum amount. These sums have been paid by the respondent, or by others on his behalf, and with his knowledge and concurrence, in respect of the conduct and management of said election, exclusive of said personal expenses and sums paid to the returning officer."

They further averred (art. VIII.) that certain persons, including John M'Hardy, had been illegally employed and paid by the respondent or his election agent, or others on his behalf to act, and did act, as subagents, organisers, and canvassers, at the said election. (3) That the respondent or his election agent paid £17, 17s. to M'Hardy. "(4) That the said sums were paid to the said persons in respect of services other than those specified in the said return. The said persons were illegally employed to act as subagents and canvassers, and were falsely and deliberately designated in said election return as polling agents and clerks, for the purpose of evading the provisions of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883."

The following was the import of the evidence:—On 9th February 1894 Mr Gordon addressed for the first time a political meeting in the constituency upon the invitation of the local Conservative Association. After this meeting a resolution was adopted by the committee that Mr Gordon was a fit and proper person to be invited to come forward and contest the seat in the Unionist interest at the first opportunity. In answer to this resolution Mr Gordon informed the committee that if, when an election came the Association and the Unionists generally agreed to put him forward as their candidate, he would consider the question then, and that he would defray the expenses of the election period, but that he would expect the local associations to defray the expenses of their political work until the election period. There was no pledge or understanding either by him or by the committee binding him to accept the candidature or them to give an invitation. In his evidence Mr Gordon described his position as that of "prospective candidate." He was thereafter adopted as prospective candidate by both Unionist Associations. The respondent left the counties for a short time but returned on 20th February, and with the exception of a few days remained in the constituency till 8th May. During that time he held more than forty meetings throughout the constituency, and visited numbers of the electors personally at their homes. In visiting the electors he was accompanied by Mr Foster, the organising secretary of the County and Burgh Unionist Associations, who also made the arrangements for the meetings. On 8th May he left, but returned to the constituency in October, when he remained three weeks, addressed two meetings and visited some of the electors. He was absent from the counties from October 1894 till the end of May 1895, when he returned. The expenses of these meetings were defrayed out of the funds of the Conservative Association by Mr Wink, who was ultimately Mr Gordon's election agent, but was then acting in his capacity as secretary and treasurer of the Association, an office which he had held since 1879. These expenses amounted to £59, 13s. 9d. On 22d June Mr Gordon left for the south not intending to return till the autumn, but on the journey south he heard of the defeat of the Government on 21st June, and determined to return at once to the constituency. On 26th June it was officially announced that the policy of the new Government was a policy of dissolution. Mr Gordon was formally adopted as Unionist candidate on 5th July, but he addressed a meeting as candidate at Forres on the 2d. Parliament was dissolved on 8th July, and the writ for the counties arrived at Elgin on the 9th. Up to 6th July the respondent was always referred to in all formal motions and minutes as a prospective candidate. All expenses incurred by Mr Gordon on and after 2d July were included in the return. Mr Gordon's personal expenses during 1894 were £134, and during 1895, prior to 2d July, £72. After 2d July to the end of the election they were £87. Those incurred prior to 2d July 1895 were not included in the return, and no part of these expenses was paid through the election agent.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895. Hood v. Gordon.

Mr Foster came into the counties on 8th January 1894, as organising secretary of the County and Burgh Unionist Associations. From that date to the date of the election he was working in the constituency in that capacity. He deponed that his duties were "to meet parish Unionist committees, to strengthen them, to get up facts for the Registration Courts, and to see that there was a constant stream of Unionist speakers in the constituency, and that it was part of his work to secure the return of the Unionist candidate at the election, whoever he might be." He was paid by the Unionist Associations, and received in all £223 for salary and outlays. This sum was not included in the return of election expenses. The respondent subscribed £120 in each of the years 1894 and 1895 to the funds of the Conservative Association, and at Christmas 1894 he made Mr Foster a present of £10. If the payments for the meetings addressed by Mr Gordon in 1894, (amounting to £59, 13s. 9d.), and the payments to Mr Foster (amounting to £223) had been included in the return, the maximum allowed by statute would have been exceeded by about £250. The maximum expenses in the constituency were £890, the actual return £854.

The facts in regard to the part of the petitioners' case dealing with the employment of M'Hardy are sufficiently stated in Lord M'Laren's opinion, at p. 189.

In the course of the proof Mr Wink stated that in each of the years 1894 and 1895 Mr Gordon subscribed £120 to the funds of the local Conservative Association.

Counsel for the petitioners proposed, in re-examination, to ask the following question:—"How much did the other subscribers give to the Association?"

Counsel for the respondent objected.

Argued for the petitioners;—The petitioners' case was that these expenses ought to have been included in the return. It now appeared that they were defrayed, not by Mr Wink as election agent, but as secretary of the Association, to which Mr Gordon paid a large subscription. It was very important in proving the petitioners' case to shew that nine-tenths of this Association's funds were subscribed by Mr Gordon. The object was to shew that the Association in this matter was really identified with Mr Gordon, as he was practically the sole subscriber, and used the Association as a means of paying election expenses without including them in the return. There was notice of a charge that payments were made through Mr Wink and Mr Foster.

Argued for the respondent;—This was an attempt by the petitioners

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

to prove a case in re-examination of their own witness which had not been suggested in examination-in-chief. There was no notice of this case in the statement of particulars as finally amended. The Court had already held that charges as to payments by societies were irrelevant.

LORD M'LAREN.—My opinion is that the Court has already got all the relevant evidence on the subject of Mr Gordon's contributions to the political interests of his party through the Conservative Association, and it is quite open to Mr Shaw to argue that the sum of £120 per annum, which was contributed to the Conservative Association, was indirectly a contribution towards the respondent's election expenses, but I think the Court is not here for the purpose of making any inquisitorial investigation into the transactions of political associations, and such an investigation would not be relevant to the present inquiry. I am therefore in favour of disallowing questions as to the total income or expenditure of political associations which have taken part in political work in these counties.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion. I sympathise with Mr Dickson's argument that the introduction of this matter is somewhat late and irregular, especially in view of what we know took place at the time the specification of particulars was amended. I should not, however, be disposed to reject the evidence on that ground alone. I prefer to go upon the ground which your Lordship has expressed, viz., that we ought not to enter into a collateral inquiry which has not, so far as I see at present, even a remote bearing on the true question before us, for the purpose of getting fuller information as to the exact amount of Mr Gordon's contributions to the funds of this Association. The Court has already got evidence that very substantial amounts were contributed by Mr Gordon, and I am not prepared to go further.

THE question was accordingly disallowed.

Argued for the petitioners;—(1) On the charges of incurring expenses in excess of the statutory maximum. (a) From February 1894 Mr Gordon must be regarded as a candidate engaged in the active work of promoting his candidature. He was not merely promoting the views of a political party. (b) The services rendered by Foster were virtually paid for by Mr Gordon, and the outlay incurred by him as well as by Mr Gordon were expenses "on account of and in the conduct and management of the election," within the meaning of sections 8 and 28 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1883.[1] If this were so, then the statutory maximum had been greatly exceeded. Mr Gordon's personal expenses also exceeded £100. (2) As to the charge under section 17 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1883. M'Hardy, whose case might be taken as the strongest for the petitioners,

[1] The Borough of Rochester Case, 1892, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, 156, per J. Cave, 159, Day's Election Cases, p. 98; the Hexham Case, 1892, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 146, Day's Election Cases, p. 90; the Borough of Stepney Case, 1892, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 178, Day's Election Cases, pp. 116, 117, and 118; Borough of Walsall Case, 1892, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 123, per J. Hawkins, p. 125, Day's Election Cases, pp. 106, 112, and 113; Borough of Norwich Case, 1886, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, pp. 84, 85, and 86.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

was employed nominally as a polling agent, but he really performed the duties of a subagent, and was paid as such. He was engaged in election work before the election, and on the election day acted as a subagent at the polling station and in the district rather than as a polling agent, whose duties were confined to the booth.* If M'Hardy was truly employed as a subagent, then there was a contravention of section 17, as the full number of subagents was employed already. To adopt such a course as this was to evade section 17, by which the number of persons who could be lawfully employed as subagents was limited.

Argued for the respondent;—The case nearest to the present was the Kennington[1] case, in which it was held that a payment by the candidate of a sum of £500 in order to establish a newspaper for the purpose of influencing the election did not require to be included in the return of election expenses. The expression "expenses incurred on account of and in the conduct and management of the election" must be taken to refer to proper election expenses—expenses incurred in the actual contest, dating from the nomination or the issue of the writ or the occurrence of the vacancy. Any of these dates might be taken, but until one or other of them arrived, no one could have the status of a candidate.† A candidate was not required to appoint his election agent till the date of nomination, and this shewed that it was not intended to include payments made months or years before that date among those that must be paid by the agent.

On the remaining question, counsel for the respondents was not called upon.

LORD M'LAREN.—It was thought convenient, as the evidence had extended to the greater part of three days on the branch of the case that falls under the general head of illegal practices, that we should give our judgment upon that branch of the case in order to simplify the subsequent conduct of this election petition, which will then be confined to the specific charges of bribery and corrupt practices.

The points which have been argued under the present branch of the inquiry are two—First, it is said that there has been a violation of the provisions of sections 8 and 28 of the Statute of 1883, because during the period of eighteen months which preceded the dissolution of Parliament political expenses were incurred, either directly on the instructions of Mr Gordon, or through his political friends with his approval and for his benefit, which expenses have not been included in the election account as required by statute.

The two sections of the statute which are founded on are directed to different objects, but I think that the error, if any, is the same under whichever clause of the statute we examine the facts. Section 8 evidently bears reference to a scheduled maximum scale of expenditure for an election which is proportionate to the magnitude of the constituency, and it prohibits in general terms all expenditure in excess of that scale. Section 28, in so

* The Ballot Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 33), sec. 4; Registration of Voters Act, 1843 (6 Vict. c. 18), sec. 85.

[1] The Kennington Division of the Borough of Lambeth, 1886, 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 93.

† Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 63 (1).

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

far as it is important to the present inquiry, provides that all election expenses shall be paid through an election agent; and it is said in this case that the expenses which were incurred by the Conservative Association, including the employment of a salaried agent, Mr Foster, the payment of his travelling expenses, and the expenses of various meetings which were held for the purpose of diffusing political information, when added to the election account, would bring the total over the maximum allowed by the statute. Thus the facts are said to constitute an illegality under either of those sections—first, because the maximum was exceeded, and secondly, because those heads of expenditure were not included in the election account. But if we should come to be of opinion that political expenditure incurred while Parliament is sitting, and when there is no prospect of a dissolution, or of a supervening election, are not expenses of the character contemplated in section 8, then of course it would follow that it is unnecessary to include them in the election account so as to comply with the provisions of the 28th section.

Without in any way making use of our knowledge of the discussions which arose in Parliament upon the wording of section 8, we may at least take notice of this fact, that the House of Commons in framing the 8th section, which was intended to limit the expenditure at elections, dealing with a subject which by the Constitution can only be initiated in that House—a subject with which its members are peculiarly conversant—because all this legislation is necessarily founded upon the experience of the members of the House, has refrained from giving any definition of what is meant by the "conduct and management of an election," or from fixing any time at which expenditure under this head shall be held to begin. It would have been very easy on the one hand to make use of words which would have limited the scope of the section to expenses incurred subsequent to the dissolution of Parliament, or in the case of a casual election, subsequent to the issue of the writ. One objection to such a limitation would be, as everyone must see, that it would have entirely defeated the object of the promoters of the enactment, because it would have led to all the expenses being arranged for before the issue of the writ, and perhaps paid before that time in order to reap the benefit of an expenditure in excess of the maximum prescribed by the statute. Again, it would have been very easy, if such had been the will of Parliament, to have prescribed that all costs incurred for the benefit of a candidate—for the promotion of his political interests in the constituency at whatever time—should be entered in an election account, which was not to exceed the maximum sum authorised, and then the only limit would be the limit of the interval of time between the election in dispute and the next preceding election. But I think it is perfectly plain that it was not intended that the whole political expenses of a candidate during the sitting of Parliament, from one election to another, should be included in an election account, for this simple reason, that Parliament has not said so, but has used an expression of a much more limited meaning, namely, "Expenses on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of such election." We are to construe election statutes fairly, and so as, if possible, to prevent evasion, but where there is no question of corrupt practices or of evasion, but a proper question of construction for determining the meaning of an expression which has been left indefinite, my view would be that the statute must not be extended by putting upon the words a meaning which they do not naturally bear, and which might quite easily have been expressed in other language. I think, therefore, that "conduct or management of such election" means a definite election within the knowledge and contemplation of the parties who are engaged in conducting and managing it.

No. 43.
Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

Now, it is said—and I concur in the observation of Mr Justice Field in the Kennington[1] case—that this is a question of fact to be determined with reference to the particular case. One sees that in such a case as that of Kennington,[1] where the preliminary expenses may have extended over some months, it might be necessary to hold that from the moment the Redistribution Act had passed, and when it was certain that an election would take place, although Parliament could not actually be dissolved at the time, the election had begun. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to give an opinion on such a question; but I can perfectly understand that where it is known that an election is to take place, and the Ministers of the Crown are only waiting for the completion of a new electoral roll to dissolve Parliament, and especially if this has been announced on authority in Parliament, from that time the electors are put upon the selection of a candidate, and intending candidates are open to offer themselves for the suffrages of the constituency.

Again, there may be a case of a death vacancy, unexpected, where an election could not be in the thoughts of the people until the vacancy occurred. But there may be intermediate cases, and the late general election sufficiently illustrates my meaning—the case where there is a vote in the House of Commons adverse to the Ministry, and where from the moment when that vote is published everyone is looking forward to a dissolution of Parliament, with a view to determining whether the Government of the day is to continue to enjoy the confidence of the country. I should certainly hold that from that time the election had begun in the sense of the sections we are considering. I do not say that it may not be begun at an even earlier period. If, for example, a candidate, not proceeding upon any public and patent facts, but trusting to his own political sagacity, and looking round the political horizon, thinks that an election is imminent, and proceeds to institute what is called a canvass of the constituency, which he continues without intermission down to the election, it may very well be that in such a case his own judgment as to when it is necessary to attend to his electoral interests shall be taken as fixing the commencement of that particular election for him.

I think I have said enough to indicate that in the view of the statute which I adopt it is impossible to lay down any definite rule as to when the conduct of an election begins, or to deal with this otherwise than as a question of fact in which the general political history of the period and the conduct of the individual candidate are alike taken into account.

Now, when we come to consider the facts of the case, Mr Gordon's connection with the constituency is admitted to have begun early in February 1894, that is, about sixteen months preceding the events which led to the dissolution of Parliament. He says that he considered himself in no way

[1] 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 93.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

bound to become a candidate, but that he had so far engaged himself to the constituency that he was willing to make their acquaintance and to address them in hope that if he were acceptable, and if he continued in the same mind, he might allow himself to be nominated as the candidate. He describes his position as that of a "prospective candidate," and that seems to be a good enough designation if you limit the meaning of "candidate" to its official meaning as that of a person nominated on the nomination day. But of course in construing the Election Acts it is impossible to put so limited a meaning on the word "candidate." I think that from February 1894 Mr Gordon was a candidate, and that, for example, if a case of corrupt practice by an agent of his subsequent to that time were proved, it would be impossible to resist the conclusion that Mr Gordon was a candidate in the sense of making himself responsible, so far as the statute puts it upon him, for the act of his agent.

But this does not solve the question whether Mr Gordon's visits to the constituency and the work that was done for him was work done in the "conduct and management of the election" of 1895. My opinion is, that for the period between February and October 1894, when there is no evidence that an election was immediately in view, when from one's own knowledge of contemporary history it does not appear that there was any immediate prospect of an election, Mr Gordon's expenditure in cultivating the goodwill of the electors, and recommending himself to the constituency, is not to be regarded as expense falling within the scope of the 8th section of the statute. After October 1894 no expenses were incurred by Mr Gordon, except personal expenses. It follows, in my opinion, that the expense incurred by Mr Foster, in so far as the candidate had the benefit of it, is not to be regarded as expense falling under section 8. But with regard to Mr Foster's salary and expenses, I think they are excluded on a more general view, because I do not think that it was intended by the Act of 1883 to interfere with the regular work of political organisations. In our country it has always been treated as a constitutional principle that all citizens should be free to meet together to discuss public questions, to petition Parliament if they please, or, if they are dissatisfied with their representatives, to endeavour to influence their fellow electors to bring about a change in the representation. It is impossible to conceive of Parliament deliberately interfering to put a stop to a practice of such inveterate and perfectly established regularity. But political organisation cannot be carried on successfully without incurring expense, and it is not a new thing I think, but a perfectly familiar feature in our political system, that there are associations in constituencies which are assisted by salaried agents, and which defray the expenses of political meetings and advertising. It might be a legitimate purpose,—one possibly deserving the consideration of Parliament,—to limit in some way the sums of money that might be expended on such objects. But I do not find in the Act of 1883 any reference to political work of any kind except that which is incurred on behalf of the candidate at an election, and I agree with the view expressed by the Judges in the Kennington[1] case that this kind of expenditure, which is commonly

[1] 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 93.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

known as registration expenditure,—because of course the ultimate test to which everything is brought is, how many electors of your party can you put upon the register,—that this kind of expenditure is outside the proper business of the election. It is true that during part of the year, especially during the winter of 1894-95, Mr Foster, who I may say gave his evidence most candidly and fairly, stated that the registration being over he employed himself in promoting the interests of the Conservative Association by getting up meetings that were addressed by strangers. A considerable part of his travelling expenses, and I think also the account for advertising and hire of halls, is of this nature; but as regards that part of the expenditure my opinion is that it is not election expenditure, and that, until Parliament chooses to limit it, every political association must exercise its own judgment as to the means which it will employ and the expenses which its members choose to incur in the promotion of their aims and objects. On this subject we also have some light from the Kennington[1] case, although it is not very direct,—I mean the ruling that money expended in founding a local newspaper was not to be treated as election expense, although, in point of fact, the newspaper was established at a time when an election, in the sense which I have given to the word, was pending,—that is to say, after it had been announced on official responsibility that a dissolution would take place.

I think I have exhausted all that I need to say regarding the first head of this branch of inquiry, and with regard to the other objection I shall be able I think to deal with it more shortly.

The objection is not that the total number of salaried agents authorised by the statute was exceeded, but that while ex facie of the letters of appointment Mr Gordon had no more agents of the various classes than the statute authorised, yet the persons were employed and paid nominally in one capacity with the intention, and I suppose under contract, that they should render services in another capacity.

Now, the enactment that he is said to have violated is section 17 of the Act of 1883, and that section prohibits engagement or employment for payment for any purpose or in any capacity except for any purposes or capacities mentioned in the first and second parts of the first schedule thereof. The persons who may be employed, as enumerated in the schedule, are an election agent, who has the general supervision of the candidate's affairs, and then for each district there may be a subagent, a polling agent, a clerk, and a messenger. The duties of these officers are not very strictly defined. I do not think there is any definition of the duties of a subagent, but it sufficiently appears that he is a person through whom payments may be made at the request of the principal agent. In all other respects his agency seems to be perfectly general. Then a polling agent is defined by a reference to the Ballot Act, and to a previous Act of 1843, which, as originally passed, did not apply to Scotland. The Act, however, must now be taken to apply to Scotland as well as to England, because it is incorporated with the Act of 1883, which is a general enactment applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom. I do not read the section; it was referred to by counsel,

[1] 4 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p 93.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

and it sufficiently indicates that a polling agent is a person who is to represent the candidate in the polling booth to detect personation. It was suggested in some of the answers given by the witnesses that in order to qualify himself for this duty the agent must make himself acquainted with the electors in his district—at least to the extent of knowing their faces and also of knowing something of their political opinions—that he may consider whether it is his business to take an objection should a case of personation occur. But I need hardly consider that extension of duties very much, because in the case which has been selected as the best case for the petitioners—that of M'Hardy—M'Hardy stated that before his appointment he was perfectly acquainted with the electors of his district, at least those with whom difficulties were most likely to occur, namely, the fishermen at Burghead and the neighbouring coast; and it was admitted by Mr Stewart, the assistant agent, that M'Hardy was selected because of his knowledge of the fishermen in the district, and in the belief that his knowledge might be useful.

Now, the general and leading purpose, as I think, of section 17, is to keep down expenditure by prohibiting the employment of a larger number of persons than are mentioned in the schedule. It may very well be that the clause would also prohibit the employment of an agent for money to perform additional duties to those which are indicated. But in order to invalidate an election because an agent had performed duties additional to those for which he was expressly engaged, it would be necessary that we should have a case of evasion very clearly proved; and it is evident that it would be extremely difficult to establish a case of that description, a case of colourable employment of a man in one capacity, in order that he might perform duties in another capacity. The only political disability which the statute applies to any person who is paid for his services is that his right to vote is suspended for that election; but, as I read the Election Acts, the employee is in no way inhibited from using his personal exertions as an elector to influence the votes of other electors; nor, so far as I see, is there any restriction on the right of a paid agent or officer to render services to the candidate, such as he may think fitting, except that he cannot be employed in the payment of election expenses unless he is the sub-agent.

In the case of M'Hardy his appointment as polling agent was not made until two days before the election, and in the notes of the evidence (to which I have just referred) he states that he had been working for Mr Gordon before he got his appointment—I suppose it had been arranged that he was to get it—but that after he got his appointment he had not done anything in the nature of direct canvassing. Then with reference to the polling day his evidence comes to this, that having occasion to leave the polling booth to get his dinner, and before returning to the polling place, he spoke to some fishermen whom he saw going about the streets, or at the seaside, and asked them to vote. His absence from the polling place, according to his own statement, did not exceed an hour. That gives one a notion of the extent of his action as a canvasser. Out of that hour he had to drive several miles, and to get his dinner, and therefore there would not be time, I should think, for canvassing to any greater extent than what he himself admits, speaking to such people as he happened to meet on the way.

No. 43.

Nov. 28, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

Now, assuming the relevancy of the objection—a somewhat critical objection perhaps—that a man who is employed in the capacity of a paid agent or servant is violating the statute if he interferes in the work of another paid servant, we have to consider whether the fact that Mr M'Hardy, on the polling day, spoke to voters and asked them to come to the poll is evidence that he was employed and paid £17 to act as a district agent and subagent. If he was employed for that purpose, and if it be the duty of a district agent to bring up people to the poll, it is plain that this duty was only performed in a very limited and, I should think, in a very inadequate degree by M'Hardy. If, on the other hand, he acted in this matter as a voluntary assistant in the election, and because he was interested in its success, then I fail to see that he was guilty of any illegal practice, because, as I have pointed out, no disability attaches to the acceptance of a paid office except that the agent is excused from giving his individual vote.

There are some points indicated in the specification of particulars relating to payments made by persons other than the election agent. These payments were small in amount, and although nothing was said on the subject in the argument, it is right that they should be noticed, because they are in the record. The payments in question related to the hiring of halls and posting of advertisements of meetings incident to the election. One reason for requiring that all payments should be made through a responsible agent is to prevent the possibility of money being paid for one purpose while a receipt is taken for another; to put a check, as far as possible, on the tendency to employ voters in the hope of securing their support at the election. But really when we come to the hire of a hall, which is open to both parties at a fixed charge, and to such trivial expenses as the necessary advertising of a meeting, it would be hopeless to maintain that a payment of that kind, when made by an unauthorised agent, was a serious violation of the spirit of the Act; and therefore, if such a case had been proved, I should have thought it a case for equitable relief. But it is right to say, as the point has been raised, that in my opinion the duty of an election agent in regard to payments is that he shall satisfy himself that the account has been justly incurred and is fairly charged, and also that the payment must come from himself. But if he performs those duties I think he may send a messenger, or may ask a friend who is willing to undertake the duty of a messenger to carry the money and get the receipt. It is like the case of paying by a cheque, where, of course, the bank pays the money on the authority of the election agent.

The result of my opinion is that in both heads of the case the petitioners have failed to establish any case of illegal practice.

Lord Kyllachy.—Your Lordship has stated, I think, quite fully the facts to which this branch of the case relates; and that being so, I do not propose to resume them. Neither do I propose to refer further to those English decisions and dicta of English Judges to which our attention has been directed. I am inclined to think that, so far as decision goes, the questions here raised must be held as open; and further, that but little help can be got from previous judicial dicta—those dicta being at best not very explicit, and not very apposite to the particular facts which we are here to try.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

The question before us, stated broadly, is whether there ought to have been included in the respondent's election accounts certain expenses disbursed in connection with what was undoubtedly political work done in this constituency, prior to the 21st of June last, when the late Government were defeated in the House of Commons. These expenses are of three classes, (first) expenses of certain meetings addressed by the respondent in the spring and autumn of 1894; (second) salary paid to Mr Foster, the organising secretary of the Unionist Association, for registration and other work done during the period from January 1894 to June 1895; (third) personal expenses incurred by the respondent during the same period. The suggestion is that these were all expenses which, to use the words of the Act, were incurred "in the conduct and management of the election"; and it is said that being in that category they ought (first) to have been paid through the respondent's election agent; and (second) to have been entered in the respondent's election accounts.

The respondent does not dispute that the payments in question were made; neither does he dispute that they were made with his knowledge—at all events that he knew enough to make him responsible for their being properly dealt with. What he maintains is—(first) that the payments for the meetings and to Mr Foster, were disbursed not by him or on his behalf, but by the two Unionist Associations for their own purposes; and (second) that his personal expenses, although incurred in furtherance of his intended candidature, were yet, by reason of the period to which they applied, and the whole circumstances, outwith the category of proper election expenses.

I do not find it necessary, and I am not disposed to discuss the question, how far these three heads of expenditure were incurred and disbursed in furtherance or promotion of the respondent's candidature. I confess I am of opinion that with regard to Mr Foster's salary it is quite impossible to maintain that it was a payment of that character. I take it as the result of the evidence that Mr Foster was an official of the Unionist Associations—that at least his chief duty was that of a registration agent—that he was paid a salary at a certain rate per month—and that his salary would probably have been paid all the same although Mr Gordon had not appeared on the scene, or had not appeared until immediately before the election. I do not consider that in these circumstances it is possible to suggest that Mr Foster's salary comes under the category of expenses incurred in furtherance or promotion of the respondent's candidature. The other expenses, however,—I mean the expenses of meetings, and the respondent's personal expenses,—although not of large amount, are perhaps in a different position, and are quite sufficient to raise the question, and with regard to these I propose to assume—although I do not decide—that they did represent expenditure made in furtherance or promotion of the respondent's intended candidature. In that view, the question we have to decide is a comparatively short question, and is simply this—Whether it is according to the just construction of the Act of 1883 that those expenses—expenses of meetings and personal expenses—incurred during the period from February 1894 to June

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

1895, were proper election expenses, that is to say, expenses incurred in the conduct and management of this election?

Now, I am bound to say that keeping in view the period covered—a period extending back eighteen months before the actual election—the suggested construction appears to me to be at least exposed to serious difficulties. In the first place, the words of the Act—the words, "in respect or on account of the conduct or management of the election,"—do not strike me as suggestive of a period extending back indefinitely it may be for years, or to the last election. A candidature, or intended candidature, may no doubt so extend, and if it had been so meant, it would have been easy for the Legislature to have said in plain words that no expense shall be incurred in promoting or procuring the election of any candidate, except such as shall be paid through his election agent, and shall enter the statutory account. That could easily have been expressed, and there was nothing to prevent its being expressed. A phrase which would have expressed it occurs in various other clauses of the statute—I mean the phrase "promoting or procuring the election of any candidate." But that is not the language used. For some reason, good or bad, the Legislature has confined the enactment to expenses which can be attributed to the "conduct and management of the election," and these words, it seems to me, at least suggest and contemplate an election which is not in nubibus, but is reasonably imminent.

Again, what is to be said of the provision of the statute that those expenses which I have called for shortness election expenses (the expenses in question) must be paid through the election agent, while, according to another section of the statute, the election agent need not be appointed until the day of the nomination? How, it has been fairly asked, can expenses incurred eighteen months before be paid through an agent who, according to the scheme of the Act, does not exist until eighteen months after? No doubt the election agent may be appointed earlier if the candidate chooses; the appointment is in the candidate's hands; but the difficulty is to say that the statute contemplated an appointment months or years before the date expressed, viz., the date of nomination. It is at least an observation which the respondent may well make, that if the Legislature had really meant that the whole expenses of the candidature should be paid by or through the election agent, it would have been natural to provide that the election agent should be appointed at or before the commencement of the candidature. That, however, is not provided. What is provided is, that the election agent shall be appointed "on or before the date of nomination." And that, I think, goes at least to shew that in the view of the Legislature the expenses which were to be paid through the election agent were not necessarily co-extensive with the expenses of the candidature. I say nothing as to the further difficulty which has been pointed out with respect to expenses incurred (as they lawfully may be) by outsiders (that is to say unauthorised outsiders) in supporting the candidature of some particular candidate. I confess I do not myself see how the acts of outsiders—unauthorised outsiders—can be acts in the conduct and management of the election. If, however, the petitioners are right that the conduct and management of the election covers anything done in the promotion of the candidature of any candidate, the result then certainly is that many persons and bodies who are accustomed to intervene in elections, and to do so quite lawfully, but have no control over the appointment of the election agent, appear to be placed in a very serious position.

These considerations, I confess, suggest very strongly to my mind that what the Legislature had in view as to the period of the election—the period of the election which was to be conducted and managed—was a period not at least much anterior, I will not say to the date of nomination, but to the group or series of events which immediately precede the nomination, and which, as we all know, begin in the case of a general election with the announcement of the dissolution, and in the case of a bye election with the announcement of the vacancy. It is then, and not till then, that, unless in exceptional circumstances, the candidates join issue, and the contest, as distinguished from the preparations for the contest, begins.

At the same time, it has certainly to be noted—what your Lordship has emphasised—that the Legislature has abstained, and we must hold deliberately abstained, from defining the period at which the election shall be held to begin. The statute might have defined that period, but it has not done so, and no doubt for this good reason, that if a hard and fast line had been fixed, a hard and fast date fixed, facilities would have been offered for evasion of the Act—evasion by dishonest candidates desiring to evade it and defeat its object. Accordingly, while I think that the Act indicates plainly enough the kind of period which it contemplates, it contains nothing in the shape of hard and fast definition; and that being so, I apprehend the result is, that it is left to us as Election Judges, and it becomes our duty to consider each case with respect to its own facts, and to say in each case whether or not special circumstances exist requiring us to hold that the election began prior to what I may call the normal period. In considering that question I apprehend we are to have regard to the whole facts—the nature of the work done, and of the expenses incurred; the extent and amount of that work, and of those expenses; the question how far the operations of the candidate were continuous up to the election, or were intermittent, taking the shape merely of periodical visits to the constituency. Above all, we are, I apprehend, to have regard to this—whether we have before us evidence of any attempt to evade the Act,—evidence for example, of profuse expenditure purposely antedated so as to escape the Act; or whether, on the other hand, everything appears to have been done in good faith and ordinary course—the pre-election operations and pre-election expenditure being on the whole fair and reasonable, that is to say, fair and reasonable having regard to the position of the candidate and the character of the constituency.

Applying these principles, I have to ask myself this question, whether there is anything in the history of the respondent's three visits to this constituency—in the spring of 1894, in October 1894, and in June 1895—anything which makes it necessary or just that we should here take the extreme course of holding that the election of July last, 1895, began eighteen months before, in February 1894. That is, I think, the question which I have to answer, and after full consideration all I have to say is, that I have come, and come without much difficulty, to a conclusion in the negative. I do not require to consider what is the exact term which best describes Mr Gordon's position during the period in question. That position was in itself plain enough. He had been selected, not perhaps formally and finally, but yet practically, as the person who was to contest the county when the time came for a new election. On his part again, he had resolved, barring contingencies, and if all went well, to accept and take advantage of that selection. That was his position, and being in that position, he paid periodical visits to the constituency feeling his way, making the acquaintance of the electors, and, as it seems to me, acting generally like most of those other persons who during the years between 1892 and 1895, in contemplation of a probable candidature at next election, paid visits more or less frequent to constituencies within Scotland, and addressed more or less frequent meetings within these constituencies. That, it appears to me, is the substance of all that has been proved with respect to the respondent's proceedings, and that being so, I am satisfied that we only do justice in holding that this objection to the election must be repelled.

No. 43.

Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

Then as to the other matter—the alleged payments to Mr M'Hardy and others—the suggestion is that certain persons, nominally employed and paid as polling agents, were truly employed and paid as subagents, and that thereby the number of subagents authorised by law was exceeded. As to that suggestion, which has all along seemed to me to be somewhat difficult, I desire to reserve my opinion with respect to the duties for which it is lawful to employ and remunerate subagents, polling agents, and messengers respectively. It may be, as the petitioners contend (I say nothing to the contrary), that to employ and remunerate, for example, Mr M'Hardy, nominally as a polling agent, but really to canvass voters, would be illegal. I say nothing to the contrary, but such an employment is not to be presumed; it must be proved; and in my opinion it is certainly not proved, first, by proving that in point of fact the polling agent was an active partisan who as a committee man or volunteer canvassed voters or brought voters to the poll; secondly, by proving that he did so in the knowledge or even at the request of the election agent; or thirdly, by proving that it was an element in his selection as polling agent that he was a person who was an influential elector or even an active partisan. It appears to me upon the evidence that in none of the cases before us does the petitioners' proof go beyond this, and therefore in my opinion it fails. Prima facie, I may admit that the amount of remuneration paid to Mr M'Hardy and some others required explanation, but I am not prepared to say that the explanations given have been insufficient, and therefore on that matter also I concur with your Lordship.

The petitioners then proceeded to lead evidence on the charges of bribery, but after some witnesses had been examined it was intimated by counsel that they did not propose to proceed with the charges of bribery and treating.

The Advocate-depute, in answer to Lord M'Laren, intimated that he had no objection to offer.

On 23d November the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the averments of fact in the petition are not proved: Therefore dismiss the petition, and find that the respondent, John Edward Gordon, was duly elected Member of Parliament for the counties of Elgin and Nairn, and decern: Find the petitioners liable to the respondent in the expenses of the cause, as the same shall be taxed as between agent and client."

No. 43.
Nov. 23, 1895.
Hood v. Gordon.

JAMES FALCONER, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 44.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood.

THE GLASGOW, YOKER, AND CLYDEBANK RAILWAY COMPANY, Complainers (Respondents).—D. Dundas—Grierson.
WILLIAM VAN VLECK LIDGERWOOD, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Jameson—C. J. Guthrie.
WILLIAM ROBERTSON COPLAND, Respondent.
WILLIAM BORLAND, Respondent.

Railway—Compulsory acquisition of lands—Arbitration—Interdict.—Note of suspension and interdict to stop proceedings in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, refused on the ground that the complainer had failed to shew that the respondent's claim to compensation was not relevant, or to shew any other cause for staying the proceedings in the arbitration.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

BY special Act of Parliament passed in 1893, the Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Company were authorised to divert the Forth and Clyde Canal and the Boquhanran Road, near Clydebank, in the county of Dumbarton, for the purposes of their undertaking. While they were in the course of carrying out these operations a notice of claim in the following terms was served upon them by William Van Vleck Lidgerwood:—"The claimant is heritable proprietor of land at Clydebank, . . . bounded . . . on the south by land belonging to the proprietors of the Forth and Clyde Canal; and on the West by the Boquhanran Road, with the buildings and others thereon.

"The claimant himself occupies the said lands and buildings in connection with his business.

"In exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Act, 1893, the said company are in course of diverting the Forth and Clyde Canal so as to take away from the said land about 900 feet of canal frontage.

"The said company further are in course of diverting the Boquhanran Road so as to take away from the said land about 120 feet of frontage to that road.

"The taking from the said land of the canal and road frontage above referred to will injuriously affect the said land and the buildings thereon, and cause serious loss and damage to the claimant as owner and occupier thereof.

"In respect of the above-mentioned injurious affection to the said land and building, and all loss and damage incurred and to be incurred by the claimant as owner and occupier thereof, the claimant claims as compensation from the said Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Company the sum of £7680 . . ."

On 31st May 1895 Lidgerwood appointed, in terms of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, an arbiter on his part for settling the question of compensation. On 21st June the railway company, under protest, made a like appointment.

A few days later the railway company presented a note of suspen-

No. 44.

Nov. 27, 1895.

Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood.

sion and interdict against Lidgerwood and the two arbiters who had been nominated for the purpose of having the respondents interdicted from proceeding with the arbitration. The note was passed of consent.

The complainers stated;—(Stat. 2) "The lands belonging to the respondent William Van Lidgerwood, in respect of which he claims compensation for alleged damage by the exercise by the complainers of the powers conferred upon them by their said Act of 1893, are situated to the north of a strip of land which intervenes between his lands and the said canal as existing. The said respondent's lands are bounded on the west by the Boquhanran Road, but they nowhere immediately adjoin the said canal, nor does the canal intersect his lands. A strip of land from 30 to 100 feet wide lies between the respondent's lands and the portion of the canal to be diverted." (Stat. 3) "The complainers, under the powers of their Act, are diverting the canal to the southward, and are also constructing a new road leading from the Boquhanran Road under the old line of the canal as diverted. The Boquhanran Road northward of the canal is not interfered with by the operations of the complainers in the slightest degree. The line or levels of the said road are not altered in any way. The only part of the said road which is vested in the respondent William Van Vleck Lidgerwood, or adjoins his property, is the part of the road northwards of the canal. The said road southwards of the canal is only available for foot-passengers, but the new road will be available also for vehicular traffic." (Stat. 5) "The claim of the claimant respondent is incompetent. His property has not been damaged or injuriously affected within the sense and meaning of the complainers' Act, or Acts incorporated therewith, and particularly the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, by the exercise by the complainers of the powers conferred upon them by their said Act of 1893. No question of disputed compensation has thus arisen which the claimant respondent is entitled to have referred to arbitration in terms of the said Act or Acts. . . ."

The respondent Lidgerwood denied that his property had not been injuriously affected by the complainers' exercise of their statutory powers. He stated that the strip of land alleged to intervene between the canal and his property consisted of the canal bank, the towing path, and a path leading from the Boquhanran Road to the canal bank, all of which formed part of the canal undertaking; and that by the statutes under which the canal was administered he, as an adjoining proprietor, was entitled to use the canal for lauding and embarking goods. He further stated that the complainers were diverting the Boquhanran Road, which formed the western boundary of his property at a point 120 feet north of his southern boundary; that, as a result of their operations, the existing road south of the point of diversion would no longer be a thoroughfare to the Dumbarton Road, and that he would have no frontage to the substituted road.

On 14th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), before answer, allowed parties a proof of their averments.

Both parties reclaimed.

Argued for Mr Lidgerwood;—The case must be considered on the claim which this reclaimer had put in, and the claim made was relevant on both grounds upon which compensation was claimed. (1) It was a relevant ground for claiming compensation that the operations of the complainers would deprive the claimant of his frontage and access to the canal,[1] and the complainers had made no relevant answer to this ground of claim. Their statement that a strip of ground intervened between the claimant's property and the canal was insufficient, unless they also stated to whom the land belonged, and that the claimant had no right of access over it. (2) The claimant's titles and the complainers' plan both shewed that his property was bounded upon the west by the Boquhanran Road. It was not denied that that road was to be diverted at a point 120 feet north of the south boundary of the claimant's property. Nor was it denied that the old road was to be shut up at a point opposite the claimant's southern boundary. It was clear, therefore, that the claimant's property would be "injuriously affected" by the complainers' operations, as he would be deprived of 120 feet of frontage to a thoroughfare, and of the existing direct access from that part of his property to the Dumbarton Road.[2] The claimant having stated a good prima facie case for arbitration, and the complainers having failed to state any objection which clearly excluded his right to compensation, the Court would not intervene at this stage.[3] If any question of law affecting the claimant's right to compensation arose before the arbiters, that could be brought before the Court afterwards, but if a proof were allowed now the parties might be put to the expense of a second proof in the arbitration. The note should therefore be refused.

No. 44.

Nov. 27, 1895. Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v Lidgerwood.

Argued for the railway company;—The question was one of convenience in procedure. If there was clearly no valid claim made, the Court would stop the proceedings, and if it was doubtful whether there was good ground for a claim, the Court might have the doubt cleared up by ordering proof. (1) In regard to the canal there was a conflict in fact as to whether the claimant was a frontager, which should be cleared up in the present proceedings; but behind that question were questions of law (a) as to whether the claimant had a right of access to the canal under the Forth and Clyde Canal Act, and (b) as to whether the diversion of the canal constituted a case of injurious affection. These were questions for the Court, and not for the arbiters, to decide. (2) The complainers were not interfering with the existing road opposite the claimant's lands. He would still have a frontage to that road after their operations were completed, and his claim was founded on loss of frontage. It was true that they were closing the road after it passed his lands, but this did not deprive him of access to the Dumbarton Road, because he would have a better access by the substituted road which was being constructed. On the statements on record there would be no interference with frontage in the sense of the cases, and it was clear that no appreciable injury would be caused to him either in respect of loss of frontage or access. In all the reported cases, e.g., Walker's Trustees,[2] in which parties had been held to have a good claim for compensation in respect of loss of access, the injury had been in effect great. If the Court were convinced that the claimant had no right to claim compensation on account of the diversion of the road, they must grant the interdict

[1] M'Carthy v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1874, L. R., 7 E. and I. App. 243.

[2] Walker's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 21, 1881, 8 R. 405, March 29, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 19.

[3] Dumbarton Water Commissioners v. Lord Blantyre, Nov. 12, 1884, 12 R. 115.

No. 44. craved, as the claim was for a lump sum. But if they were not so convinced, then a proof should be allowed.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the proper order in which to consider the questions in this case is, first, to look at the claim and consider whether it contains a relevant averment of damage entitling the claimant to compensation under the statute. Now, reading the claim, I think it does set out a relevant case for compensation, both as regards deprivation of the road by its being diverted from a part of the claimant's property, and also as regards the claimant's exclusion from the canal, which he avers he has heretofore used in virtue of a title to land abutting thereon.

Turning now to the terms of the record of the railway company—and what one is in search of is some salient and exclusive objection such as would justify us in granting interdict now—I can imagine, upon both these matters, both as regards the road and as regards the canal, that questions may arise in the course of the arbitration as to the quality of the injury done to the claimant, or still more probably as to the degree of legal injury which he has sustained. But that does not justify us in stopping these arbitration proceedings, and I am of opinion that the railway company have failed to shew cause entitling them to have interdict pronounced at once, or to have a proof antecedent to the arbitration.

I am of opinion, therefore, that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and refuse the note.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I will say nothing upon the merits of the case; it may turn out in the course of the proceedings before the arbiter that the claimant is not injuriously affected, but if we look at the claims as they were stated, they appear to be ex facie relevant. I agree that the claimant is therefore entitled to have his case sent to arbitration, unless it could be made clear by the complainers that these claims, though ex facie relevant, are not really so. But that has not been done, and there is nothing to suggest that there is no relevancy in them.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is confessedly an unusual step which we are asked to take, that of interfering with the progress of an arbitration, which is founded on an ex facie relevant case of liability under the statute. The more usual course, where there is a possibility that an arbiter may be invited to decide questions beyond his statutory powers, is to leave such anticipated questions to be determined after the arbitration is closed. If notwithstanding the apparent relevancy of the claims it should appear that there is a good answer to them, which admits of being instantly verified, e.g., that the company's Act prescribes a special mode in which such claims are to be dealt with, then, on our being satisfied that the compensation claimed was excluded by statute, interdict might be granted. I agree, however, that a necessary condition of staying proceedings in an arbitration is that there should be a substantial case displacing the prima facie right to compensation which accrues under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. I confess that I do not see any such case here; on the contrary, the arguments which we have heard leave an impression on my mind that, if we had all the facts before us, we should find nothing tending to discredit the relevancy of the claims, nothing that could not be dealt with effectively under an action for interpreting, or it might be for setting aside, the arbiters' decision. No. 44.

Nov. 27, 1895. Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think we cannot grant interdict to prevent the parties proceeding to arbitration, unless it is clear that the arbiter is being called upon to exercise powers which he does not possess. I agree that the question necessarily depends, in the first instance at all events, on the claim submitted to the arbiter. I also think that the claim, so far as its terms are set forth, is prima facie a relevant claim. The railway company state an answer to it, which they may or may not be able to make good. They may or may not be able to shew either that the rights or interests alleged by the claimant are valueless, or to satisfy the arbiter or the Court that the loss of such advantages as he enjoys from his frontage to the canal, or to the road, however valuable, will not entitle him to compensation under the statute. I am not prepared to say that the railway company have established either defence now, and indeed as regards one branch of the claim they do not maintain that they have. If we had to decide the merits of the case I should have thought that the Lord Ordinary had taken the proper course, because material facts are in dispute. But that shews that we should not grant the interdict which is craved. I think the rule laid down by the late Lord President in the case of the Dumbarton Water Commissioners v. Lord Blantyre,[1] is applicable, that "we are not entitled to interfere with the action of the arbiter to the effect of preventing him from entertaining a claim which we do not ourselves at present clearly see our way to determine."

I am therefore of opinion with your Lordships that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the arbitration allowed to proceed.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and refused the note.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—MACONOCHIE & HARE, W.S.—Agents.

THOMAS SMITH AND OTHERS (Gray's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers). —Dickson—Aitken.
THE ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour —Johnston—D. Dundas.
JAMES GIBSON AND OTHERS (Gray's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers). —Dickson—Aitken.
THE ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour —Johnston—D. Dundas. No. 45.

Nov. 27, 1895. Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

Executor—Compensation—Retention—Mutuality of debt and credit—Bank—Claim of bank to retain against debt of deceased customer funds lodged by his executors.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that a bank to whom a debt was owing by a deceased customer, whose estate was found to be insolvent, was not entitled to withhold payment of sums lodged with the bank by his executors either on the plea of retention or of compensation.

THOMAS AITKEN GRAY, tanner, Maybole, died on 16th April 1894. Mr Thomas Smith and others, the trustees and executors named in

2D DIVISION. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

[1] 12 R., at p. 120.

No. 45.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

his settlement, administered his estate till 22d November 1894, when it was sequestrated at the instance of certain creditors.

In the course of their administration the trustees had opened in their names as trustees two accounts in the branch of the Royal Bank at Maybole, and at the date of the sequestration the sums of £465 and £537, stood at their credit in these accounts.

Mr James Gibson, the law-agent for the trust, and one of the trustees, had also lodged in the same bank in September 1894, four sums, amounting in all to £4119, belonging to the trust on deposit-receipts in his own name for behoof of himself and the other trustees and executors of Mr Gray.

In January 1895 an action was raised by the testamentary trustees, with concurrence of the trustee in the sequestration, against the bank for payment of the two sums first mentioned, and another action was raised by Mr Gibson, with concurrence of the testamentary trustees and of the trustee in the sequestration, for payment of the sums standing on deposit-receipt.

In their defences to both actions the Royal Bank stated that the deceased at the time of his death was due to the bank £5207 on an overdrawn cash-credit account.

The pursuers admitted this statement.

In both actions the defenders pleaded;—(3) The defenders being justly entitled to retain the sums standing at the credit of the said accounts against and apply them towards satisfaction of the debt due to them by the late Mr Gray and his estate, decree of absolvitor ought to be pronounced, with expenses.

On 5th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the cause, sustains the third plea in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—I see no good answer to the bank's plea of retention in either of these cases.

"It is admitted that the late Mr Gray was, at the date of his death, on 16th April 1894, indebted to the bank in the sum of £5207, 17s. 7d. On 22d November 1894 his estates were sequestrated. In the meantime, his testamentary trustees had opened two accounts with the bank at its Maybole branch, on one of which, at the date of sequestration, there was a credit balance of £465, 8s. 5d., and on the other, a credit balance of £537, 18s. 7d. The law-agent of the trustees, who was himself a trustee, had also deposited with the bank four sums, amounting in all to the sum of £4119, 6s., and the deposit-receipts were taken in the name of 'James Gibson, solicitor, Maybole, for self and others, trustees and executors of the late Mr T. A. Gray.' The testamentary trustees in the one action (with concurrence of the trustee in the sequestration), and Mr Gibson in the other action (with concurrence of the testamentary trustees, and of the trustee in the sequestration), now sue the bank for payment of these several balances and deposits, and are met with the plea of retention founded on the debt due by the deceased.

"The answer which the pursuers make to this plea is that compensation (or retention) can only be pleaded where the debts are mutual, and that in the words of Professor Bell (Com. ii. 124), 'to constitute this mutuality of debt and credit the sums reciprocally due must be owing to the parties in their own right respectively.' Here, the pursuers say, there is no mutuality, because the debt due to the bank was a debt due by the deceased, and the

No. 45.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The defenders' claim amounted to a claim of compensation. This was excluded, there being no concursus debiti et crediti. The debt due to the bank was a debt of the deceased. The debt due by the bank was due to the trustees arising out of a transaction between them and the bank. There was therefore no mutuality.[1] The trustees were not eadem persona cum defuncto. They were only liable to pay the creditors of the deceased so far as the estate would allow, and were bound to pay pro rata.[2] Compensation might be pleadable by the bank against executors who were also heirs in mobilibus. This was the meaning of the passage in Erskine quoted by the Lord Ordinary.[3] That passage afforded no support to the present claim. The trustees having after the truster's death deposited trust funds realised in administration were entitled to uplift them. The bank must claim against the trust-estate in the ordinary way. It was common ground that the trustees in lodging the funds did not intend to confer any preference on the bank. The bank, therefore, were in mala fide in making their present claim.[4] debt due by the bank is a debt due to the trustees in the one case, and to Mr Gibson as representing the trustees in the other.

---

"The fallacy of this argument is, that the debt due to the bank, though originally due by Mr Gray himself, became on his death a debt due by the trustees as his representatives. It was a debt limited no doubt by the amount of the estate in their hands, but that affects merely the extent and not the quality of the obligation. The mutuality of the debts is completely satisfied by the one being due by and the other to the trust-estate. Accordingly, Erskine (Inst. iii. 4, 13), after stating the rule that each of the two parties must be both debtor and creditor in his own right, adds,—'An executor confirmed is, in this question, accounted the same person with the deceased, for by the confirmation he becomes debtor to the creditors of the deceased, and creditor to his debtors.'

"The only case which the pursuers were able to adduce in their favour was an English one in 1855, Rees v. Watts, 11 H. and G. 410. But that was a case which turned on the wording of the English Statute of Set-off, and cannot be an authority on a rule like retention, which is founded on the common law of Scotland.

"Further, I think the bank is entitled to absolvitor de plano, for the figures are admitted, and none of the relevant facts are in dispute. In Gibson's action there is an averment that he placed the money in deposit-receipt for 'safe custody.' I take it that this is nothing more than a statement of the purpose which everybody has in depositing money with a bank. But in a case Robertson's Trustees v. Royal Bank, 18 R. 12, in which the words 'for safe keeping on your account and subject to your order' appeared in the receipt which a bank granted for certain bonds deposited by a customer, the Court held that these words did not constitute a specific appropriation of the securities, and the late Lord President said,—'The presumption is that custody gives a right of retention, and I think that that presumption cannot be rebutted without something express and distinct.'

"Again in both actions there is an averment that, after the death of Mr

---

[1] Rees v. Watts, June 30, 1855, 11 H. and G. 410.

[2] Heritable Securities Investment Association, Limited, v. Millar's Trustees, March 18, 1893, 20 R. 675.

[3] Erskine, iii. 4, 13; Stair, i. 18, 6; Bell's Com. ii. 125, Williamson v. Tweedie, Nov. 12, 1628, M. 2613; Children of Monswell v. Lawrie, Feb. 14, 1662, M. 2614.

[4] Taylor v. Forbes, Dec. 14, 1830, 4 W. and S. 444.

No. 45.

Nov. 27, 1895. Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

Argued for the defenders;—This was a proper case of retention, and the test was whether mutuality of debt and credit existed. The defenders did not plead the technical rule of compensation, but the rule of retention resulting in compensation. The only course open to the bank was retention.[1] Mutuality existed, and no specific appropriation of the sums lodged had been made; the debt was due by a customer before his death; his representatives who took over his estate lodged the sums in bank. Except for the case of Rees[2] the pursuers' case was not arguable; but it did not apply, as it was inconsistent with the doctrine of Scots law that an executor is eadem persona cum defuncto. Besides that case was decided on the particular terms of the English statute,[3] which was really an attempt to simplify the complicated pleading of the time. This was a testamentary trust, not a trust for creditors, and there was neither averment nor plea of mala fides.

At advising,—

Lord Young.—Mr Gray, tanner and currier at Maybole, died in April 1894, and the pursuers are the trustees and executors nominated in his will. They acted as such till 22d November 1894, when Mr Gray's estate proving to be insolvent was sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act. The trustee in the sequestration is a concurring pursuer. The purpose of the actions (for there are two) is to recover from the defenders £5122, 13s., being the amount of money belonging to the executry estate of the deceased, which his trustees and executors had, in the course of their duty, and within, I think, six months of his death, realised and deposited in the defenders' bank for safe keeping, in accounts, and on deposit-receipts, in terms which signify the fact that the money was executry estate, and was deposited as such by the executors, who were responsible for its safe keeping till required for distribution among those beneficially interested. These facts are admitted.

On the other hand it is admitted that the defenders (the Royal Bank) were creditors of the deceased testator (Mr Gray) at the time of his death for £5207, 17s. 7d., due on a cash-credit account. The defenders' third plea in law (in each action), which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, is Gray, it was found to be doubtful whether his estate would prove solvent, and that this fact was well known to the bank. Also it is said that the bank is now trying to take advantage of the trustees having selected it as their bankers to the effect of obtaining an unfair and illegal preference over the other creditors of the deceased. But it is not said that the bank used any unfair means to obtain possession of the money, and it would be exacting rather too high a standard of virtue from a commercial company to expect them to say when money is offered to them in the ordinary course of business, 'Don't you think you had better take the money to some other bank, in case it may turn out that the estate is not worth twenty shillings in the pound?' The pursuers say that the trustee in the sequestration holds them personally liable for the money. That may be hard for them, but the considerations which would establish their liability are not before me, and the mere threat of the trustee cannot affect the decision of the present question."

---

---

[1] Robertson's Trustee v. Royal Bank of Scotland, Oct. 24, 1890, 18 R. 12.

[2] Rees v. Watts, June 30, 1855, 11 H. and G. 410.

[3] 2 George II. c. 22.

No. 45.

Nov. 27, 1895.

Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

that they are entitled to retain the sums deposited by the executors, and at the credit of the executry accounts, and apply them towards satisfaction of the debt due to them by the late Mr Gray.

The Lord Ordinary sustains this plea, which he calls a plea of "retention." The misnomer (as I think it is) is immaterial—the right urged by the defenders—and on which alone the plea is founded, being a right to pay the debt due to them by the deceased with the money deposited by his executors, or to set off the one debt against the other. I think the proper Scots term for this is "compensation." In England they appropriately call it "set off."

It must, I should think, occur to anyone considering the matter, that the preference which the Lord Ordinary has, by his judgment, given to the defenders, by allowing them to keep over £5000 of the executry funds wherewith to pay their own debt in full, necessarily involves either injustice to the other creditors of the deceased, who, according to the amount of their debts, have the same beneficial interest in the executry estate as the defenders, or hardship to the executors, if the view of the trustee in the sequestration be sound, that they are personally liable to make the money good to the estate.

On the death of Mr Gray, when his estate passed to and was taken up by the pursuers for administration, the defenders were in no different position from other unsecured creditors, nor, so far as I can see, could they by any proceeding whatever obtain a preference. The whole estate of their debtor had passed to the pursuers as trustees for administration, for behoof of all who were legitimately interested. The defenders could not stop or interfere with the pursuers' administration so long as they acted according to their duty, which it is not suggested they ever failed to do. Their duty was first to ascertain the amount of the estate and of the claims upon it; second, to realise and ingather the estate with reasonable dispatch; third, to put the money realised into safe keeping till needed for distribution; and finally to make the distribution among those beneficially interested according to the ability of the estate to meet their just claims. They were not only not bound, but not entitled, to pay any of the deceased's creditors until they had, using due diligence, ascertained the amount of the estate available for the payment of all of them, and the amount of the debts to be paid. I now say nothing about privileged or secured debts. Leaving these out of view, and taking account only of unsecured and unprivileged creditors, such as the defenders admittedly were, the pursuers were certainly never in a position to pay any of them—for when they were superseded by the sequestration, and the trustee under it, the estate had been only partially realised and ingathered, and they could not know what dividend it would yield. It is superfluous to say that they could not lawfully—that is, consistently with their duty as trustees and executors—confer any preference upon the defenders to the prejudice of other creditors having equal interest in the estate under their administration.

These propositions seem, therefore, to be clear enough, viz., first, that at the commencement of this executry trust the defenders were ordinary unsecured creditors who could do nothing to interrupt the executry administration or obtain a preference over other creditors; and second, that the

No. 45.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

executors were at no time in a position to pay their debt or give them a preference.

The defenders, nevertheless, by the plea which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, claim a very substantial preference, or what may be so, which they had not to begin with, could do nothing to acquire, and which the executors could not lawfully or without violation of their duty to others, give them. The estate may, for aught we know, yield not much short of full payment to the creditors, but we must consider and decide upon this plea exactly as if the deposited money in question proved to be the whole estate, the defenders claiming it to the exclusion of all other creditors. It is, I suppose, not doubtful that it is the duty of an executor or other trustee who ingathers considerable sums of money, to be administered by him on account of others, to deposit it in a place of safety till needed for actual use, and that a respectable bank is usually selected, the deposit being so made as to identify it as trust property. In short, the mode adopted by the pursuers here in making the deposits in question with the defenders was a lawful, and the most useful mode of performing the duty which I am referring to, and which was undoubtedly laid upon them with respect to the trust money deposited. I have therefore no hesitation in holding that these deposits were made by them in the performance of that duty, and with no intention of violating their duty to deal equally with all the creditors of the deceased by giving a security or preference to the defenders, or enabling them to pay the deceased's debt to them, and so dealing with them differently from other creditors in the same position, and therefore to the prejudice of these other creditors. The Lord Ordinary thinks, perhaps rightly, that a high standard of virtue ought not to be exacted from a commercial company. But virtue apart, and having regard only to common intelligence, I cannot think that the defenders' agents or other officials thought that Mr James Gibson, when he made the deposits of the executry money as he received it, meant to benefit the Royal Bank at the cost of the other creditors, or that he could lawfully, not to say honestly, do so.

The doctrine of compensation stands, as the text writers all state very distinctly, upon consideration of expediency and justice, the expediency of avoiding cross actions and circuitous proceedings to settle accounts between parties mutually indebted, and where debts and credits may, without injustice to themselves or others, be set off against each other. The doctrine is, in my opinion, inapplicable to sufficiently identified trust money deposited for safe keeping, or in the hands of a trustee or agent who has ingathered it. Such money must, according to well-established rules of law, be preserved while identifiable for behoof of those having the beneficial right to it. There is here, in my opinion, no concursus between the executors' claim against the bank for the executry money deposited, and the bank's claim against the executors for such a sum as may be found in the course of a due executry administration to be payable to them as unsecured creditors of the deceased. It is quite inaccurate to say that the executors are, or ever were, debtors to the bank for the deceased's debt to them, and to say that the estate is their debtor is to use figurative language. The executors are only debtors for a due administration of the executry estate, and to pay to each creditor what shall on such administration be found to be his share.

No. 45.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

Executors are only trustees, and responsible for no more than other trustees, viz., a due realisation of the trust-estate, and distribution of it among those having the beneficial right to it. The most proper language to use is that any creditor of a deceased testator or intestate is entitled to be paid such a dividend as his estate duly administered will yield, and that it will not signify to his right whether the administrator is an executor, a judicial factor, or a trustee in sequestration. When I say that an executor is not debtor for the debts of the testator or intestate, I mean more than that he is not personally liable. Of course he is not personally liable, an executory title not being a passive title, although an executor may make it so by misconduct, as, for example, by vitious intromission. What I mean is that the confirmation of an executor does not make him debtor to the creditors of the deceased testator or intestate, any more than the due and regular appointment of a trustee on a sequestrated or other estate, or of a judicial factor, makes the person appointed a debtor to those having claims to be taken account of in the administration.

The only argument stated to us in support of the defenders' plea was that an executor being eadem persona cum defuncto, he may give any preference to a creditor of the defunct which the defunct himself could have given in his lifetime. I have no difficulty in rejecting that view. Eadem persona cum defuncto is at the best figurative language, which sometimes is, and in this case was, in my opinion, very inaccurately used. It is true that for many purposes an executor stands exactly in place of the deceased, and that questions between him and others, say a creditor of the deceased, may very properly be dealt with on the same grounds and considerations in fact and in law as they would have been with the deceased himself. Thus, if a question arises, whether a particular claim was a just debt of the deceased at the time of his death, or what is the amount of it, these questions will be considered and determined with the executor exactly as they would have been with the deceased, but the eadem persona cum defuncto argument is ridiculous upon the statement of it if you use it with reference to the power of an executor to deal with the estate. The deceased in his lifetime might have given away his property in charity, or spent it as he pleased, or he might, there being nothing but the bankruptcy laws to restrain him, have preferred one creditor to another. When a living debtor prefers one creditor to another, or puts his estate into that creditor's power, although it may be unfair to others, he is acting in the exercise of his legal right as a proprietor, unless where some rule of bankrupt law affords a remedy. But a trustee or executor (who is just a trustee) is not at liberty to deal with the estate otherwise than as a trustee, and with a due regard to the right of those beneficially interested in the trust-estate. He cannot give away the estate in charity, or spend it in riotous living, as the owner might have done, and cannot prefer one creditor to another, but must deal justly and equally by all having equal rights. Take the case of Mr Gibson, who made the greatest part of the deposits in question (over £4000), and was the man of business of the trust, and himself a trustee. Suppose he had been the sole executor. It does not signify that he was acting along with others. As executor he was, according to the argument, eadem persona cum defuncto. As an individual he was, let us suppose, an unsecured creditor of the deceased for £4000 or more, and as trustee he ingathered £4000 of the executry estate. As eadem persona cum defuncto, he could have paid his own debt in full leaving any number of other creditors to go unpaid. In short, this eadem persona cum defuncto argument would lead to this, that an executor, if also a creditor of the deceased, may pay his own debt with the first money which he ingathered leaving other creditors only the chance of any residue after he is paid. The argument, good for this, if good for anything, was really the only argument that was stated to us, and without dwelling further upon it, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has misapprehended the case, and that the trustees are entitled to judgment in terms of the conclusions of the action, the defence which the Lord Ordinay has sustained being repelled.

No. 45.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

I have not distinguished in any way between the two small accounts in name of the trustees—one for about £500, and the other about £400,—and the larger deposits made by Mr Gibson. I think the same legal considerations are applicable to them all. It is, however, proper to say that I think the explanation of these accounts is satisfactory. The trustees were empowered by the trust-deed, if they saw fit, to carry on the deceased's business for a time, with the view of selling it as a going concern, and they did accordingly so carry it on for a few months, their conduct in doing so not being impugned. The money which went into these accounts was admittedly trust money, and it is upon the face of the accounts identified as such. There is no other distinction; the other money is really in the very conspicuous position of trust-estate ingathered by the agent for the trust, and put into the bank for safe keeping, and to allow the bank by paying themselves to take an advantage over the other creditors, whether at the cost of the other creditors, or at the cost of the executors, if they are liable for this money as having been lost in their hands, would, in my opinion, be contrary to justice, and unsupported by any rule of law with which I am acquainted.

Lord Trayner.—The plea which the Lord Ordinary has sustained is one under which the defenders maintain their right to retain money lodged with them by the pursuers in extinction of a debt due to the defenders by the deceased Mr Gray, whose trustees the pursuers are. In the argument addressed to us, the distinction between a right to compensate or set off one debt against another, and the right to retain, as on a balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, was not always carefully observed. And I think this must also have been the case in the Outer-House. The distinction, however, is or may be important, for although the pleas of compensation and the right to retain, as on a balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, come very near each other, yet there are conditions necessary to admit of the application of the former which are not required in the case of the latter.

This being, as I have said, a case of retention and not of compensation, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the case of Rees v. Watts,[1] cited by the pursuers, has no application. That was a proper case of compensation or set-off, and its decision depended upon the construction of a special statute. I should doubt whether, even in England, that case would [1] June 30, 1855, 11 H. and G. 410.

No. 45.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

be regarded as an authority in a case like the present, having regard to what was said by Parke, B., in the case of Foster v. Wilson,[1] who points out that the right of set-off is dependent on statutory provisions which are and have long been distinct and separate from other statutory enactments which provide for the case of retention in bankruptcy. I think the pursuers, if desirous of supporting their views by a citation of English authorities, would have found something nearer to the point here at issue in the principles which were given effect to in the more recent case of Bailey v. Finch.[2] But decisions in England which depend upon the construction and application of statutory provisions, special to England, can scarcely be regarded as authorities in the disposal of a question which depends upon the common law of Scotland.

The facts of the present case have already been referred to sufficiently. The question is, can the defenders retain money lodged in their hands by the testamentary trustees of Mr Gray eo nomine in satisfaction of a debt due to them by Mr Gray? I agree in thinking that they cannot. It appears to me that the Lord Ordinary has erred in holding that there is here mutuality of debt and credit. The defenders are the creditors of the late Mr Gray, but they are the debtors of Mr Gray's trustees. The Lord Ordinary thinks that this amounts to the same thing, and that the bank are creditors of the trustees, because the debt due to the bank is now due "by the trustees" as the representatives of Mr Gray, and he refers to a passage in Erskine in support of this. I venture to think otherwise. The trustees represent Mr Gray only in a popular sense, and as used in this case I fear that sense is misleading. The defenders do not certainly represent Mr Gray in the sense in which an heir in mobilibus (called an executor in our law as distinguishing him from an heir, i.e., in heritage) represents the person to whom he succeeds. Such an executor, in a former state of our law, incurred absolute liability for all the debts and obligations of the deceased. He took the whole moveable estate, and with it all the debts and liabilities. He was eadem persona cum defuncto. But there were other executors who did not so represent the deceased. An executor-creditor does not do so, because he is not an heir or successor, but an administrator merely for his own behoof, and for behoof of others having claims against the deceased. In my opinion the pursuers are only executors in that sense. They are bound to administer the estate for behoof of all concerned, but have no liability or obligation beyond the duty of the administration. I doubt whether in the passage referred to Erskine[3] had in view any other than an executor proper (or heir in mobilibus), and Stair,[4] in dealing with the same subject, I think plainly means such executor, for he puts "heir" and "executor" together in a manner which shews that he is speaking of successors, heirs in heritage, and heirs in moveables. If this be so, then there is no authority for holding that testamentary trustees represent the testator in the sense in which an executor or heir in moveables represents the person whom he succeeds. They are not like him eadem persona cum defuncto. But if not, then the mutuality of debt and credit fails.

The Lord Ordinary further observes that the mutuality of debt and credit

[1] 22 L. J. Exchq. 191.
[2] L. R., 7 Q. B., 34.
[3] Erak. iii. 4, 13.
[4] Stair, i. 18, 6.

No. 45.

Nov. 27, 1895. Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank.

is completely satisfied by the one being due by and the other to the trust-estate. But what is the defenders' claim at the present moment against the pursuers? Surely not for the debt due to them by the deceased. The pursuers may never be liable for that sum. If preferable claims carried off the whole assets of the deceased the defenders would have no claim whatever against the trustees or the estate. All that the trustees are bound for at present—the only obligation which the defenders could enforce against them—is due and fair administration. It is difficult to see how the defenders can plead retention of money paid to them by the pursuers against a debt not demandable from them, a debt which in easily conceivable circumstances may never be demandable, and a debt which, in its entirety, never can be demandable if the deceased's estate is insolvent.

In addition to what I have said, it has to be remembered that the right of retention as on a balancing of accounts in bankruptcy is an equitable remedy. If a person has money or securities in his hands belonging to his debtor, he may retain them till his debt is satisfied. If the deceased had lodged moneys or securities with the defenders, then their right of retention would have been clear. But are they to take the same benefit from the accident—for it was an accident—that the pursuers lodged with them the funds realised by them in the execution of their duty as administrators? I think not. The trustees never intended to benefit the defenders in that way, and were not entitled to confer any such benefit, for any benefit conferred on the defenders was just so much loss or detriment to the general body of creditors. Nor can the defenders in equity claim such a benefit. The funds in question were deposited with them in name of the pursuers as trustees, plainly intimating thereby that they were trust funds. The defenders, therefore, knew that these funds were subject, with the other assets of the deceased Mr Gray, to all claims competent against him, and if the estate was insolvent, then to the claims of all the deceased's creditors, according to their several rights. The defenders suffer no wrong if these funds be now applied as, at the time of their deposit, the defenders knew they should be, and only could be lawfully, applied. I think the defenders' case is not covered by the equitable remedy on which their defence is based, and am of opinion on the whole matter that the defences should be repelled.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

IN each action the Court pronounced an interlocutor recalling that of the Lord Ordinary, and giving decree for the sum sued for.

DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

JAMES CULLENS Junior, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Salvesen.
THE CAMBUSBARRON CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D. Dundas—Constable.

No. 46.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

Property—Servitude—Implied grant—Right of access where disponee owns adjoining ground.—A co-operative society were proprietors of a piece of ground with buildings which faced upon the west a street known as Store Brae. In 1872 they acquired a piece of ground adjoining their property on the east under a feu-charter which bound them to erect on the ground a dwelling-house "to be used in the meantime as a bakehouse," and to erect a fence on the east side of the feu. The feu-charter contained no provision as to access. There was an access from Store Brae through the society's property by a pend four feet wide, but the only practicable access for carts was over a ploughed field belonging to the superior, which bounded the bakehouse feu on the east. In building the bakehouse the society brought carts over this field, and after it was built they continued to use the track as an access for carts.

In 1895 the proprietor of the field brought an action against the society for declarator that they had no right of access over it.

The defenders pleaded that the grant of the feu for the purpose of building a bakehouse implied a grant of a suitable access, and that the use which had followed the grant shewed its meaning.

From a proof it appeared that it was practicable for the bakehouse business to be carried on without an access for carts by the use of hand-barrows from the pend. There was evidence to shew that before commencing the building of the bakehouse the society applied for the superior's permission to bring carts over his field.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that there was no implied grant of access over the field.

M'Laren v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Co., July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1042, commented on.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

IN 1872 the Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited, were proprietors of a piece of ground bounded on the west by a street known as Store Brae. In that year they feued from Dr John Saunders Muschet a piece of ground adjoining their property on the east.

The feu-charter described the ground feued as bounded on the east "by the remaining lands of Chapel Croft" belonging to Dr Muschet, and contained a provision that the Society should be bound within a certain time to build on the ground "a substantial dwelling-house to be used in the meantime as a bakehouse," and that the Society should be bound "to put up (so far as not already done) a proper fence of thorns and beech or privet upon the east of the ground hereby feued, and that within six months' from the date hereof."

The feu-charter contained no provision as to access to the ground feued. The only available access through the Society's ground was by a pend four feet wide in their buildings facing Store Brae.

The site chosen for the bakehouse was at the south end of the ground feued about sixty yards distant from the pend. The Society carted the materials for the building from the Chapel Croft Road over the south end of a field forming part of Dr Muschet's lands immediately to the east of their feu, and after the bakehouse was completed they continued to use this track for carting flour to the bakehouse.

Upon Dr Muschet's death his lands passed to the Crown as ultimus hæres, and in 1894 the Queen's Remembrancer, as donee in trust for the Crown, granted to James Cullens junior, butcher, Stirling, a disposition of the field lying immediately to the east of the ground feued to the Society in 1872, "declaring that the said subjects hereby disponed shall be burdened with the servitude of any legal right of access competent to the Co-operative Society through the said subjects to their feu lying on the west side thereof."

No. 46.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

In 1895 Cullens raised this action against the Society, concluding for declarator that the pursuer held his property "free of any servitude of right or possession or right of way for passengers by foot or horse, or with vehicles," and for interdict against the defenders going upon the lands.

The defenders stated;—(Stat. 5) "At the date of the charter in favour of the defenders, there were only two possible accesses to the feu, one by the road or way" above mentioned across Dr Muschet's field, "leading to the Stirling Road by way of the Chapel Croft Road, and the other through some other property belonging to the defenders on the west side of the feu leading to the Store Brae. This last-mentioned property, belonging to the defenders, had been feued from another superior, and was built on, and the only means of access to the public road through it was through a pend four feet wide and down some stairs, which made it impossible as an entrance for vehicles or for the conveyance of heavy materials, such as are required for the working of a bakery. In view of the purpose for which the property was to be used, the road or way leading to the east was thus a necessary means of access to the defenders' feu. With reference to the answers hereto, it is explained that the alleged access at the north-west corner of the defenders' feu consists of a footpath which passes through the properties of third parties. Explained further, that the ground fronting the Store Brae, afterwards acquired by the defenders, was not obtained from the same superior as their other feus. It could only be made an access for carts to the defenders' bakery with great cost and difficulty, and when made would be inconvenient and unsuitable."

The pursuer answered;—(Ans. 5) "Denied. Explained that, at the date of the charter, the defenders had an access to their feu at the north-west corner thereof and across the burn, and that they had property immediately adjoining the bakehouse feu, facing the Store Brae, through which a sufficient access could have been obtained. Explained further, a cart entrance is not necessary for the conveyance of flour and fuel to the bakehouse, as all that is required for the small business they do can be carried or wheeled in a hand-barrow through the pend in the defenders' front property without inconvenience. Explained further, that a few years after the bakehouse feu was taken off, the defenders, in the knowledge that any access which had been allowed to them through the pursuer's property, then belonging to Dr Muschet, was merely a privilege which could be withdrawn at pleasure, purchased a piece of vacant ground, fronting the Store Brae and lying immediately to the north of their store premises, with the view of preserving their access to the bakehouse property, in the event of the privilege being withdrawn. This additional ground was kept vacant until about two years ago, when a wooden erection was made on part of it, but sufficient space is still left to enable an access for carts or other vehicles to be formed to the bakehouse property should that be necessary."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, being proprietor of said lands free of any servitude of road or passage, is entitled to have

No. 46.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

decree of declarator, with expenses. (2) The defenders having wrongfully asserted a right to pass over the pursuer's lands as an access to their property, the pursuer is entitled to have them interdicted, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) Any use by the defenders of access to their feu through the pursuer's land having been merely in virtue of a privilege granted to them by the former proprietor, and not having continued for forty years, decree of declarator and interdict should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders, as proprietors of land adjoining the property of the pursuer, are entitled to a servitude of right of way over the said property, in respect—(a) That the said way has been immemorially, or at least for forty years, used as a pertinent of the defenders' property; (b) that the said way was, at the date when the defenders acquired the property, and is, a necessary means of access thereto; (c) that the said way was, at the date when the defenders acquired the property, and is, necessary for the reasonable and comfortable enjoyment thereof, and the right thereto passed to the defenders by implied grant along with the feu-disposition in their favour. (2) The defenders being entitled to a right of way over the pursuer's property, and having continued with the knowledge and assent of their and the pursuer's author to use the same, are entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses. (3) The pursuer having, as tenant of the servient tenement, acquiesced in the defenders' assertion of the right of way in question, et separatim, having purchased his property in the knowledge that the said access existed, and had been used with the consent of the common author as matter of right by the defenders, he is barred personali exceptione from now objecting to the defenders' use of the road.

Proof was led, and thereafter the defenders admitted that they had failed to establish the acquisition of a servitude road by prescriptive possession, and that they relied entirely upon implied grant.

The result of the proof fully appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of Lord Trayner.

On 29th August 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) granted decree in terms of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The question in this case is whether the defenders have right to a cart road to their feu running along the south side of the pursuer's field.

"In the record the defenders claim the road either as a servitude road, to which right has been acquired by prescriptive possession, or as a road necessary for the reasonable and comfortable enjoyment of their lands, and therefore impliedly granted along with the lands.

"After the evidence had been led, however, the defenders' counsel admitted that the acquisition of a servitude road by possession had not been established, and that he therefore rested his case entirely upon implied grant.

"The material facts appear to me to be as follows:—

"In 1827 Dr Patrick Muschet, the father of Dr John Muschet, feued the ground acquired by the defenders in 1872 to William Watson, manufacturer in Cambusbarron. In the feu-charter in favour of Watson the eastern boundary of the ground feued is described, as in the defenders' charter, as 'the remainder of the said lands of Chapel Croft,' and it is declared that 'the lands hereby feued are to be separated with a stone wall or other good and sufficient fence from the remaining part of the lands of Chapel Croft, which wall or other fence shall be made or erected on or within the ground hereby feued at the sole expense of the said William Watson, and main-

No. 46.

Nov. 27, 1895. Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Their case rested on the principle of the decision in Cochrane v. Ewart,[1] and subsequent cases, which recognised an implied grant of access where it was necessary to the reasonable, convenient, and comfortable enjoyment of the property. The first point was whether the road in question—which was the only cart access—was necessary to the convenient use of the bake-house. Such an access had been held a necessary adjunct to a bake-house.[2] At least the proof shewed that it was a necessary adjunct. The obligation in the feu-charter binding the Society to erect a fence on their eastern boundary was for the purpose of separating the properties, and did not exclude the possibility of gates in the fence. Further, the road had been used by the defenders for more than twenty years for all their traffic. There was no cart access before the grant, because before then no bakery existed, and no cart access was required. But there was a considerable body of evidence as to the use of this line of approach as a footpath, and the general feuing-plan of the estate made for the superior shewed a road along this line of approach up to the defenders' eastern tained by him and his foresaids at their own expense in all time coming.' The fence actually put up seems to have been a thorn hedge.

---

"Watson was proprietor of ground adjoining that feued to him upon the west, and fronting a street called Store Brae. Watson therefore had access to the ground feued through his own property from Store Brae. He erected a dye or wash-house, partly upon his original property and partly upon the ground feued, and used the remainder of the latter ground as a garden.

"During Watson's time there appears to have been a wicket-gate, some three feet in width, in the south end of the fence, between his feu and the field acquired by the pursuer, so that Watson had an access to his feu from the east upon the line of the road now claimed by the defenders. There was no made path leading across the field to the gate, but only a path trodden along the hedge upon the south side of the field, and generally, when the field was ploughed, the space so trodden appears to have been left untouched. When precisely the gate was put into the fence, or what were the circumstances under which it was put in, cannot now be ascertained.

"Watson died in 1863, and the ground now belonging to the defenders appears to have been re-acquired in some unexplained way by Dr Muschet. Watson's front property was acquired by a Mr Cowie, and for a few years he also occupied the defenders' ground as a garden as tenant of Dr Muschet. About 1866 Cowie and Dr Muschet appear to have had some disagreement about the garden, and it was then let for several years to the witness Gilchrist, who also had a property fronting Store Brae, through which he obtained access to the garden.

"The wicket-gate to which I have referred appears to have fallen into disuse before Watson's death. The witness Mrs Betts is very distinct upon that point, and she says that before Watson's death the hedge had grown right across the gate. After Watson's death there is no evidence of the gate having been used at all, and it appears either to have been blocked up with thorns or with a paling. The pursuer's field also appears at that time to have been ploughed up from fence to fence without any path being left.

"Prior to 1872, therefore, it is proved (1) that the ground had always been owned or possessed by persons having property adjoining it and front-

---

[1] Cochrane v. Ewart, Jan. 30, 1860, 22 D. 358, aff. March 25, 1861, 4 Macq. 117, 32 Scot. Jur. 168.

[2] Union Heritable Securities Co., Limited, v. Mathie, March 3, 1886, 13 R. 670, per Lord M'Laren, Ordinary, p. 673.

boundary. Implied grant was primarily a question of intention.[1] In the present case the implication of such an intention was derived from several independent circumstances—(1) The previously existing way was important. (2) The purpose for which the feu was granted—the charter expressly bore that a bakehouse was to be erected. In various English cases grantees had been found entitled to rights necessarily incident to the purpose for which the grant was made.[2] (3) The fact that when the tenants of the field had tried to interrupt the use of the cart access, the defenders had directly applied to the superior, and that the latter had then exhibited the feuing-plan shewing the road, as proving the defenders' right to its use. (4) The use of the road from the date of the feu. The Lord Ordinary thought that none of the above elements taken separately was enough to establish a right, but the defenders were entitled to have them taken together in judging of their rights.[3]

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary was right. There ing Store Brae, through which they obtained access to the ground; (2) that there had never been any access for carts to the ground from the east; and (3) that the ground, except in so far as Watson had built upon it, had always been used as garden ground. It is also proved that there was an access (although a very narrow and inconvenient one) to the ground from the north, where a small burn is crossed by stepping-stones.

---

"Now, when the defenders acquired the ground in 1872, they were in the same position as those who had previously held it, in that they were possessed of a property fronting Store Brae, through which they could obtain access to the ground by means of an existing pend entering from the street. In their feu-charter there is no suggestion of any access from the east over the remaining lands of Chapel Croft. On the contrary, as I have already pointed out, they were taken bound to erect and maintain a fence between these lands and the ground feued.

"These circumstances appear to me to be very unfavourable for an implied grant of a cart road through the remaining lands of the superior. If a proprietor buys an addition to his property, I think that, apart from stipulation to the contrary, the presumption is that he is to enter it from his property. That view was stated very clearly by Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in the case of M'Laren v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Company (5 R. 1042). He said:—'To narrow the category, I should say, on this matter of access, that when a purchase is made by a proprietor of the adjacent property, the inference as regards access is in most cases not only displaced but reversed. Every man is presumed to have access to his own ground, and if he purchases an adjoining plot from a neighbour, the presumption is that he means to enter it from his own side. If a man buy the upper storey of a house next his own, or a corner of a field adjoining his park, the presumption is not that he contemplates using the same access as that used by the seller, but that he means to use an access through his own property. In the ordinary case nothing else could be inferred, and it would lead to the most extravagant results were it otherwise.'

"These remarks were made in a case in which the purchaser was

---

[1] M'Laren v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Co., July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1042, per Lord Justice-Clerk, p. 1047.

[2] Gayford v. Moffat, L. R., 4 Ch. App. 133; Opinion of Lord Chancellor (Cairns) approved of by Jessel, M. R., in Corporation of London v. Riggs, L. R., 13 C. D. 798.

[3] Union Heritable Securities Co. v. Mathie, 13 R. 670.

No. 46.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

were many special elements to exclude the idea of implied grant. There was no existing cart access from the east at the date of the feu. There was an access from the west. It was possible to carry on the business and working of the bakehouse by means of this western access. Here the physical properties of the feu when acquired were such as to exclude the cart access from the east. A ploughed field intervened between the feu and the chapel road. Although a disposition of heritage implied access, that right was satisfied if the disponee obtained such access as existed at the date of the grant.[1] This was not a question of a necessary access, but rather one of a more convenient access. The proper test was the state of matters at the date of the feu.[2]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The defenders in this case claim to have a right of access to their property by a road through the property of the pursuer. As originally stated that claim was based on servitude acquired by possession, claiming right to use an existing access, and they therefore apply a fortiori to a case such as the present, in which there was no existing access.

---

"But then the defenders say that the feu was taken by them for the purpose of erecting a bakehouse, that Dr Muschet was aware that that was the purpose for which they took the feu, that a cart road was necessary for the use of the bakehouse, and that Dr Muschet during his lifetime recognised their right to the road.

"Now, there is no doubt that the object which the defenders had in view in acquiring the ground was to erect a bakehouse upon a portion of it, and, apart from the oral evidence, the feu-charter shews that Dr Muschet must have been aware of the fact, because the feu-charter declares that the defenders shall be bound to build on the ground 'a substantial dwelling-house, to be used in the meantime as a bakehouse, stone and slated, and to uphold the same thereon in all time coming'; and it is further provided that an irritancy is to be incurred 'in case the said society or their foresaids shall fail in erecting a dwelling-house as aforesaid.'

"But while it is clear enough that Dr Muschet knew that the defenders intended to use the building as a bakehouse, I do not think that they can maintain (as at one stage of the argument they appeared to do) that Dr Muschet laid them under an obligation to erect a bakehouse, and was bound therefore to supply them with a suitable access. As I read the clause in the charter the only obligation laid upon the defenders is to erect a dwelling-house (presumably to secure the feu-duty), and the use to be made of the house 'in the meantime' is mentioned rather as a concession to the defenders than as an obligation imposed upon them. It seems to me to be plain that if the defenders had erected a dwelling-house instead of a bakehouse the superior could not have objected.

"Now, did the mere knowledge of the superior that the defenders proposed to erect a bakehouse, and his acquiescence in that use of the ground, necessarily imply the grant of a cart road to the bakehouse through the other lands of the superior? I do not think it necessary to consider what would have been the result if such a road had actually been in existence; but as no such road previously existed, it seems to me that it is impossible to read into the conveyance the grant of a road, at all events unless it can be shewn that without such a road the ground could not be utilised for the

---

[1] Louttit's Trustees v. Highland Railway Co., May 18, 1892, 19 R. 791.

[2] Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 28, 1875, 2 R. 729; Campbell v. Halkett, July 18, 1890, 27 S. L. R. 1000; Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1130.

No. 46.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

and alternatively, implied grant. The former of these grounds has been abandoned by the defenders, and the Lord Ordinary has negatived the claim in so far as it proceeds upon the latter and alternative ground, and accordingly has repelled the defences and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right, and that his judgment should be affirmed.

The Lord Ordinary's opinion, which is fully given, seems to me to dispose so satisfactorily of the defenders' claim that nothing requires to be added, or indeed admits of being added to it, as a ground of judgment. But I may indicate in one or two sentences what appear to me to be the reasons which lead to the conclusion at which, with the Lord Ordinary, I have arrived. First, no right of the kind claimed by the defenders appears ex facie of the titles of either party. That, of course, is implied in the statement that the right claimed is maintained in respect of an implied grant. But the titles are referred to only because the conditions there purposes of a bakehouse, and that refusal on the superior's part to give such a road would have amounted to a derogation from his own grant. I do not, however, think that the defenders have established that that was the case.

---

"No doubt it is always a convenience to have a cart access to a bakehouse by means of which sacks of flour and other heavy materials may be brought to the door. But it is not absolutely necessary. Sacks of flour, and such like, may be and are carried considerable distances from the street or road to the bakehouse. It is true that, considering the part of the ground upon which the defenders have chosen to build their bakehouse, to convey the materials from Store Brae would involve great labour and expense. But that is because the defenders have built the bakehouse at the south end of the ground. If they had built it opposite the pend entering from Store Brae, I do not think that there would have been much practical difficulty in carrying in the materials. Therefore, in my opinion, the defenders have not proved that a cart access through the other lands of the superior was necessary to the purpose which they had in view in purchasing the ground.

"But then the defenders say that although a cart road had not actually been made, it was Dr Muschet's intention to make a road, in accordance with a feuing-plan which he had prepared, along the south side of the field acquired by the pursuer, and that both he and they had the proposed road in view when the feu was taken.

"Now the feuing-plan referred to is in a sketch plan (No. 10 of process) which Dr Muschet had obtained in 1833, shewing the manner in which he proposed that his unfeued lands should be given off. Lots Nos. 10, 11, 12, and 13 on the feuing-plan lie between the Chapel Croft Road (which is shewn upon the plan No. 24 of process) and the defenders' ground, and the feuing-plan shews a road running from the Chapel Croft Road to the fence upon the eastern side of the defenders' ground. Lot No. 10 was ultimately feued to a Mr Taylor, and lot No. 11 to James Cullens senior, the pursuer's father, and the field acquired by the pursuer represents lots Nos. 12 and 13. Taylor and Cullens formed a road opposite their feus, but when the defenders acquired the ground feued to them the road had not been formed further to the west, but what was shewn upon the feuing-plan as lots Nos. 12 and 13, with the portion of the road opposite to them, was a grass field. Now the feuing-plan does not, as I understand it, shew a road leading to the defenders' ground. The plan is a little rubbed and the line is not very distinct, but it seems to me that the road runs up to the fence forming the eastern boundary of the defenders' ground, and stops

No. 46.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

imposed on the predecessors of the defenders as to fencing their ground rather point at the complete separation of the two feus than to their being to any extent or effect used the one as an access to the other. Second, the track or passage in question (for it never was a made road, but merely the head-rigg left unploughed and trodden down), was used originally by Mr Watson when in possession of the defenders' feu by the direct permission of the superior, who was then in possession of the pursuers' land. The permission, however, was only for temporary use, and was withdrawn in the lifetime of Mr Watson, to whom it had been granted. The complete withdrawal of that permission is evidenced by the fact that the gate which had been placed in the hedge by Watson at the point where the passage or track gave access to the defenders' feu, was removed by Mr Watson, and the gap in the fence which the removal of the gate occasioned was filled up with stobs, which were subsequently overgrown by the hedge. All access to the defenders' ground by the passage in question from the ground to the

---

there. The plan was made in 1833, and at that time the defenders' ground was feued by Watson, and was off the superior's hands. He therefore did not require to consider it, and the plan referred only to the ground which remained unfeued. Further, lots 12 and 13 had not been feued in 1872, and might never be feued; and Dr Muschet was under no obligation, and presumably did not intend, to make the road, unless the ground was feued. Further, even if lots 12 and 13 had been feued, it does not necessarily follow that the road would have been made. Suppose someone had taken both these lots as one feu, a road running straight along the south side of the ground would have been of no use to him. I am therefore of opinion that (at all events apart from the defenders' possession of the road, which I shall deal with presently) the existence of a private feuing-plan shewing a road is not equivalent to an actually existing road, which might be held to be included by implication in the grant of the ground. In regard to the allegation that the defenders had the proposed road in view when they took their feu, I can only say that I gather from the evidence that the defenders were shewn the feuing-plan for the first time long after the feu-charter had been granted.

"The defenders attempted, with the aid of the feuing-plan, to assimilate their case to that of The Union Heritable Securities Company v. Mathie, 13 R. 670. That, so far as I know, is the only case in which an access not actually in existence at the date of the conveyance was held to be included by implication in the grant. The circumstances, however, were very peculiar, and although the result undoubtedly met the equity of the case, it is difficult, as Lord Rutherfurd Clark remarked, to find a ground of judgment. I therefore do not regard the decision as adding anything to the law upon the subject, but as a special case which was decided entirely upon its peculiar circumstances. Further, it is very easy to distinguish that case from the present.

"There remains for consideration the effect of the possession which the defenders have had of the road.

"When the defenders commenced to build the bakehouse they put a gate in the fence forming the eastern boundary of their ground, and carted all the materials for the building along the south side of the pursuer's field, upon the line of the road shewn on the feuing-plan. After the building was completed, the defenders continued to bring the flour and other stores for the use of the bakery along the road in question, and they to some extent formed the road by putting down stones and ashes. All this was done with the knowledge and consent of Dr Muschet.

"The defenders, while they admit that the possession which they have

No. 46.

Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

east was thus entirely excluded. Third, after Watson had ceased to use the passage as an access to his ground, and for several years before the defenders acquired the property, the passage in question left unploughed while Watson was using it was ploughed over like the rest of the field, and the passage was obliterated. There was no passage used, or indeed in existence, when the defenders acquired the ground. There was nothing, therefore, in the physical condition or appearance of the ground to suggest to the defenders that there was any access to their land from the east. Fourth, the access claimed was not, and is not, necessary to the defenders in the reasonable use and enjoyment of their subjects. That it might be very convenient may be admitted, but that it is not necessary is, I think, clearly established. The defenders' ground has all along been held either by feuars or tenants in connection with other property fronting the Store Brae, and is now so held by the defenders. Through that property, so fronting the street, access can now, as formerly, be had to the defenders' feu, and I think the Lord had is not sufficient to constitute a servitude right of way, maintain that the possession interprets the conveyance in their feu-charter, and shews that the road was included in the grant. The pursuer, on the other hand, avers that the defenders' use of the road was a mere privilege conferred upon them by Dr Muschet.

---

"It appears to me that upon the evidence the contention of the pursuer must be sustained. There is only one witness, William Smith, who is able to speak definitely as to the circumstances under which the defenders began to use the road. At the time when the feu was taken he was the chairman of the committee of the defenders' society, and in that capacity he was one of those who negotiated with Dr Muschet for the feu. He says that after the rate of feu-duty had been settled, and it had been agreed that the defenders should take the feu, he asked Dr Muschet for the privilege of bringing in the building materials through the pursuer's field, which Dr Muschet granted. Other witnesses, who were members of the society at the time, no doubt say that their understanding was that the society had right to the road, and that Dr Muschet recognised the right. The evidence of all these witnesses, however, is very vague, and they mostly give only the impression which they received from the reports of those who formed deputations which on various occasions met Dr Muschet. Smith's evidence, on the other hand, is quite distinct, and as he was one of those who actually carried through the negotiations for the feu, he has the means of knowing precisely what passed, and as I saw no reason for doubting his truthfulness, his evidence must, in my opinion, be accepted as conclusive in regard to the way in which the defenders first obtained the use of the road.

"Further, it seems to me that the probabilities of the case point in the same direction. If, as they now say, the defenders regarded the acquisition of the road as an essential matter, I cannot but think that they, or their law-agents, would have taken care to have the right inserted in the feu-charter. On the other hand, if Dr Muschet had been granting a servitude road, I think that he would have had the conditions upon which the grant was given precisely defined. I think that it is most unlikely that he should have assured the defenders, or that, if he did so, they should have accepted the assurance that a right to a non-existing road was included in a mere conveyance of the ground which, moreover, contained an obligation upon the defenders, enforceable upon pain of forfeiture, to fence it off from the field through which the road was to pass. It is much more probable that Dr Muschet gave the defenders permission to pass through the field. It was his interest that the building should be completed as quickly as possible, and very probably the fact that he contemplated that a road would

No. 46.
Nov. 27, 1895.
Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

Ordinary is right in applying to this state of matters the law as laid down by the late Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of M'Laren.[1] Fifth, any possession which the defenders have had has been in consequence of the superior's permission, and there is nothing whatever to shew that he intended to give more by such permission than a temporary convenience, such as he had many years before granted to Mr Watson. These are, I think, the main grounds on which the Lord Ordinary proceeds in repelling the defenders claim, and which I have perhaps unnecessarily repeated. They seem to me sufficient for the decision which has been pronounced, and in which I concur.

---

ultimately be made through the field made him the more ready to give the concession. The same consideration might have influenced him in allowing the defenders, after the building was completed, to bring the not very large supply of flour, and so forth, which they required at the bakery, through the field. It was a privilege which he might naturally enough have granted to his feuars, especially as it does not seem to have interfered with the letting of the field.

"Some time after the bakery was established, a deputation of the defenders' society again went to Dr Muschet about the road. It appears that Mr Cullens senior objected to the use which the defenders were making of the road which he had made opposite his house, and of the field of which his firm were then tenants. He accordingly put a padlock upon the gate into the field, and the defenders sent a deputation to Dr Muschet on the subject. The defenders attempted to prove that he then assured them that the road was theirs. I am not sure if the evidence is competent; but assuming that it is so, I am of opinion that it is not proved that Dr Muschet expressed the view that the road belonged to the defenders. The question in regard to which they went to him was whether Cullens was entitled to shut up the gate and prevent them having access to the field. All that appears to me to be proved is that Dr Muschet said that Cullens had not right to do so. It was on this occasion that Dr Muschet produced (apparently for the first time) the feuing-plan. The defenders attempted to prove that the plan was produced to shew the road as being a road to which they had right, but I do not think that that was the case. I think that the plan was produced to shew that Cullens, having taken his feu upon the footing that the road would ultimately be carried up to the defenders' ground, had no right to object to the defenders using the road with Dr Muschet's permission.

"I am therefore of opinion that the use of the road by the defenders has throughout been a matter of privilege and tolerance, and not the exercise of a right.

"It was finally argued that the pursuer is barred personali exceptione from objecting to the defenders' use of the road. The only ground upon which that plea is rested is, that before he purchased the field the pursuer was tenant of it, and therefore knew the use which the defenders had of the road. Of course, when the pursuer purchased the field, he took the risk of the defenders having a servitude right over it, and if it had turned out that they had such a right, his prior knowledge of their possession would have barred him from repudiating his purchase and making any claim against the seller. But his knowledge that the defenders had used the road did not prevent him stopping that use if he found that it was without legal title.

"Upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree."

---

[1] 5 R. 1042.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DUNCAN SMITH & MACLAREN, S.S.C.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 46.

Nov. 27, 1895.

Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited.

No. 47.

Nov. 28, 1895.

Watson v. Watson.

MRS ELIZA CATHERINE LIDDELL OR WATSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. C. Smith—C. J. Guthrie.

HUGH WATSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—W. Campbell—Craig.

Parent and Child—Husband and Wife—Divorce—Custody and aliment of children—Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 86), sec. 9.—An order pronounced by a Lord Ordinary in an action of divorce, under the power conferred by section 9 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, to make provision for the custody and aliment of pupil children of the marriage, ceases to be operative in regard to each child when it emerges from pupillarity.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

IN an action of divorce by Mrs Catherine Watson against Hugh Watson, her husband, the Lord Ordinary (Craighill), on 17th March 1880, granted decree of divorce: "Further, of consent of the defender, finds the pursuer entitled to the custody and keeping of Andrew Gordon Watson and John Liddell Watson, the children of the pursuer and defender, for the present, and until the further orders of the Court: . . . Ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £75 sterling yearly, as aliment for each of the said Andrew Gordon Watson and John Liddell Watson, the children of the marriage of the pursuer and defender . . . so long as the said children shall remain in the custody of the pursuer: Reserving to either the pursuer or the defender at any time to move the Court in the present action to increase or diminish the aliment now awarded to the pursuer for said children, should a change of circumstances occur rendering such an increase or diminution necessary or expedient in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Court, and decerns."*

At this date the children, Andrew Gordon Watson and John Liddell Watson, were respectively four and three years of age.

By assignation dated and recorded in May 1880 the defender assigned to trustees a bond and disposition in security for payment of the aliment decerned for.

In 1895 the pursuer, Mrs Watson, lodged a minute craving that the aliment for each of the children should be increased in order to meet the expenses of their professional education.

Hugh Watson lodged answers, and also a minute stating that the two children of the marriage had now nearly attained majority, the elder being twenty, and the younger nearly nineteen, and that he himself had been reduced to poverty. He therefore craved the Court to put an end to the aliment, and to ordain that the balance of the

* The Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 86), sec. 9, enacts,—"In any action for separation a mensa et thoro, or for divorce, the Court may from time to time make such interim orders, and may, in the final decree, make such provision as to it shall seem just and proper with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of any pupil children of the marriage to which such action relates."

No. 47.

Nov. 28, 1895. Watson v. Watson.

£3000 assigned to trustees by the assignation in 1880 should be restored to him.

On 17th October 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuses the motion made by the pursuer in said minute for an increase of the aliment awarded to the pursuer for the maintenance of their children, Andrew Gordon Watson and John Liddell Watson, by the interlocutor of 17th March 1880; also refuses, in hoc statu, the motion made by the defender in said minute No. 41 of process, that the aliment should now terminate: Grants leave to reclaim."

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The interlocutor of Lord Craighill must be read as applying to pupils and not to minors, both on account of its terms, and also because the Lord Ordinary had no power to regulate the custody of children in an action of divorce[1] save under the provisions of section 9 of the Conjugal Rights Act of 1861, which applied only to pupils and not to minors. Children who had emerged from pupillarity could not be regarded as in the custody of their mother.[2] The decree had therefore ceased to be operative, and, that being so, the subjects assigned for the purposes of that decree should be restored.[3]

Argued for the respondent;—A child did not necessarily cease to be "in custody" on ceasing to be a pupil.[4] Even assuming that the interlocutor of Lord Craighill had now ceased to be operative, the Court could not ordain trustees to denude of their trust by an order in an action of divorce.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion, the Lord Ordinary who pronounced the interlocutor of 17th March 1880 had no power to assign to the pursuer the custody of these children after they had ceased to be pupils. His Lordship's jurisdiction necessarily rested on the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, for apart from that statute questions of custody are not competent to a Judge in the Outer-House. Now, the 9th section of the statute applies only to pupils. Seeing, then, that the interlocutor is an exercise of the statutory jurisdiction, it is to be read, and I think may fairly be read, as relating solely to the period of pupillarity. The custody having ceased, the aliment has also ceased. Were the true meaning of the interlocutor wider, to that extent it would be ultra vires and ineffectual. This being so, the interlocutor ceased to be operative as regards each child when he passed pupillarity.

In this view the present process has ceased to be one in which any order of custody or aliment can competently be pronounced. On this ground, I consider that the defender's motion should have been refused absolutely, and not in hoc statu merely.

The rights inter se of the defender on the one hand, and his sons on the other, if these come in dispute, must be determined in some other process, and may arise in relation to the disposal of the money remaining in the [1] Fraser, Parent and Child, p. 69.

[2] Hardie v. Leith, Oct. 31, 1878, 6 R. 115; Symington v. Symington, March 18, 1873, 2 R. (H. L.) 41.

[3] Reid v. Moir, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. 1060, Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) at p. 1063, 38 Scot. Jur. 551.

[4] M'Iver v. M'Iver, July 2, 1859, 21 D. 1103, 31 Scot. Jur. 619.

No. 47.

Nov. 28, 1895.
Watson v. Watson.

hands of the trustees. There may also arise any equitable claims which the wife may have arising out of the conduct of the husband in allowing her, while de facto providing for the children, to enter into onerous engagements for their benefit. None of such questions are now competently before us.

I am for varying the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 17th October 1895 by omitting the words in hoc statu, and quoad ultra adhering.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary had no jurisdiction to regulate the maintenance, custody, and education of children before the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act of 1861. But section 9 of that Act empowers the Lord Ordinary to make such provision as to him shall seem just and proper "with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of any pupil children of the marriage." It appears that the jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary does not go beyond the power to regulate the custody, maintenance, and education of pupil children, and that he has none to regulate those of minors. That being so, the question is—What is the meaning of the Lord Ordinary's judgment? I agree with your Lordship that there is no doubt that it must be read with reference to the jurisdiction which he possesses. If that be so, the meaning is that the children referred to in the decree are pupil children, and that the virtue of the interlocutor ceases as soon as the children cease to be pupils. I therefore agree.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT varied the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary by the omission of the words in hoc statu, and quoad ultra adhered.

PRINGLE & CLAY, W.S.—JAMES ALLAN, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895.
Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

BARONY PARISH COUNCIL, Pursuers (Respondents).—D.-F. Asher—Deas.
SCHOOL BOARD OF GLASGOW, Defenders (Appellants).—Dickson—Sym.

School—Land acquired by School Board by voluntary purchase—Deficiency of poor-rates—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 19), sec. 127—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), sec. 37—Education (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 78), sec. 31.—Where a school board acquired land for the site of a school by voluntary purchase, and without adopting the procedure prescribed by section 31 of the Education Act, 1878, and obtaining a confirming Act, held that the school board were not liable under section 127 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, to make good the deficiency in the poor-rates caused by their having acquired the land.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF GLASGOW, for the purpose of erecting two public schools, acquired certain properties in Glasgow, and demolished the buildings on the properties. The Barony Parish Council thereafter brought an action against the School Board in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for payment of £25, 0s. 11d., being the difference of the rates for the year 1894-5 on the properties which the School Board

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895. Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

had taken as compared with their value for the year 1892-3* (the rates for 1893-4 having been, it was alleged in error, settled for).

The defenders admitted the acquisition and demolition of the properties, but explained that they had acquired them for the sites of schools by ordinary purchase from the owners.† The pursuers, in the course of the action, admitted that the defenders had neither applied for nor obtained a confirming Act in relation to the properties.‡

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses, in respect (a) the defenders acquired the sites in question in virtue of their power under the Education Act, 1872, to acquire sites, and not in virtue of the powers contained in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith; (b) separatim, even supposing it were in virtue of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act that they did acquire the sites in question, there is in regard to these sites no special Act as defined in section

---

* Section 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 19), enacts, that "if the promoters of the undertaking become possessed by virtue of this, or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land-tax, or liable to be assessed to the poor's-rates or prison assessments, they shall from time to time, until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessment, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments . . . by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the work, and said deficiency shall be computed according to the rentals at which said lands with any building thereon were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act. . . ."

† The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 37, enacts,—"In performing their duties under this Act, it shall be lawful for any school board to acquire by purchase or otherwise sites for schools . . . [And for the purpose of the purchase by a school board of any land or building in pursuance of the provisions of this Act the clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, with respect to the purchase of lands by agreement shall be incorporated herewith . . ."]

The portion of section 37 within brackets was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 39).

‡ The Education Scotland Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 78), enacts, sec. 31,—"With respect to the purchase of land by school boards for the purposes of the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 and 1878, the following provisions shall have effect—(that is to say):—

"(1) The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same, shall be incorporated with this Act, except the provisions relating to access to the special Act, and in construing these Acts for the purposes of this section the special Act shall be construed to mean the principal Act and this Act, together with the confirming Act hereinafter mentioned. . . .

"(2) The school board before putting in force any of the powers of said Acts with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement shall"—[Here follow provisions for the publication and service of notices describing the object for which the land is to be taken, and the obtaining of an order from the Scots Education Department authorising the taking of the lands].

"(6) No order so made shall be of any validity, unless the same has been confirmed by Act of Parliament; and it shall be lawful for the Department . . . to obtain such confirmation, and the Act confirming such order (herein called the confirming Act) shall be deemed to be a public general Act of Parliament."

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895.
Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

31 of the Education Act, 1878, and therefore section 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act does not apply.

On 22d June 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) decerned against the defenders as craved.*

* "NOTE.—By the Education Act, 1872, sec. 37, the clauses of the Lands Clauses Act with respect to the purchase of lands by agreement are incorporated with the Act 'for the purpose of the purchase by a school board of any land or building in pursuance of the provisions of this Act.' These words occur in the section which authorises the School Board to acquire sites and schools by purchase or otherwise, and appear to apply to the 6th and following clauses of the Lands Clauses Act, which gives facilities for buying land from owners under disability. It is unnecessary to consider whether this incorporation included the 127th section of the Act on which this action is founded, because by the Education Act of 1878, sec. 30, the whole of the Lands Clauses Act, with an unimportant exception, is incorporated with the Education Acts of 1872 and 1878.

"The 127th section of the Act of 1845 (section 133 in the English Act) makes the School Board liable 'to make good the deficiency' in certain rates, including poor-rates, 'by reason of lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the work,' and that 'from time to time until the works shall be completed and assessed.' This action is brought for a deficiency said to arise in this way in the assessment for the year 1894-95 on lands taken for school purposes in Barony Parish, the deficiency being ascertained—as I assume, though it is not so stated—by comparison with the assessment of the previous year.

"The defenders object to this claim on two grounds. They say that the 127th section does not apply to them (1) because they have not bought under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, but under the power to acquire lands conferred by section 37 of the Act of 1872; and (2) because in any view, the 127th section provides that the deficiency 'shall be computed according to the rental at which such lands, with any building thereon, were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act,' and in the present case no special Act exists in the sense of section 31 of the Education Act, 1878.

"1. The Lands Clauses Act, with the exception referred to, is incorporated with the Education Act, and no reason has been suggested why the 127th section should have no effect where lands are bought by private bargain, and without any use being made in regard to the properties in question (as is alleged in argument, though not admitted) even of the powers in the 'purchase by agreement' clauses. The natural meaning of incorporation is that the whole Act, so far as not inconsistent with the Education Act (Att. Gen. v. G. E. Railway Co., L. R., 7 Ch. 475), is embodied in the Education Act, and the school board is not entitled to hold itself free from certain of its provisions and to take advantage when the occasion arises of others; and as it is impossible to say in such a case as this that the possession of compulsory powers (however qualified in the Act of 1878) has not indirectly benefited the defenders in bargaining about these properties, it is not unfair to say that they should take the incommodum of the Act along with the commodum. This point, however, seems to be concluded by the very full explanation of what incorporation means in the preamble of the Act of 1845, which is to be construed 'as one Act with the Education Act.'

"2. It is perhaps a more arguable question which is raised on the proviso in the Lands Clauses Act as to computing the deficiency already quoted, taken along with the provisions of section 31 of the Education Act, 1878. The latter introduces a rather peculiar and cumbrous procedure regarding the taking of land compulsorily, consisting of an application to the Education Department for an order, which becomes final only by a con-

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895. Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—(1) Section 127 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, did not apply. The defenders had acquired the properties by voluntary purchase. They were entitled to do that under section 37 of the 1872 Act. That part of section 37 by which the Lands Clauses Act was incorporated had been superseded by section 31 of the 1878 Act, and ultimately repealed. It had not been necessary for the defenders to call in aid the compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Act at all. They had not required to adopt the procedure set forth in section 31, and to obtain a confirming Act, but it was only after such an Act was obtained that the incorporation of the Lands Clauses Act under section 31 took effect. (2) Besides, it was essential for the practical working of section 127 that a special Act should have been obtained, for the deficiency of the rates had to be computed with reference to the date of the special Act. But it was evident from subsec. (6) of section 31 that without a confirming Act there could be no special Act. There was no confirming Act here, and it was impossible, therefore, duly to ascertain the deficiency of rates in terms of section 127.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) Section 31 of the 1878 Act took firming Act of Parliament. Subsection 1 of section 31 enacts that in construing the Lands Clauses Acts and amending Acts 'for the purposes of this section, the special Act shall be construed to mean the principal Act (1872) and this Act, together with the confirming Act hereinafter mentioned.' The contention made is that as there is no confirming Act in regard to the purchase of the subjects condescended on, there is no special Act at the passing of which the rental can be computed, and therefore, as I understand the argument, the conditions necessary for the operation of section 127 of the Lands Clauses Act do not exist. The assumption is that in all cases the deficiency to be made good depends on a comparison of the rental of the present year with the year in which the special Act was passed. I am not satisfied that this is a sound construction of section 127. It rather appears that the main provision is that until the works are completed and assessed the promoters shall make good the deficiency in rates by reason of their taking and using the lands, and that the provision as to computation is merely ancillary. In most cases there is no doubt or difficulty, because the special Act is easily ascertained and is of no remote date, while here the definition above given refers us to an Act which has never come into existence, and but for the definition above given we should have to look to 1872 or 1878 for the passing of the special Act. It seems to me, however, that the intention of the Legislature is that the deficiency shall be made good in all cases where lands are taken and the work not yet completed, and that the subsidiary provision does not limit the general enactment, but is applicable only where there is a special Railway or Canal Act, or the like, authorising the taking of specific lands—the species facti which no doubt was directly contemplated by the framers of the Act of 1845. In more recent times the taking of land has been authorised in a variety of ways, and by classes of promoters not then thought of, and general powers have been given to proceed under the Lands Clauses Act. I cannot doubt that all these 'promoters' must make good the deficiency, and that the special subsidiary proviso as to computation must receive effect in those cases only to which it is applicable. Many cases of 'beneficial' construction of statutes are found which go further than this, e.g., Cortis v. Kent Waterworks, 7 B. and Cr. 314, illustrates the principle, and I think that the adaptability of this very clause to circumstances apparently not contemplated is shewn by Bristol Guardians v. Mayor of Bristol, 18 Q. B. D. 549, and the earlier cases of Wheeler and Stratton v. Metropolitan Board of Works, there cited."

---

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895.
Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

the place of section 37 of the 1872 Act, and by it the Lands Clauses Act was incorporated. The incorporation was altogether independent of the special procedure prescribed for the case of lands acquired otherwise than by agreement. Land acquired by a school board must therefore be liable to the conditions imposed by that Act. By it a school board obtained higher powers and greater advantages than they formerly had, and they were not entitled to take benefit by some and to ignore others of its provisions merely because these latter appeared disadvantageous, unless they were also inconsistent with the Education Acts.[1] That was not so here, and there was no reason why lands acquired by private agreement should not be included within the operation of section 127. (2) The obvious intention of section 127 was to provide for the deficiency of rates occasioned by the promoters taking land—however they might take it—being made good until the works were completed and assessed. There was no practical difficulty in ascertaining the necessary dates, and the passage in section 127 as to computing the deficiency was merely ancillary to the main provision, and was inserted to meet what was the most likely case to occur. The Court would construe a subsidiary clause of that kind liberally, so as to give effect to the main purpose of the section.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This claim is rested upon the 127th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, and it is necessary, first of all, to see what is the relation of this school board to the Lands Clauses Act under the several statutes which deal with the matter. In the Act of 1872 there was a partial incorporation of the Lands Clauses Act, but in 1878 a different system was substituted. Without expressly repealing the provisions in the Act of 1872, the Act of 1878 did this. It incorporated the whole of the Lands Clauses Act with the Act of 1872. But then it provided that before putting in force any of the powers of the Act with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement certain procedure was to be gone through. That procedure may be shortly stated thus:—A provisional order was to be obtained, and a confirming Act of Parliament followed upon that. Now, in one view, the position of the school board was strengthened, and in another it was weakened by this. But that the two systems were inconsistent the one with the other, or rather that the system of 1878 was intended to supersede and sweep away the system of 1872, is shewn by this, that the Legislature subsequently, holding the one to supersede the other, formally repealed the provisions of the Act of 1872 in this regard. Now, that being the net result of these statutes, we have to consider, in the matter now in hand—Has the School Board exercised the powers of the Lands Clauses Act vested in them by the Act of 1878? And we have to regard that in relation to the very definite terms of this section 127. We are told by section 127 that if lands have been taken in virtue of the Lands Clauses Act, and a deficiency has arisen in the assessments, that shall be made good, but that the deficiency shall be computed according to the rentals at which said lands, with any buildings thereon, were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act.

[1] Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 1877, L. R., 7 Ch. Ap. 475.

[2] Governor of Poor of Bristol v. Mayor of Bristol, 1887, L. R., 18 Q. B. D 549; Stratton v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1874, 10 C. P. 76.

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895. Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

counsel, there is substituted for that power a new incorporation of the Lands Clauses Act itself under the conditions of that Act. Therefore it seems to me to follow of necessity from the concession, that until the School Board has obtained authority to take land it has not been brought within the scope of the Lands Clauses Act of 1845 at all. Now, that being so, I agree with your Lordships that none of the conditions under which section 127 would be brought into operation have been satisfied. The promoters or the School Board have become possessed of land, but not by virtue of the Lands Clauses Act, because that has not yet been brought into operation, nor by virtue of any special Act or Act incorporated therewith, because the special Act has not yet come into existence. They might obtain a special Act by following certain procedure, but they have not, and therefore I agree with your Lordships in thinking that they are possessed of the land by virtue of the powers conferred upon them by the 37th section of the Education Act of 1872, and not otherwise. For these reasons I agree that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled, and that the appeal should be sustained.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and assoilzied the defenders.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 49.

Nov. 29, 1895. Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees.

MRS JANE DUNLOP COCHRAN OR SHEDDEN AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Salvesen—M'Lennan.

THOMAS DUNLOP WILSON AND OTHERS (Mrs Shedden's Trustees), AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—R. V. Campbell—Craigie.

Trust—Inter vivos disposition—Right to revoke.—By trust-disposition and assignation S assigned and disponed certain heritage described in the deed, and the whole remainder of her estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, first, for behoof of herself in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband she might marry; and second, for behoof of her two sisters and their respective heirs in fee. In the third place, she provided that, notwithstanding the above provision of liferent and fee, it should be within the power of her trustees, at any time, in their sole discretion, to advance to her the whole or such part of the capital as they might think fit. She further declared that the deed should be held as an alimentary provision for behoof of herself, and should not be affectable or attachable by her debts or deeds, or the diligence of her creditors.

The deed was delivered to the trustees, who accepted office, and was thereafter recorded in the Register of Sasines.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the deed was not revocable by S.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 27th January 1894 Miss Jane Dunlop Cochran, residing at Grange Cottage, Dunlop, who was then fifty-four years of age, executed a trust-disposition and assignation bearing to be in contemplation of her approaching marriage, whereby she assigned and disponed to certain trustees a small heritable property in the parish of Dunlop, two heritable bonds for £900 and £600 respectively, and the whole remainder of the means and estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or which might belong to her at the time of her death, in trust for the following purposes, viz.:—First, for her own liferent use and enjoyment allenarly during all the days of her life exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband

No. 49.

Nov. 29, 1895. Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees.

she might have; second, for behoof of her sisters Margaret Cochran or Muir and Jessie Cochran or Anderson equally between them and their respective heirs in fee. In the third place, she provided that, "notwithstanding the provision of liferent and fee hereinbefore contained, it shall be within the power of my said trustees, or the survivors of them, at any time in their or his discretion, ... to advance and pay to me while in life either the whole or such part of the capital as they may deem expedient and think fit, and that without any consent or concurrence of any kind whatever, declaring that all such payments as may be made to me shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband I may have; . . . and I further declare that these presents shall be held as an alimentary provision for behoof of myself, and shall not be affectable or attachable by the debts or deeds of me, nor by the diligence of my creditors. . . ."

The deed was delivered to the trustees named therein, who accepted office by minute dated 31st January 1894, and the deed was recorded in the Register of Sasines on 14th February 1894.

On 6th February 1894 Miss Jane Dunlop Cochran married John Shedden, and in December 1894 she brought an action, with the consent and concurrence of her husband, against the trustees and beneficiaries named in the trust-disposition and assignation (1) for reduction of the said deed, the minute of acceptance by the trustees, and the warrant of registration written on the deed on behalf of the trustees; or alternatively (2) for declarator that the said deed was revocable by her with her husband's consent, and had been validly revoked.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that the deed had been granted by her in the belief that it was merely testamentary, and that, if this was not its character, it had been executed by her under essential error as to its import and effect, induced by the agent who acted for her in drawing it.

She also pleaded,—(1) The said trust-disposition and assignation being revocable in its nature, and having been validly revoked by the pursuers, decree of declarator should be pronounced in terms of the alternative conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient. (2) The trust-deed challenged having been executed in contemplation of marriage, and for the female pursuer's protection during marriage, the same is not revocable by her. (3) The trust-deed challenged being in its nature and terms irrevocable, the pursuers have no ground of action.

On 8th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the first plea in law for the pursuers, and before further answer allowed the parties a proof of their averments.*

---

* "OPINION.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the disposition and assignation challenged is, upon its legal construction, a deed which operated as a divestiture of the pursuer, and was therefore irrevocable. I need not explain at length the grounds of that opinion. They come simply to this, that the deed is a conveyance to trustees for certain purposes, which appear to me to leave the truster merely such rights as are provided to her under the trust-deed, and I do not think it material—at all events I do not think it conclusive—that under the deed the trustees have in their discretion certain powers which might enable them in effect to restore the estate, or part of the estate, to the granter. I do not, it will be observed,

No. 48.

Nov. 28, 1895. Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board.

counsel, there is substituted for that power a new incorporation of the Lands Clauses Act itself under the conditions of that Act. Therefore it seems to me to follow of necessity from the concession, that until the School Board has obtained authority to take land it has not been brought within the scope of the Lands Clauses Act of 1845 at all. Now, that being so, I agree with your Lordships that none of the conditions under which section 127 would be brought into operation have been satisfied. The promoters or the School Board have become possessed of land, but not by virtue of the Lands Clauses Act, because that has not yet been brought into operation, nor by virtue of any special Act or Act incorporated therewith, because the special Act has not yet come into existence. They might obtain a special Act by following certain procedure, but they have not, and therefore I agree with your Lordships in thinking that they are possessed of the land by virtue of the powers conferred upon them by the 37th section of the Education Act of 1872, and not otherwise. For these reasons I agree that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled, and that the appeal should be sustained.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and assoilzied the defenders.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 49.

Nov. 29, 1895. Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees.

MRS JANE DUNLOP COCHRAN OR SHEDDEN AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Salvesen—M'Lennan.

THOMAS DUNLOP WILSON AND OTHERS (Mrs Shedden's Trustees), AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—R. V. Campbell—Craigie.

Trust—Inter vivos disposition—Right to revoke.—By trust-disposition and assignation S assigned and disponed certain heritage described in the deed, and the whole remainder of her estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, first, for behoof of herself in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband she might marry; and second, for behoof of her two sisters and their respective heirs in fee. In the third place, she provided that, notwithstanding the above provision of liferent and fee, it should be within the power of her trustees, at any time, in their sole discretion, to advance to her the whole or such part of the capital as they might think fit. She further declared that the deed should be held as an alimentary provision for behoof of herself, and should not be affectable or attachable by her debts or deeds, or the diligence of her creditors.

The deed was delivered to the trustees, who accepted office, and was thereafter recorded in the Register of Sasines.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the deed was not revocable by S.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 27th January 1894 Miss Jane Dunlop Cochran, residing at Grange Cottage, Dunlop, who was then fifty-four years of age, executed a trust-disposition and assignation bearing to be in contemplation of her approaching marriage, whereby she assigned and disponed to certain trustees a small heritable property in the parish of Dunlop, two heritable bonds for £900 and £600 respectively, and the whole remainder of the means and estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or which might belong to her at the time of her death, in trust for the following purposes, viz.:—First, for her own liferent use and enjoyment allenarly during all the days of her life, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband

she might have; second, for behoof of her sisters Margaret Cochran or Muir and Jessie Cochran or Anderson equally between them and their respective heirs in fee. In the third place, she provided that, "notwithstanding the provision of liferent and fee hereinbefore contained, it shall be within the power of my said trustees, or the survivors of them, at any time in their or his discretion, ... to advance and pay to me while in life either the whole or such part of the capital as they may deem expedient and think fit, and that without any consent or concurrence of any kind whatever, declaring that all such payments as may be made to me shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband I may have; . . . and I further declare that these presents shall be held as an alimentary provision for behoof of myself, and shall not be affectable or attachable by the debts or deeds of me, nor by the diligence of my creditors. . . ."

The deed was delivered to the trustees named therein, who accepted office by minute dated 31st January 1894, and the deed was recorded in the Register of Sasines on 14th February 1894.

On 6th February 1894 Miss Jane Dunlop Cochran married John Shedden, and in December 1894 she brought an action, with the consent and concurrence of her husband, against the trustees and beneficiaries named in the trust-disposition and assignation (1) for reduction of the said deed, the minute of acceptance by the trustees, and the warrant of registration written on the deed on behalf of the trustees; or alternatively (2) for declarator that the said deed was revocable by her with her husband's consent, and had been validly revoked.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that the deed had been granted by her in the belief that it was merely testamentary, and that, if this was not its character, it had been executed by her under essential error as to its import and effect, induced by the agent who acted for her in drawing it.

She also pleaded,—(1) The said trust-disposition and assignation being revocable in its nature, and having been validly revoked by the pursuers, decree of declarator should be pronounced in terms of the alternative conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient. (2) The trust-deed challenged having been executed in contemplation of marriage, and for the female pursuer's protection during marriage, the same is not revocable by her. (3) The trust-deed challenged being in its nature and terms irrevocable, the pursuers have no ground of action.

On 8th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the first plea in law for the pursuers, and before further answer allowed the parties a proof of their averments.*

* "OPINION.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the disposition and assignation challenged is, upon its legal construction, a deed which operated as a divestiture of the pursuer, and was therefore irrevocable. I need not explain at length the grounds of that opinion. They come simply to this, that the deed is a conveyance to trustees for certain purposes, which appear to me to leave the truster merely such rights as are provided to her under the trust-deed, and I do not think it material—at all events I do not think it conclusive—that under the deed the trustees have in their discretion certain powers which might enable them in effect to restore the estate, or part of the estate, to the granter. I do not, it will be observed,

No. 49.

Nov. 29, 1895. Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees.

Proof was afterwards led, the result of the evidence being to negative the pursuer's allegation that she had executed the deed under essential error as to its import and effect, and on 20th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The trust-disposition was a mortis causa and revocable deed. It was not a partial conveyance, but dealt with the universitas of the granter's estate, and the probabilities were all against it being the granter's intention to divest herself of her whole estate. The trustees were also empowered, at their discretion, to retransfer the whole trust-estate to the granter, and thus to defeat the right of the fiars. Accordingly no such jus quæsitum tertio was created as to bar revocation.[1] The deed was therefore of the same character as a disposition to trustees for behoof of the granter in liferent and her issue to be born in fee, and such a disposition was revocable.[2] A deed conceived in such terms as those here in question was not effectual against creditors, and was therefore revocable.[3] The cases of Murray and Robertson[4] were distinct, for both were cases of partial conveyances, and in neither had the trustees power to reconvey the trust-estate to the granter. The latter consideration applied also to the case of Smitton.[4] Further, in both Robertson and Smitton there were provisions to third parties which were intended to take effect at once. Here the provision in favour of the testator's sisters was only intended to take effect at the granter's death. (2) If not revocable, the deed was reducible on the ground of essential error.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The deed was irrevocable. It contained a clause excluding creditors, which was equivalent to a declaration that it was irrevocable. A jus quæsitum was conferred upon the granter's sisters, who took a vested right subject only to defeasance in the event of the trustees exercising their power to advance. The case was therefore distinct from Fernie,[1] Murison,[2] and Mackenzie.[2] The deed operated as an immediate divestiture of the granter, and was go upon the ground that the deed, while essentially revocable, and merely a trust for administration, is yet irrevocable during the subsistence of the marriage. I do not, in short, proceed on the argument which was pressed on me, founded on the application of the cases of Pringle (6 Macph. 982), Torry-Anderson (15 S. 1073), and Menzies (2 R. 507.) I reserve my view upon the application of those cases to trusts of this description. I do not require to consider that question, being of opinion that this was, as I have said, a divesting and irrevocable deed. That being so, I do not know that there is any further question to be now decided, both parties being agreed that there must be inquiry with regard to the averments of the pursuer to the effect that she executed the deed under error. These averments raise somewhat delicate questions, and I am glad that the parties have come to the conclusion that they will best be tried by a proof before answer, which proof accordingly I shall allow."

---

[1] Fernie v. Colquhoun's Trustees, Dec. 20, 1854, 17 D. 232, 27 Scot. Jur. 86.

[2] Murison v. Dick, Feb. 10, 1854, 16 D. 529, 26 Scot. Jur. 239; Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027.

[3] Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1874, 2 R. 237; Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, 4 R. 22; Williamson v. Boothby, June 11, 1890, 17 R. 927.

[4] Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, July 17, 1895, 22 R. 927; Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, 19 R. 849; Smitton v. Tod, Dec. 12, 1839, 2 D. 225, 12 Scot. Jur. 241.

No. 49.

Nov. 29, 1895.
Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees.

therefore irrevocable.[1] In Smitton the deed dealt with the universitas of the granter's estate. In Forrest's[2] case the question was with creditors, not beneficiaries. Further, the ratio decidendi in that case[3] was that the trust was not intended to come into operation until the granter's death. (2) At all events the deed was not revocable during the subsistence of the marriage. It had been entered into in contemplation of marriage, and for the protection of the granter, and the trustees were bound to hold in order to safeguard her alimentary liferent.[4] The case of Williamson[5] supported this view, and Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees[6] would have been decided differently had the deed there in question been executed in contemplation of marriage. (3) The pursuers' case on essential error failed on the evidence.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary both on the construction of the deed and on the result of the proof. The deed, on the face of it, bears to be a present conveyance of the fee to trustees for persons named, and the trust-estate is not to be affectable by the deeds of the truster. The authorities support the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary; and the power of the trustees to give to the truster part of the capital does not displace that conclusion. The power is absolutely at the discretion of the trustees, who hold for the fiars as well as the liferenter, and the estate is in no sense at the call of the truster.

The facts are such that of the more delicate questions put to us in argument, none really arise. This is not the case of the granter of a gratuitous deed who has not understood the true effect of her deed. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the result of the evidence is that the pursuer was properly informed of the effect of the deed, and fully understood it.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion, upon the same grounds.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] Turnbulls v. Tawse, April 15, 1825, 1 W. and S. 80; Smitton v. Tod, Dec. 12, 1839, 2 D. 225, 12 Scot. Jur. 241; Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, 19 R. 849; Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, July 17, 1895, 22 R. 927.

[2] Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, 4 R. 22.

[3] Per Lord President, ibid. p. 32.

[4] Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073, per Lord Justice-Clerk Hope at p. 1085, 9 Scot. Jur. 509; Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 R. 507; Standard Property Investment Company v. Cowe, March 20, 1877, 4 R. 695, per Lord Gifford at 703.

[5] Williamson v. Boothby, June 11, 1890, 17 R. 927.

[6] Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027, per Lord Justice-Clerk at p. 1041.

No. 50.

Nov. 29, 1895.

M'Kimmie's Trustees v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

DANIEL MUNRO AND OTHERS (William M'Kimmie's Trustees), Appellants.—M'Lennan—Younger.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Sir Charles Pearson—A. J. Young.

Stamp—Bond—Discharge—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 39)—First Schedule.—The Stamp Act, 1891, in the First Schedule under the head "Mortgage," imposes an ad valorem duty on "(5) Reconveyance, release, discharge, surrender, resurrender, warrant to vacate, or renunciation of any such security as aforesaid, or of the benefit thereof, or of the money thereby secured: For every £100, and also for any fractional part of £100, of the total amount or value of the money at any time secured, £0, 0s. 6d."

Held (1) that the description in article (5) did not apply to a deed granting a partial discharge of a bond which did not completely disburden the subjects, and that such deed not being otherwise chargeable under the schedule required a deed stamp of 10s.; and (2) that a deed granting a discharge for the balance due on a bond was subject to an ad valorem duty on the total amount at any time secured.

1ST DIVISION. IN May 1887 William M'Kimmie, Glasgow, proprietor of certain heritable subjects which were subject to a bond for £5000, paid to the creditors in the bond, the trustees of John Greenshields, £2000 to account, and received from them a partial discharge, dated and recorded in May 1887, whereby, in consideration of the sum of £2000 paid to them, they discharged the bond and disposition in security for £5000 to the extent of £2000, and declared the security subjects to be redeemed and disburdened to that extent. This partial discharge was impressed with a 10s. stamp.

In May 1895, William M'Kimmie being then deceased, his trustees repaid the balance of £3000 secured by the bond, and received a discharge from John Greenshield's trustees bearing that they, in consideration of the sum of £3000 paid to them, "being the balance remaining undischarged of the principal sum contained in the bond and disposition in security," thereby discharged "(but only to the extent of the said sum of £3000 paid as aforesaid)," the said bond for £5000, and declared the security subjects to be redeemed and disburdened thereof, and of the infeftment following thereon, "but only to the extent foresaid."

Thereafter William M'Kimmie's trustees presented this instrument to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and craved their opinion as to the stamp-duty with which it was chargeable.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was chargeable with the ad valorem duty applicable to the discharge of a mortgage for the full sum of £5000, being "the total amount or value of the money at any time secured" thereby, viz., £1, 5s. They accordingly assessed the instrument with duty to that amount, and, that sum having been paid, the instrument was impressed with the necessary stamps.

William M'Kimmie's trustees required a case, and the present case was accordingly stated, the question for the opinion of the Court being,—"Whether the said instrument, in the circumstances above set forth, is liable to be assessed and charged with ad valorem duty of £1, 5s., or whether it is chargeable with ad valorem duty of 15s. only?"*

Argued for the appellants;—The bond and disposition in security

* The schedule of the Stamp Act is quoted in the rubric.

No. 50.

Nov. 29, 1895. M'Kimmie's Trustees v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

had been discharged to the extent of £2000 in 1887, and duty at the rate of 6d. per £100 had then been paid on that sum. The amount thereafter secured by the bond was only £3000, and that was the whole amount to which the bond was discharged, and required to be discharged by the instrument in question. Stamp-duty was therefore only chargeable upon that amount. The language of the schedule was applicable equally to the case of two deeds as of one. If the sum of £5000 were secured by separate deeds, each could be discharged for duty at the rate of 6d. per £100, and it was unreasonable to hold that more duty was chargeable where a single bond for the same amount was discharged by two separate instruments.

Argued for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue;—The duty of 10s. charged upon the first discharge was not ad valorem duty, but the ordinary duty chargeable for a deed, although it happened that the amount of ad valorem duty and of the deed stamp was the same. The language of the schedule shewed that it was the intention of the Legislature that where a bond was discharged by successive partial discharges the whole ad valorem duty should be assessed on the final discharge, for such duty was to be paid for every £100 of the "total amount of the money at any time secured." The decision of the Commissioners was therefore sound.*

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion, the instrument in question is liable to be assessed and charged with ad valorem duty of £1, 5s.

I think the Commissioners rightly read the 5th section—voce Mortgage in the schedule—as applying, and applying only, to such discharges as have the effect of wholly freeing the subjects of the security from that security, and that the duty is to be calculated by the maximum of the burden which was ever incumbent by virtue of the security. It results, first, that the duty is payable equally on a discharge of the balance of the money, with a discharge of the whole money; and second, that this section does not apply to a discharge which lifts off from the security subjects only part of the security, but leaves it in part still incumbent.

As this view has the effect of ousting from this section discharges which do not have the effect by themselves, or in combination with previous discharges, of finally removing the burden, it follows that such discharges are liable to an ordinary deed stamp, for they certainly are deeds, and they are not, in the words of the Act, "described in this schedule."

What course the department deem it proper to take in exacting the several duties which the statutes authorise is a matter of administration with which Courts of law have not to do.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT found and determined that the instrument in question set forth in the case is, in the circumstances set forth, liable to be assessed and charged with ad valorem duty of £1, 5s. sterling.

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

* Where the total amount at any time secured is less than £2000, the practice of the Inland Revenue office is to limit the charge upon a partial discharge to 6d. per £100 upon such total amount, each partial discharge thus bearing the same duty as the final discharge.

No. 51.

Dec. 6, 1895. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor.

MRS ELIZABETH DINWOODIE (David Dinwoodie's Executrix), Pursuer (Appellant).—Dickson—Clyde.
JAMES WRIGHT (Mrs Mary Carruthers' Executor), Defender (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—John Wilson.

Succession—Donation—Deposit-receipt—Destination.—On 20th September 1892 a brother and a sister took a deposit-receipt from a bank in these terms,—"Received of" the brother and the sister "the sum of £400 as a deposit with" the bank, "to be repaid on 15th July 1895 to them or the survivor of them, and bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum." Of the £400, £350 was contributed by the sister and £50 by the brother.

Both the brother and the sister died before the date of repayment of the deposit-receipt, the brother being the survivor of the two. The sister was in possession of the deposit-receipt at her death.

In an action by the executrix of the brother against the executor of the sister for delivery of the deposit-receipt, on the ground that its contents had passed to the brother as the survivor, held that the deposit-receipt had not the effect of transferring the property of the predeceaser to the survivor, and consequently that the pursuer's only right was to receive the £50 deposited by the brother, with interest.

Foreign—Deposit-receipt—Deposit-receipt issued by English bank to Scottish depositors—Whether rights of depositors inter se regulated by English law.—Two persons, domiciled and resident in Scotland, placed a sum of money, belonging in part to each, upon deposit-receipt with an English bank in their joint names. Held that all questions as to the right of the depositors inter se in the money deposited fell to be determined by Scots law, and not by the law of England.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

IN March 1895 Mrs Elizabeth Dinwoodie, widow and sole trustee and executrix of David Dinwoodie, grocer, Lochmaben, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, against James Wright, flesher, Lochmaben, trustee and executor of Mrs Mary Carruthers, Lochmaben, praying for delivery of the following deposit-receipt, which was found in Mrs Carruthers' repositories after her death, or alternatively for payment of £420, with interest:—

"The National Bank of New Zealand, Limited,
"London, 20th September 1892.

"£400. Deposit-Receipt.

Not transferable.

"Received of Mr David Dinwoodie, grocer, Lochmaben, and Mrs Mary Carruthers, Lochmaben, N.B., the sum of four hundred pounds stg. as a deposit with the National Bank of New Zealand, Limited, to be repaid on the 15th July 1895 to them, or survivor of them, and bearing interest at the rate of five per cent per annum from the 15th July 1892." (Then came the signature of the secretary of the bank.)

"No cheque or draft can be drawn against this receipt, and interest will cease on the date the deposit falls due."

The nature of the action and the circumstances out of which it arose, as appearing from the record and a proof, were as follows:—

Mr Dinwoodie and Mrs Carruthers were brother and sister. In July 1892 she handed £350 to him to be invested, and he deposited this money, along with £50 of his own, on a deposit-receipt for £400 with the National Bank of New Zealand. The deposit-receipt, which was dated 15th July 1892, was similar to that above quoted, except that it was taken in Mr Dinwoodie's name only. A Mr Charles Burns, through whom the investment was carried out, deponed that the insertion of Dinwoodie's name only was due to a blunder on the part of the bank, and Mrs Carruthers having objected to the omission of her name, the deposit-receipt was returned to the bank, and a new deposit-receipt, being that above quoted, sent in exchange.

With reference to this change, the pursuer averred,—"This change was made with the intention on the part of Mr Dinwoodie and Mrs Carruthers, and for the purpose of securing for the survivor of them the sole right to the contents of the deposit-receipt, and Mrs Carruthers, after seeing the receipt, and having the effect of its terms fully explained to her, stated that it was as she desired it."

The defender denied this averment, and adduced witnesses who deponed that Mrs Carruthers still objected to the form of the deposit-receipt, on the ground that she wished her money to be invested in her own name only. These witnesses further deponed that she insisted on getting possession of the deposit-receipt, and in point of fact it was handed over to her, and she retained it until her death.

Burns, on the other hand, deponed that, so far as he observed, Mrs Carruthers expressed no objection to the second deposit-receipt, and that, in his opinion, she fully understood that its effect would be to give the whole money to the survivor. Her main motive in having her money so deposited, as far as Burns could discover, was to prevent her husband, who had deserted her, from getting hold of it should he return. Burns also gave this evidence,—"I pointed out to her that if she wished the thing altered she could at any time get a fresh deposit-receipt made out for £350 in her own name. (Q.) You understood that she could get the money retransferred into her own name, and she understood that too? (A.) Yes."

Mrs Carruthers died on 17th January and Mr Dinwoodie on 21st January 1895.

In her trust-disposition and settlement, which was dated 26th February 1894, Mrs Carruthers stated with reference to the deposit-receipt,—"It is my desire to expressly state here that £350 sterling of said deposit-receipt is my exclusive property, the remaining £50 belonging to my said brother David; and further, that it was never my intention that the said deposit-receipt should be issued as repayable to them, or survivor of them, as, having full confidence in my brother, he did it for me quite unknown to me."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Said deposit-receipt being repayable to the survivor of Mr Dinwoodie and Mrs Carruthers, the pursuer, as sole trustee and executrix of the survivor, is entitled to delivery thereof. (2) Mr Dinwoodie and Mrs Carruthers having made a contract that the survivor of them should receive said deposit-receipt and contents thereof, the pursuer, as sole trustee and executrix of the survivor, is entitled to delivery of said receipt. (7) The National Bank of New Zealand, Limited, being an English institution, all questions arising out of the form of said deposit-receipt and the obligations of the bank fall to be determined by English law, and according to it the pursuer, as executrix of the survivor of the persons named in the receipt, is entitled to delivery thereof.*

* With reference to the pursuer's 7th plea in law, the pursuer adduced as witnesses two solicitors from Carlisle, who deponed that, according to English law, under a deposit-receipt conceived in such terms as that in question, the whole sum deposited would pass to the survivor absolutely, a will by the predeceaser being ineffectual to prevent that result.

No 51.

Dec. 6, 1895. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Said deposit-receipt having been issued in the joint names of the late Mr Dinwoodie and Mrs Carruthers without the sanction or consent of the latter, and the statement in said deposit-receipt, that the amount was "to be repaid to them, or survivor of them," having been inserted therein against the wishes of the late Mrs Carruthers, the terms of said receipt are in no way binding on her executor. (3) The said late Mr Dinwoodie having taken said deposit-receipt in the terms therein stated in direct contradiction to the expressed wishes of the late Mrs Carruthers, the terms of said receipt are not operative as a bequest to him, and the interest of his executrix is limited to that portion of the amount (viz., £50) which admittedly belonged to him. (4) The said late Mrs Carruthers having never donated the said sum of £350, or parted with her right of property therein, and by her last will and testament, executed subsequently to the date of said deposit-receipt, having specially directed the defender as her executor to administer said amount, he is entitled to do so, and for that purpose to retain the custody of said deposit-receipt. (6) In any event, the last will and testament of the late Mrs Carruthers operates as a cancellation of the terms of said deposit-receipt, and the defender, as her executor, is entitled to the custody thereof.

On 26th July 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after findings in fact and in law, he ordained the defender to deliver up the deposit-receipt to the pursuer.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff. On 1st October, the deposit-receipt having matured, of consent the money was uplifted and lodged with the Clerk of Court.

On 7th October the Sheriff (Campbell) recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and, on the ground that the special destination in the deposit-receipt had been revoked by Mrs Carruthers' settlement, found that £50 of the sum deposited fell to be paid to the pursuer, and the balance to the defender.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—While it could not be disputed that the ordinary rule in Scotland was that a deposit-receipt was a purely mercantile document which could have no testamentary or dispositive effect, that rule would not be extended, and there had even been indications that it might be reconsidered.[1] The document in this case differed from an ordinary Scots deposit-receipt in that it was a deposit for a fixed term, was not recoverable at call, and bore interest at a specified rate. That constituted a contract not of deposit but of loan, and therefore such a deposit-receipt was of the nature of a personal bond or investment with a destination. Such destinations had been held to have a testamentary effect,[2] and if taken by the testator and not by a third party, were not affected by a subsequent general settlement.[3] The bank in this case was an English bank, and [1] Lord Young in Macdonald v. Macdonald, June 11, 1889, 16 R. 758; Cuthill v. Burns, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 849, 34 Scot. Jur. 426; Watt's Trustees v. Mackenzie, July 1, 1869, 7 Macph. 930, 41 Scot. Jur. 626; Miller v. Miller, June 27, 1874, 1 R. 1107; Crosbie's Trustees v. Wright, May 28, 1880, 7 R. 823; Jamieson v. Macleod, July 13, 1880, 7 R. 1131.

[2] Walker's Executor v. Walker, June 19, 1878, 5 R. 965; Buchan v. Porteous, Nov. 13, 1879, 7 R. 211; Connell's Trustees v. Connell's Trustees, July 16, 1886, 13 R. 1175; Ritchie v. Ritchie's Trustees, July 20, 1888, 15 R. 1186.

[3] Campbell v. Campbell, July 8, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 100.

No. 51.

Dec. 6, 1895. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor.

by English law the destination is effectual to carry the whole sum deposited to the survivor. As the deposit-receipt was repayable in England the law of England must be applied.[1] If this was a good special destination, it was mutual and contractual, the sum being jointly contributed, therefore revocation must be joint; it could not be revoked by Mrs Carruthers' will alone.

Argued for the respondent;—The terms of this document did not differentiate it from an ordinary deposit-receipt. Not being probative or tested, it could not operate as a will.[2] But even if there was here a good special destination it was revocable by each of the parties as regarded his or her own estate, and had been revoked by Mrs Carruthers' will as regarded her estate.[3] The notion that the deposit-receipt constituted a contract, in the sense that it was a mutual settlement which was not revocable except by the parties jointly, was unintelligible when the nature of the deposit-receipt was kept in view. If the deposit-receipt embodied a contract at all, it was a contract whereby the predeceaser agreed to pay a sum of money to the survivor if either or both of them died before a specified date; if both survived that date the whole arrangement came to an end, for it was not suggested that there was any agreement to renew the deposit-receipt. Such a contract was simply a contract of wager, and was bad on that ground. It had nothing in common with a proper mutual settlement. In fact, however, there was no evidence of a contract between the parties. That was the result of the evidence of Burns, a witness adduced by the pursuer, who deponed that in his own opinion, and in the opinion of Mrs Carruthers, she might revoke the deposit-receipt so far as concerned her estate at any time, and the fair inference was that in this Burns also expressed the view of his client, Dinwoodie. The argument that the law of England applied was ill founded. That law might probably regulate the contract between the bank and the depositors, but there was no sufficient evidence that the depositors intended their relations inter se to be so regulated. The mere fact that the deposit-receipt was payable in England was not sufficient evidence of such an intention, and there was no other evidence.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The facts of this case are few, and I do not think that I need take long to state them so far as they are material to the judgment we are to pronounce. It appears that a sum of £400 was deposited in a bank in London in 1892 by Mr David Dinwoodie of Lochmaben. He died on 21st January 1895, and his sister Mrs Carruthers died on the 17th of the same month, and when she died there was found in her repositories the deposit-receipt for £400 dated 20th September 1892. That receipt bears that the money was received of Mr David Dinwoodie and Mrs Mary Carruthers, and that it was to be repaid on 15th July 1895 to them or the survivor of them, and bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. Neither

[1] Connell's Trustees, supra (shares of English companies).

[2] Cuthill v. Burns, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 849, 34 Scot. Jur. 426; Kennedy v. Rose, July 8, 1863, 1 Macph. 1042, per Lord Curriehill at p. 1048, 35 Scot. Jur. 596; Miller v. Miller, June 27, 1874, 1 R. 1107, per Lord Neaves at p. 1110; Watt's Trustees v. Mackenzie, July 1, 1869, 7 Macph. 930, 41 Scot. Jur. 626; Milne v. Grant's Executors, June 5, 1884, 11 R. 887.

[3] Lang's Trustees v. Lang, July 14, 1885, 12 R. 1265.

No. 51.

Dec. 6, 1895. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor.

Mr Dinwoodie nor Mrs Carruthers survived that date. The petitioner here is the executrix of Mr Dinwoodie, and the petition is directed against the executor of Mrs Carruthers, the question being, which is entitled to have the deposit-receipt or the contents thereof? The prayer of the petition is in these terms:—"To ordain the defender to deliver to the pursuer, as sole trustee and executrix foresaid, a deposit-receipt for £400 sterling. . . . And failing his doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to ordain the defender to pay to the pursuer the sum of £420," &c.

Now, the facts necessary to be attended to are these. In the first place, as is quite candidly and truly stated by the petitioner in the third article of her condescendence, the original deposit was made on 5th July 1892, Dinwoodie then taking the deposit-receipt in his own name for £400, but of that sum £50 was contributed by him and £350 by Mrs Carruthers. The terms of this receipt were thought unsatisfactory, and so it was returned to the bank, and in lieu thereof a new deposit-receipt—that I have referred to—was handed to Mrs Carruthers. On these facts the petitioner, as executrix of Mr Dinwoodie, who by a few days survived his sister, claims to be entitled to have the £400. It is admitted that £350 of this £400 was Mrs Carruthers' to begin with, but the contention is that the £350 on her death ceased to be part of her estate, and became the property of her surviving brother. Whether this was so or not is the only question we have to decide.

It seems quite clear that if this £350, originally Mrs Carruthers' property, ceased to be so, and became Mr Dinwoodie's, that must have been either by gift, by contract, or by will. There is no other way in which the property could pass. Therefore the question comes to be, whether we have before us evidence of gift, contract, or will. I am of opinion that we have not. Looking to the transaction, to the terms of the original receipt, and of the one substituted for it, I think that there is no evidence of gift. I am also of opinion that there is no evidence of contract, or of any transaction or arrangement between Mrs Carruthers and Mr Dinwoodie which could make property pass from her to him. I am of opinion that the deposit-receipt cannot operate as a will. I think that it was conceded that according to the authorities a deposit-receipt cannot operate as a will, but even if this was not conceded, I am of opinion that it cannot, and of course a will cannot be proved by parole evidence alone. Therefore I am of opinion in fact that there is no evidence of gift, contract, or will to pass the property from Mrs Carruthers to her brother, or to take it from its natural destination.

Now, in point of law I am of opinion that a deposit-receipt does not operate as a gift or a contract, and I have already said that it does not operate as a will. But it was contended that by the law of England it does operate, somehow or other,—it was not distinctly stated here whether as a gift, contract, or will,—to pass property from one person to another.

I am of opinion that the law of England has no application here. If I thought otherwise I should take other means of finding out what the English law is than by the evidence of solicitors from Carlisle. I think that the law of England would have to be applied to determine the bank's obligation, but there is no question as to that. The question is, who is to have the beneficial interest after the bank's obligation has been determined by payment? Now, the law of England has nothing to do with the beneficial interest in the money which has been paid. Really the true meaning of this deposit-receipt is that to avoid questions of probate, confirmation, &c., the bank would pay the money to the survivor. It so happened in this case that there was no survivor, and whether the money belonged to one or the other was a question that could not arise on the terms of the receipt at all. It might have been anybody's; it might have been trust money. The original property was not changed by the deposit in the bank or by the terms of the receipt; therefore it must continue £50 the property of Mr Dinwoodie, and £350 the property of Mrs Carruthers, passing on her death to her estate. It will appear sufficiently from what I have said that my opinion is irrespective of the will of 1894 altogether. That will is of no materiality except in the view that the deposit-receipt operated as a will. It has therefore in my view no bearing on the issue between the parties.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with Lord Young in the conclusion at which he has arrived.

There has been a good deal of discussion as to whether what is called by the pursuer herself in the prayer of the petition a "deposit-receipt" is a deposit-receipt or something else. It has been variously represented as in effect, if not in form, a mutual settlement, or a contract, or a mutual conveyance with a special destination; it has been assimilated also to a personal bond. I think it is nothing more or less than what it bears in gremio to be—a deposit-receipt. It is no doubt a deposit-receipt for money which is to remain on deposit for a fixed period, and it states the rate of interest payable to the depositor during the currency of that period. These two features may not be found invariably in the ordinary bank deposit-receipt, but I have been unable to see how they can change radically the character of the document, or affect the transaction of which it is at once the expression and the voucher. Taking it, however, as a deposit-receipt, it is maintained for the pursuer that the terms in which it is conceived are sufficient, according to the law of England, to confer on the survivor an absolute right to the whole sum deposited, and that the rule of English law must here be applied, the deposit-receipt having been issued by an English bank. I am of a different opinion. The deposit-receipt represents a contract between the depositor and depository, and both the locus contractus and locus solutionis are in England. As regards, therefore, any question between the depositor and depository, it may very well be that the English law must govern. But there is no such question here. On the other hand, in any question between the depositors themselves, or their representatives, I think the Scotch law must govern, seeing that the depositors are both Scotch, that they were dealing with moveable estate situated in Scotland, and that they cannot be presumed to have transacted with each other on any other footing than that their respective rights should be determined by the only law with which they are supposed to be acquainted, that is, the law of their own country. Now, according to our law, a deposit-receipt taken in name of the depositor and another or the survivor is not habile as a testamentary disposition. Nor does such a deposit-receipt per se support the view of donation, and in this connection it is a material, if not conclusive circumstance, that the supposed donor, Mrs Carruthers, never delivered

No. 51.

Dec. 6, 1895. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor.

the deposit-receipt to the donee, but retained possession of it till her death. If the deposit-receipt, therefore, was neither a testamentary conveyance by Mrs Carruthers to her brother nor a donation, it confers no right on the pursuer or other representative of the brother other than that which he had irrespective of his sister. That right was to get repayment of what he had deposited, namely, £50, while the remaining £350 belonged to Mrs Carruthers, her right in like manner never having been enhanced by anything which her brother, the co-depositor, had done. This result is, I think, what both depositors intended and had in view when the deposit was made. The evidence of Mr Burns satisfies me of this, for he says that Mrs Carruthers understood that she could at any time get her share of the deposited money placed in her own name, that is, could separate it from her brother's money, and hold it as her own just as it had been hers before the deposit was made.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor appealed against, and also recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 26th July 1895: Find in fact (1) that on 15th July 1892 the late David Dinwoodie, acting for himself and his sister, Mrs Mary Dinwoodie or Carruthers, deposited with the National Bank of New Zealand, Limited, London, the sum of £400 as a deposit-receipt in his own name, to be repaid to him with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum on 15th July 1895; (2) that of the said sum, £50 was contributed by the said David Dinwoodie and £350 by the said Mary Dinwoodie or Carruthers; (3) that on 20th September 1892 the said deposit-receipt was returned to the said bank by the said David Dinwoodie, and in lieu thereof a new deposit-receipt of that date, being the deposit-receipt referred to in the prayer of the petition, given to him by the said bank; (4) that the said Mary Dinwoodie or Carruthers did not make a gift to the said David Dinwoodie of the said sum of £350 contributed as aforesaid by her, or make any contract or agreement with him to the effect that he should have right to the said sum in the event of his surviving her; (5) that the said Mary Dinwoodie or Carruthers died on 17th, and the said David Dinwoodie on 21st January 1895, and that in March 1895, when the present petition was presented, the aforesaid sum of £400 remained in the said bank on deposit: Find in law (1) that the said deposit-receipt does not import a gift absolute or conditional by either party named therein to the other, or a will by either in favour of the other, or affect their rights or the rights of their executors to the sums contributed by each as aforesaid; (2) that the pursuer, as executor of the said David Dinwoodie, is entitled to receive £50 of the said deposited money, and the defender, as executor of the said Mary Dinwoodie or Carruthers, to receive the remaining £350 thereof: Therefore repel the first, second," and other "pleas in law for the pursuer Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the petition Find the pursuer, as executor of said David Dinwoodie entitled to £50, with the interest due thereon, and find the defender, as executor of Mrs Mary Dinwoodie or Carruthers, entitled to the balance of £350 of said deposit-receipt, with the interest due thereon: Ordain the Clerk of the Sheriff Court to make payment to them accordingly," &c.

No. 51.

Dec. 6, 1895.
Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor.

BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—BUCHAN & BUCHAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 52.

OLIVER HILSON, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Balfour—Watt.
GEORGE SCOTT, Respondent.—W. Campbell—M'Lennan.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

Property—Mill-lade—Title—Disposition a non domino—Prescription.—A mill-lade from the River Jed supplied two mills belonging to one proprietor, of which the Abbey Mill was the upper and the Waulk Mill the lower. The mills were sold in 1845 to separate persons, A and B, in a process of ranking and sale. By the decree the Lords sold and adjudged to B the Waulk Mill and the mill lands, "and particularly the mill-lade," and they found and declared that A and B, the "purchasers of the two mills, have a joint pro indiviso right of property in the mill-lade thereof." B obtained from the superior of the mills and mill lands a charter in terms of the decree, and was infeft thereon in 1846, and the mill-lade was subsequently possessed along with the mills. Part of the mill-lade had been made on half of the bed of the river, belonging to C, a riparian proprietor. C did not object to this, and he and his successors continued to use the water of the river by drawing it from the lade.

In a suspension and interdict brought in 1894 by the proprietor of the Waulk Mill against C's successor to prevent him from discharging sewage into the lade, the above facts were proved.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) (1) that the conveyance of the mill-lade in the decree of sale and in the subsequent charter imported a conveyance quoad C's land, not of a right of servitude, but of the lade itself and of the ground necessary for its support; (2) that the possession which had followed upon this title for the prescriptive period was sufficient to give B an exclusive right of property in the lade and in the ground supporting it as against C's successor, and that B was entitled to interdict.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

THE Magistrates of Jedburgh were proprietors of two mills on the Water of Jed, of which the upper was called the Abbey Mill and the lower the Waulk Mill. In 1835 the weir and intake of the mill-lade were carried away by a flood, and the magistrates rebuilt them further up the stream. They constructed the new part of the mill-lade on the bed of the river within the lands of Thomas Millar. Millar made no objection to this.

In 1845 the town of Jedburgh was in pecuniary difficulties, and the magistrates obtained a private Act of Parliament for the sale of the town property. Under a ranking and sale the upper or Abbey Mill was sold to Robert Laing, and the lower or Waulk Mill was sold to George Hilson, manufacturer in Jedburgh.

By the decree of sale the subjects sold and adjudged to Robert Laing were thus described:—"All and whole that corn mill of Jedburgh commonly called the Abbey Mill, with the whole machinery thereof, and the waterfall, damhead, sluices, and other works thereof, and all and sundry multures, sequels, mill lands, particularly that portion of the ground or embankment lying to the east of the said mill, and between the mill-lead and the Water of Jed, and extending downwards from the said mill to the waste-water sluice in the side of the lead

No. 52.
Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

between the said mill and the Waulk Mill, and the houses, biggings, yards, and the whole parts and pertinents thereof, all as presently occupied by William Dodd, the tenant therein."

The decree of sale thus described the subjects sold and adjudged to George Hilson:—"All and whole the mill commonly called the Waulk Mill of Jedburgh, with the machinery-house and whole machinery thereof, and the waterfall, damhead, sluices, and other works thereto belonging, and mill lands, and particularly the mill-lead and that portion of ground or embankment lying to the west of the said mill, and between the mill-lead and the Water of Jed, and extending upwards from said mill to and including the waste-water sluice in the side of the lead between the said mill and the Abbey Mill, and the houses, biggings, yards, and whole parts and pertinents pertaining thereto, all as presently occupied by Messrs James and George Hilson, the tenants thereof."

With regard to both subjects the decree contained the following findings:—"Find and declare that the said Robert Laing and George Hilson, purchasers of the Abbey Mill and Waulk Mill, being lots first and second, have a joint pro indiviso right of property in the waterfall, damhead or cauld, sluices, and mill-lead thereof, subject always to the conditions as to keeping up, maintaining, and upholding the same, and cleaning the mill-lead, which apply and are stipulated for during the currency of Messrs Hilson's lease of the Waulk Mill, and after the expiry of the said lease then the said purchaser of said mills shall be bound to keep up, maintain, and uphold the said damhead or cauld and sluice, and clean out the said mill-lead down to the said waste-water sluice between the said mills at their mutual expense."

George Hilson conveyed the subjects purchased to his brother James and himself equally between them by disposition and assignation dated 9th December 1845, and their title was completed by charter of sale and confirmation by James Grieve, superior of the subjects, and instrument of sasine thereon, dated 5th May 1846. The superior's charter disponed the Waulk Mill subjects in the same terms as contained in the decree of ranking and sale. The charter confirmed a disposition of the subjects, dated 4th April 1818, in favour of the Magistrates of Jedburgh and the instrument of sasine thereon. This disposition constituted the title of the magistrates at the date of the decree of sale, and it thus described the subjects sold:—"All and whole these three corn mills of Jedburgh, commonly called the Abbey Mill, Town Mill, and Easter Mill, with the Waulk Mill of Jedburgh, and all and sundry multures, sequels, mill lands, houses, biggings, yards, and whole parts and pertinents thereof respectively."

George and James Hilson continued to work the mill and to use the mill-lade, which subsequently came into the possession of Oliver Hilson, manufacturer.

The lands belonging to Thomas Millar, opposite the mill-lade constructed by the magistrates, were held under burgage tenure, and were described in an instrument of sasine in favour of Millar of 14th October 1825 as "bounded by the Water of Jed on the south." Millar and his successors used the water of the river for various purposes by drawing it from the lade. For this purpose some steps were formed in their property down to the level of the lade.

In 1893 George Scott, Millar's successor in the lands, built a house

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

and constructed a drain, through which he proposed to discharge sewage into the mill-lade above the Waulk Mill. Oliver Hilson then brought this action of suspension and interdict to prevent him from doing so.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The complainer being proprietor or joint proprietor of the mill-lade referred to as condescended on, and the respondent having no right or interest therein, the complainer is entitled to interdict as craved. (2) The complainer and his predecessors in title having used the water of the said lade for the purposes of their manufactures for over forty years, for which the said water has all along been fit, and as the discharge of sewerage, &c., by the respondent into the lade would make the water unfit for these purposes, the complainer is entitled to interdict, with expenses.*

The respondent averred, with regard to the new part of the lade formed by the magistrates,—"Said extension was formed by encroaching on the property of the respondent's predecessors in title and of the conterminous proprietors, cutting a channel through said properties, and forming an embankment between said channel and the course to which the river was subsequently confined. Said embankment was erected in that half of the original river bed lying between the lands of the respondent and his conterminous proprietors and the medium filum of the river. The said proceedings were taken without any sanction or authority being sought or obtained by the magistrates and town-council from the respondent's authors or from any of the said other proprietors, and constituted an unwarranted interference with their proprietorial rights. By the said proceedings the respondent's authors became the proprietors of the said mill-lade, solum thereof, and embankment separating the mill-lade from the river bed, all so far as ex adverso of their said lands respectively, subject to a servitude in favour of the magistrates and council of permitting the water to flow through the said lade as if in a natural channel passing through their lands."

The respondent pleaded;—(1) No title to sue, and, separatim, title to exclude. (3) The complainer not having had prescriptive possession of the mill-lade referred to upon a habile title, and separatim, the respondent and his authors having had a clear and exclusive title to the said lade so far as ex adverso of the respondent's lands, followed by uninterrupted possession of the said lade for upwards of forty years, the note of suspension and interdict should be refused, with expenses.

On 28th June 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds (1) that by virtue of the titles produced, and the possession admittedly following thereon, the complainer has, along with the proprietors of the Abbey Mill of Jedburgh, a joint pro indiviso right of property in the mill-lade set forth and described in the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict ex adverso of the respondent's property; (2) that it is admitted that the respondent has constructed or laid a drain or pipe for the purpose of discharging, or adapted for the purpose of discharge of, sewage from a house or houses recently erected by him on his pro-

* The complainer subsequently by minute admitted for the purposes of the suspension, that the proposed discharge of sewage from the house recently erected by the respondent would not unfit the water for the purposes for which he had used it for the last forty years, or prejudice his manufacturing processes.

No. 52.
Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

perty into the said mill-lade; (3) that the respondent is not entitled to discharge sewage or other matter into the said lade by means of pipes or drains: Therefore, to the above extent and effect sustains the complainer's pleas in law, suspends the proceedings complained of, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the respondent, and all others acting by his authority, from sending or discharging into the said mill-lade sewerage or any other impure stuff or matter of any kind, or impure liquid or water by means of pipes or drains."*

* "OPINION.— . . . By the decree, as I construe it, George Hilson acquired in property the mill-lead and its south-eastern embankment as far up the lead as the waste-water sluice between his mill and the Abbey Mill. He also ex facie of the decree acquired a pro indiviso right of property along with Robert Laing to the mill-lead from the place where it leaves the river down to the waste-water sluice. Further, it is not disputed that the Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill have all along been in operation, and that the mill-lade has supplied them with water power, and with water for purposes of manufacture. That appears to me to amount to possession, and it has continued for more than forty years upon the titles which I have described.

"The history of the mill-lade, as given by the respondent, is as follows:— Prior to 1835 the cauld and intake of the lade were lower down the stream than at present, and at a point below the respondent's property. In that year the cauld was destroyed by a flood, and the town-council made the present cauld, which is above the respondent's property, and also the part of the mill-lade which is now in dispute.

"The respondent avers that the extension of the mill-lade was 'formed by encroaching on the property of the respondent's predecessors in title, and of the conterminous proprietors, cutting a channel through said properties and forming an embankment between said channel and the course to which the river was subsequently confined. . . . The said proceedings were taken without any sanction or authority being sought or obtained by the magistrates and town-council from the respondent's authors, or from any of the said other proprietors, and constituted an unwarranted interference with their proprietorial rights.'

"The respondent's averment that the extension of the mill-lade was formed upon his property is founded upon the fact that in his titles the property is described as bounded on the south by 'the Water of Jed.' Such a boundary presumably carries the property to the medium filum of the stream, and the extension of the mill-lade was formed upon what had previously been the bed of the stream, and upon the respondent's side of the central line. That that was the case was stated by the respondent's counsel, and is shewn by a comparison of the plans to which he refers in his statement and has produced. When the old cauld existed the water of the stream was of course dammed back, and covered a considerably greater area than it would have done if there had been no cauld and no damhead, and when the old cauld was swept away and a new one erected higher up the stream, the town-council constructed the extension of the mill-lade upon ground which had previously been covered by the waters of the damhead.

"The respondent's contention is that the complainer's right must be regarded as a right of servitude only, and that he can deal with his property as he likes, unless the complainer can shew that his servitude rights are being prejudiced. I am not sure that the case presented by the complainer on his titles is necessarily exclusive of the idea that the respondent's lands are only burdened with a servitude. There might, I imagine, be a servitude of aqueduct with a right of property on the part of the owner of the dominant tenement in the pipe, drain, or other opus manufactum by which the servitude was made available. Indeed, in the case of the Scottish Distillery Company v. Reid (4 R. 1118), Lord Gifford expressed the opinion

No. 52.
Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The decree of sale did not convey to the complainer the mill-lade. (2) The respondent's titles, which prescribed the river as his south boundary, carried his property to the medium filum of the river. (3) The Lord Ordinary was wrong in thinking that the respondent admitted that the complainer's possession could exclude his prior right. The complainer had only a title a non domino. The respondent, moreover, denied such possession, and the complainer could not shew, as he required to do, that the possession was adverse and exclusive.[1]

The respondent proposed to amend his statement as to the construction of the lade, by averring that the channel had been cut outside the river bed, and therefore unquestionably on his property.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and allowed the proposed amendment, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof.

The import of the proof appears from the Lord Ordinary's note.

On 20th July the Lord Ordinary refused the prayer of the note.*

---

that that position of matters was the natural result of a servitude of dam and aqueduct. But, however that may be, the words of the complainer's title are explicit. By the decree, and the charter and sasine following thereon, the complainer's authors were given 'a right of property' in the mill-lade, and there has been for more than forty years possession appropriate to the nature of the subject. But if the property of the mill-lade is in the complainer, the respondent is not entitled to construct a drain for the purpose of discharging sewage into it. . . .

"I decide no more than that the complainer has by his titles and admitted possession a right of property in the mill-lade itself—in the artificial channel by which the water is carried to his mill—and that the respondent was not entitled to construct a sewer to discharge into the mill-lade.

"I think, however, that the terms of the prayer of the note are too wide; at all events, I could not give interdict in such wide terms without inquiry. The prayer asks that the respondent should be interdicted from sending or discharging into the mill-lade sewerage or any other impure matter or stuff of any kind, or impure liquid or water. Now, upon the one hand, the complainer does not found upon any act of the respondent, except the construction of a sewer from the new houses which he has recently built, and, on the other hand, the respondent avers that the natural drainage of his land is towards the south, and that consequently a certain amount of impure matter has always naturally found its way into the lade.

"I therefore cannot do more than find that the respondent is not entitled to discharge sewage or other impure matter into the lade by means of drains or pipes, and grant interdict against such a use of the lade."

[1] Act 1617, c. 12; Campbell v. Duke of Argyll, May 19, 1836, 14 S. 798, 8 Scot. Jur. 358; Christison v. Hope, Nov. 18, 1847, 10 D. 111, 20 Scot. Jur. 29; Earl of Fife v. Sir John Sinclair, Nov. 28, 1849, 12 D. 223, 22 Scot. Jur. 38.

* OPINION.—(The Lord Ordinary, after stating that the evidence shewed that the lade had been constructed in the bed of the stream, and referring to the descriptions of the Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill contained in the decree of sale, continued)—"It is to be observed that in these descriptions there is no mention of the part of the mill-lade now in question,—that is to say, the portion above the Abbey Mill—the only part of the mill-lade sold and adjudged being that lying between the Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill.

"The Town Mill and the East Mill were both sold and adjudged, 'with the waterfall, damhead, sluices, and other works thereof . . . and

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895. Hilson v. Scott.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The mill-lade was conveyed to him expressly. The whole mill-lade belonged to him, if not exclusively, at least pro indiviso with the Abbey Mill proprietor. (2) Even although the magistrates had no title to sell the lade, the complainer could acquire a right by prescription on recorded title. (3) The presumption of the respondent's right extending to the medium filum was lessened by his silence in 1835, when he permitted the magistrates to invade what he now declared his property. (4) The complainer had had as full possession as he required. (5) At least the complainer had a servitude in the lade, and through this a right in the opus manufactum, including the solum and walls. He was therefore entitled to object to the drain-pipe,[1] and that although the quantity of sewage taken by itself would not cause material increase of pollution in the lade.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The Lord Ordinary's judgment was sound. The titles of the respondent and of the adjoining proprietors made it clear that along the extended part of the lade the subjects had been held burgage, and had been bounded by the Water of Jed. Such a boundary raised a strong presumption that the grant whole parts and pertinents,' without any special mention of the lade upon which they are situated.

---

"The decree, after decrees of sale applicable to each of the properties which were sold, contains various declaratory findings of the rights of the various purchasers in regard to the lades and damheads, and it is among these that the declaration in regard to the right of property in the part of the lade in dispute upon which the complainer's case is rested is to be found.

"It is first declared that Laing, the purchaser of the Abbey Mill, is to have right to remove certain machinery which had been used to drive water into the town reservoirs. There is then the declaration upon which the complainer relies. It is in the following terms:—'Find and declare that the said Robert Laing and George Hilson, purchasers of the Abbey Mill and Waulk Mill, being lots first and second, have a joint pro indiviso right of property in the waterfall, damhead or cauld, sluices, and mill-lead thereof, subject always to the conditions as to keeping up, maintaining, and upholding the same, and cleaning the mill-lead, which apply and are stipulated for during the currency of Messrs Hilson's lease of the Waulk Mill, and after the expiry of the said lease then the said purchaser of said mills shall be bound to keep up, maintain, and uphold the said damhead or cauld and sluices, and clean out the said mill-lead down to the said waste-water sluice between the said mills at their mutual expense.'

"I think that it is clear that the part of the mill-lade there referred to includes that in dispute, namely, between the cauld and the Abbey Mill, because Laing and Hilson are to maintain the cauld and to clean out the 'said mill-lead down to the said waste-water sluice,' which is below the Abbey Mill.

"It is then declared in the decree that Laing shall not, by lowering the sluices, obstruct the flow of water down to the Waulk Mill, and that Hilson shall not, by raising the backfall, interfere with the free run of the water from the Abbey Mill.

"There are then declarations in regard to the East Mill and the Town Mill similar to these to which I have referred in regard to the Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill. . . .

"I have referred to the decree at length, because I think that it is of importance to observe that the declaration in regard to the right of property

---

[1] Scottish Highland Distillery Co. v. Reid, July 7, 1877, 4 R. 1118.

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

extended to the medium filum, and no attempt had been made to rebut this presumption.[1] The riparian proprietors had had no interest to object to the extension of the lade in 1835, because the stream flowing through the lade was more useful to them than the former mill-dam. The effect of the extension was to constitute in the millowners a servitude of aqueduct, precisely corresponding to the right which an ordinary inferior heritor had against an ordinary superior heritor, to insist on the water in a natural stream flowing through their lands being transmitted undiminished in quantity and quality. The decree of sale of 1845 was clearly a non domino so far as it purported to confer any right of property in the mill-lade ex adverso of the respondent's lands. The Lord Ordinary was therefore justified in subjecting the decree of sale and the charter following thereon to a strict construction, and his construction was sound. The complainer's right, however, depended, not on the decree of sale, but on the charter of sale and confirmation in 1846. This charter was a charter by progress, and was therefore incapable of extending the vassal's right. It contained no doubt the new description of the

---

in the upper part of the mill-lade is not introduced in what I may call the dispositive part of the decree, but in the part which deals with the rights inter se of the purchasers of the properties situated upon and more or less interested in one or other of the mill-lades.

"Passing now to the way in which George Hilson made up his title under the decree of sale. He first disponed the subjects to himself and his brother James, upon the narrative that he had made the purchase for his brother as well as for himself; and then the brothers obtained a charter of confirmation and sale from James Grieve, the superior of the lands. George and James Hilson took sasine upon that charter, which forms the first writ in the prescriptive progress upon which the complainer founds.

"The charter follows precisely the terms of the decree. The superior dispones the mill with the machinery, and so forth, in the words used in what I have called the dispositive part of the decree; and then it is declared that 'these presents are granted under the whole declarations . . . referred to in the decree of sale,' and then the declarations—including that in regard to the joint right of property in the mill-lade—are repeated.

"Now, I have already said that the respondent's property was held burgage, and that also seems to be the tenure by which nearly all the properties upon the north side of the stream above the Abbey Mill were held. The Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill, on the other hand, were held by the magistrates in feu of Grieve as subject superior. The magistrates therefore had no title to sell, and Grieve had no title to dispone the mill-lade above the Abbey Mill, so far as the ground upon which it was constructed was concerned. Of course, if the charter unequivocally dispones the solum upon which the mill-lade is constructed, and possession has been had upon it for forty years, the complainer's right cannot be affected by shewing that it was originally granted a non domino. But if the charter is open to construction, then I think that it is competent to inquire into the state of the title, and the circumstances when it was granted.

"Here I think that the charter is open to construction. The upper part of the mill-lade is not part of the subjects disponed, but is only mentioned in the declarations and restrictions subject to which the disposition is

---

[1] Bicket v. Morris, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. (H. L.) 44, 38 Scot. Jur. 547; M'Intyre's Trustees v. Magistrates of Cupar-Fife, May 24, 1867, 5 Macph. 780, 39 Scot. Jur. 402; Gibson v. Bonnington Sugar Refinery Co., Jan. 20, 1869, 7 Macph. 394.

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

subjects taken from the decree of sale, but it also defined the subjects conveyed as forming part of the subjects contained in the older titles, which negatived any right of property in the mill-lade.[1] Infeftment, in order to found a prescriptive right, required to be taken in the appropriate Register of Sasines—Conveyancing Act of 1874, section 34. The mill-lade in question being held burgage, the complainer's sasine, recorded only in the feudal register, was inept. In 1846 sasine in burgage subjects still required to be recorded in the burgh register within sixty days of its date—Act 1681, cap. 11.

(2) Even if the complainer's title was a good foundation for prescription, his right was not fortified by adverse and exclusive possession. His operations were equally consistent with property or servitude, and in dubio servitude was to be preferred. Rights of property could not be taken away by equivocal acts of possession. Here the original proprietors had continued to exercise rights which were equally consistent either with property or with servitude, and in the circumstances these must be regarded as a continued assertion of proprietorial rights, and not as servitudes acquired from the complainer at granted. In other words, the disponees are declared to have a joint right of property in a part of the lade which is not disponed to them.

---

"Further, from the nature of the subject, the right of property which is declared is not necessarily a right of property in the solum. A mill-lade involves an artificially constructed channel, and I do not think that the declaration in the charter necessarily refers to more than the artificial channel. If there was a servitude of mill-lade over lands other than those disponed, of which the two mills were the dominant tenement, it is quite intelligible that the respective owners of the mills should be declared to have, as between themselves, a joint right of property in the mill-lade, that is in the artificial channel by means of which the water was conveyed to their mills. And so to construe the declaration is the only construction of the charter which can be at all reconciled with the circumstances which existed at the time.

"I do not say that the magistrates had a valid right to a servitude of mill-lade, because they were not entitled at their own hand to substitute a mill-lade for a mill-dam. But they had in fact done so, and for ten years the mill-lade had been in use. It is therefore intelligible that they should have exposed the mills for sale upon the footing that the servitude of mill-lade would pass with them, and also such right as the owner of the dominant tenement in a servitude of the kind has in opera manufacta by which the servitude is made available.

"Reading the charter, therefore, in the light of the circumstances under which it was granted, I am of opinion that it was not intended to convey, and does not convey, the lands upon which the lade is constructed.

"The next question is, What has been the possession which the complainer and his authors have had upon the charter? They have had the use of the water coming down the mill-lade for the purposes of their mill, and they have cleaned out the lade and kept it free of obstructions. No other or further acts of possession have been proved. Now there is nothing in that possession going beyond what would be naturally referable to a right of servitude, and I do not think that the possession has been exclusive of the right of the respondent and the other riparian proprietors, whose titles, ex facie, carry them ad medium filum. Further, it is proved that the proprietors along the side of the lade had steps down to it which they used for

---

[1] Hutton v. Macfarlane, Nov. 11, 1863, 2 Macph. 79, per Lord Neaves, 88, 36 Scot. Jur. 33; Boyd v. Bruce, Dec. 20, 1872, 11 Macph. 243, 45 Scot. Jur. 153.

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

a time when ex hypothesi he was himself prescribing a right of property. The use of a running stream was res meræ facultatis, and the property in it could not be lost merely because the owner did not exercise his right to the full extent of which it was capable. Assuming the case to be one of servitude, the respondent was entitled to succeed, because the drain-pipe in question did not pierce the wall of the lade, but was merely rested on the top of it. Further, the servitude in the present instance did not give the complainer any right in the retaining-walls or solum of the lade, or in the water itself. The extent of the dominant proprietor's right in a case of aqueduct depended on the special circumstances of the case, and here the proof shewed that the complainer's authors had done nothing beyond building a retaining-wall between the lade and the bed of the river. The retaining-wall along the landward back of the lade was the old retaining-wall which existed before the lade was constructed, and it remained the property of the riparian proprietors.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The subject which is here in question being the mill-lade and the appurtenances of the mill-lade entering from the Jed into an intake above the Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill of Jedburgh, was dealt with in a process of ranking and sale in the year 1845. By the decree of sale the Lords "sold, adjudged, decerned, and declared, and hereby sell, adjudge, decern, and declare lot second, all and whole the mill commonly called the Waulk Mill of Jedburgh, with the machinery-house and whole machinery thereof, and the waterfall, damhead, sluices, and other works thereto belonging, and mill-lands, and particularly the mill-lead and that portion of ground or embankment lying to the west of the said mill and between the mill-lead and the Water of Jed, and extending upwards from said mill to and including the waste-water sluice in the side of the lead between the said mill and the Abbey Mill, . . . to pertain and belong to George Hilson," manufacturer in Jedburgh. Now, that was a conveyance in language which, in my opinion, does not admit of any doubt as to its meaning. It is prefixed by the word "particularly" as regards the purpose of drawing water. That is what one would have expected to find if the mill-lade was a servitude, but not if it was altogether outside the properties adjoining it.

---

"I am therefore of opinion that the complainer is not proprietor of the solum upon which the mill-lade is constructed, and that the lade is only a servitude with which the lands through which it passes are burdened.

"The remaining question is, Whether, in these circumstances, the complainer has a right to object to the drain which the respondent has made from the new house which he has built?

"Now, it is proved that the drain does not cut through, or in any way interfere with, the sides of the lade, but is entirely within the respondent's lands. It is true that any sewage which is discharged from the drain will find its way, by the natural slope of the ground, into the lade; and there is no doubt that the respondent had that in view when he constructed the drain. But the complainer does not now say that he will be injured thereby. He has led no evidence in support of his averments of pollution, but stands entirely upon his claim of property, which, for the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion is not well founded.

"In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the complainer is not entitled to the interdict which he asks."

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

this subject, and is a conveyance of the mill-lade mentioned. That is, as I hold it, a conveyance of the ground, and such works on the ground as are essential for the establishment and working of a mill-lade, and applicable to the mill in question. It is contended that that is not so, that the conveyance has not the effect of a conveyance of the mill-lade throughout its extent as described, because there is a declaration afterwards that Robert Laing and Hilson together, the purchasers of the Abbey Mill and the Waulk Mill respectively, "have a joint pro indiviso right of property in the waterfall, damhead or cauld, sluices, and mill-lead thereof."

It does not appear to me that this declaration is at all in conflict with the conveyance of the property to Messrs Hilson. It is declaratory and for an obvious purpose. The other owner of the mill interposed between the intake and the complainer's mill necessarily had a right and interest in the mill-lade, in so far as it was necessary for the purpose of bringing water down to his mill, and down below his mill, for his tail-race. That he had not some right in that mill-lade as long as his mill was there is not a question which could be argued, and it is a pro indiviso right to the mill-lade, therefore, which is conveyed to Hilson. The mill-lade of Hilson's mill is plainly and necessarily the mill-lade from its intake down to his mill, because otherwise he could not get the benefit of the water. Hilson's title covers the whole lade, and infeftment followed upon that conveyance with all uses such as property of that kind is capable of. Now, a joint pro indiviso right of property does not interfere with his having that title. It is quite plain that if at any time the Abbey Mill came to be disused or to be pulled down, or for any reason not to be carried on, then the only interest in the mill-lade and its use would be the interest of the complainer Hilson. Well, then, this declaration of a pro indiviso right is given most properly in the interest of the owner of the mill that was interposed, but the respondent has no concern with the question who is the proprietor of the mill-lade from its intake to its final entry into the river again. The proprietor gets the property in the lade and all that belonged to it as necessary for the use which was to be made. Now, that being so, the question between the complainer and the respondent in this case is, whether the respondent has a right to discharge into that mill-lade sewage from his property. Mr Hilson has possessed beyond the prescriptive period upon his infeftment, and I am of opinion that the respondent in the action of interdict has no right to interfere with that mill-lade by discharging into it any sewage from his property. I cannot see upon what ground he can maintain his right to do so. The complainer has a substantial interest to prevent it, and although it may not be in question whether what is done by this respondent, or proposed to be done by this respondent, might be a substantial injury to Mr Hilson in the use of his mill at present, he is entitled to prevent the mill-lade being used in such a way, because the respondent has no right to do it. It is obvious that if this respondent has the right to do it merely because he is not at present doing any tangible damage, he might be preparing the way for damage, because it is always an accumulation of such matter as it is proposed to put into the stream that is ultimately injurious, and makes the stream unfit for the purposes for which the party below has the right to use it. If the respondent has no right to put sewage into the stream, as he has been doing, it is proper that he should be interdicted, because he is discharging into the property of another that which he has no right to discharge.

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

Upon the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that Mr Hilson is right in his contention in this case, and that we should grant him the interdict which he asks.

LORD ADAM.—In the year 1835 the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Jedburgh were proprietors of two mills on the Water of Jed, one called the Abbey Mill and the other called the Waulk Mill. In that year it appears that a flood carried away the existing damhead and other works connected with these mills. In that same year the town of Jedburgh, as I may say for shortness, rebuilt the damhead at a distance of some 300 or 400 feet further up the Water of Jed, and they continued the then existing mill-lade also further up the Water of Jed, to the new damhead. Now, in constructing this mill-lade they constructed it upon the bed of the river, and, so constructed, it passed ex adverso of the respondent's property, then belonging to the respondent's predecessor,—I have no doubt, as it appears from the titles that the respondent's property was described as bounded by the River Jed, that that carried his right of property ad medium filum,—and consequently the Provost and Magistrates of Jedburgh, in taking possession of this property for the construction of this new mill-lade, took part of his property and constructed the walls of the new mill-lade upon it. I see no reason to doubt, from anything that appears in this process, that in so doing the Provost and Magistrates of Jedburgh were doing what they had no right to do; and I should have had little doubt that, if the predecessors of the respondent had chosen to interfere at the time, the Provost and Magistrates of Jedburgh might have been prevented from constructing this mill-lade as they did; but all that took place so long ago as 1835, which is sixty years ago.

Now, matters continued in that state from the year 1835 down to the year 1845. Beyond all doubt the town of Jedburgh was in possession of the new damhead and the whole of the mill-lade, including the new part of it, down to the year 1845. The town seems about that time to have got into pecuniary difficulties, and I see from the decree of sale, which is produced, that they got a private Act of Parliament for the sale of the town property; and accordingly, among other parts of the town property that was sold under a ranking and sale, were those two mills, the upper, or Abbey Mill, being sold to Mr Laing, and the lower, or Waulk Mill, being sold to the predecessors of the present suspender, Mr Hilson. We have here the decree of sale, which was pronounced in that action, and it sets forth the proceedings and the subjects sold. With reference to the Abbey Mill, which is higher up upon the same mill-lade, it finds that this Mr Laing had offered for it, and so on, and then the Lords find and decern that it should belong to him. These are the terms in which it is decerned and declared to belong to him:—"Therefore, and in respect the said Robert Laing has found caution in terms of the said articles, the said Lords sold, adjudged, decerned, and declared, and hereby sell, adjudge, decern, and declare lot first, all and whole that corn-mill of Jedburgh, commonly called the Abbey Mill, with the whole machinery thereof, and the waterfall, dam-

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Hilson v. Scott.

head, sluices, and other works thereof, and all and sundry multures, sequels, and mill-lands, and particularly that portion of ground or embankment lying to the east of the said mill, and between the mill-lead and the Water of Jed, and extending downwards from the said mill to the waste-water sluice," and so on. Then it goes on, "and the whole parts and pertinents thereof, all as at present occupied by William Dodd, the tenant therein." That is not the conveyance of the mill with which we are directly concerned, but there, although there is no specific nominatim conveyance of the mill-lade as in the present case, to which I shall immediately refer, there is a conveyance of the mill and "the whole machinery, waterfall, damhead, sluices, and other works thereof, . . . with the whole parts and pertinents thereof, all as presently occupied by William Dodd, the tenant therein." There is no doubt whatever, and it is not disputed, that at the date of this conveyance the whole mill-lade was occupied by the tenant of the magistrates in the mill, and I should have thought that the general word "works," followed by a proof of possession, such as there is in this case by the tenants of the mill, would have been sufficient to shew that the mill-lade was intended to be carried. I make that remark in passing, because it serves to explain the terms of this decree.

Then when we come to the conveyance of the mill which we have more particularly to deal with, the decree sets forth:—"Therefore, and in respect that at the said sale the said George Hilson, having offered for lot second of the said subjects," a certain price, the Lords "hereby sell, adjudge, decern, and declare lot second, all and whole the mill commonly called the Waulk Mill of Jedburgh, with the machinery-house and whole machinery thereof, and the waterfall, damhead, sluices, and other works thereto belonging, and mill lands, and particularly the mill-lead and that portion of ground or embankment lying to the west of the said mill, and between the mill-lead and the Water of Jed, and extending upwards from said mill to and including the waste-water sluice in the side of the lead, between the said mill and the Abbey Mill, and the houses," and so on, "all as presently occupied by Messrs James and George Hilson, the tenants thereof." These are the terms in which these subjects were decerned to belong to the present suspender's predecessor. Now, it will be observed that there is here, differing from the other case, an express conveyance in favour of Mr Hilson of the mill-lade. I should have thought that was very clear—that it means what it says—the mill-lade. The Lord Ordinary does not take that view. He says, in stating his view upon the construction of that clause,—"By the decree, as I construe it, George Hilson acquired in property the mill-lead and its southern embankment as far up the lead as the waste-water sluice between his mill and the Abbey Mill." I do not see any other way in which he could arrive at that conclusion on the construction of this clause, than by holding that the description "that portion of ground or embankment lying to the west of the said mill, and between the mill-lead and the water of Jed," applies to the mill-lade as well as to that portion of ground.

I think that is an impossible reading, because if you consider for a moment how the description would read, it would be in this way,—"And particularly the mill-lade lying between the mill-lade and the Water of Jed, and extending upwards from said mill," and so on. Now, how can you convey a subject and describe it as bounded by itself? Yet that is the result of the Lord Ordinary's construction of this clause. I say that cannot possibly be the reading. The real reading is just what the deed itself says, that it is a conveyance of the mill-lade, and of that particular portion of ground or embankment lying to the west of the mill, and between the mill-lade and the Water of Jed. Therefore I have not any doubt, upon the construction of this decree, that it is a conveyance of the whole of the mill-lade nominatim. Had there been any doubt about that, it would have been cleared up by the last words, because the subjects are conveyed "all as presently occupied by Messrs James and George Hilson, the tenants thereof," and it is perfectly obvious in this case that those subjects, one and all of them, and the whole of the mill-lade, were occupied and possessed by the tenants thereof, James and George Hilson. Therefore I have no doubt, upon the construction of this deed, that it was a decerniture in favour of the purchaser of the whole of the mill-lade. And that explains how this subsequent declaration which is put in came to be there, whereby the Lords "find and declare that the said Robert Laing and George Hilson, purchasers of the Abbey Mill and Waulk Mill, being lots first and second, have a joint pro indiviso right of property in the waterfall, damhead or cauld, sluices, and mill-lead thereof."

Now, I think that is very bad conveyancing. I think the proper way to do it would have been to decern and declare that they were each pro indiviso proprietors of the mill-lade. That would have been the proper form of conveyance, but it does not the least interfere with the proper construction of this deed, viz., that to each of them is given ex facie a right to the whole; and then it is explained that although ex facie each of those two purchasers has a right to the whole of the mill-lade, yet as between themselves the right is merely a pro indiviso right. That being so, the deed goes on with certain provisions as to how this mill-lade is to be regulated as between the two proprietors of it. That is the whole deed. I pointed out before, in my construction of the conveyance to Laing, that it amounted to a conveyance in property, and that, although the mill-lade was not particularly conveyed, still, as explained by proof of possession, it came to the same thing. And that is why I said just now that by this decree both the purchaser of the Abbey Mill and the purchaser of the Waulk Mill were declared to be proprietors, and then that the decree declared that their real rights as between themselves were pro indiviso rights to the whole. Well, if that be so, that explained the conveyancing—not good conveyancing in my opinion—in questions between the two proprietors, with which third parties have nothing to do. If I am wrong in thinking that the conveyance to Mr Laing was a conveyance of the property of the mill-lade, then the only result is that there is the undoubted possession ever since of the whole in favour of Mr Hilson. That would be the only result as concerns third parties. If I am right in so construing the decree, there is decerned to belong to Mr Hilson's predecessor the mill-lade in property.

Then Mr Hilson's predecessor proceeds to make up his title. I need not go into the detail of it; but he conveys to himself and his brother, and they obtain a charter from the alleged superior, under which they take infeftment, and that infeftment is recorded on 5th May 1846. I shall not enter into the particulars of that, because the description of the subjects in it is identical with that in the decree of sale, upon which I have been commenting. Now, at the date of this charter and sasine in favour of Mr Hilson's predecessor in 1845 there is, so far as I can see, no reason to doubt, in so far as regarded this piece of the mill-lade in question, namely, the new bit which had been constructed ten years before opposite the respondent's property, that the grant flowed a non habente potestatem. The property on which it was constructed does not appear to have belonged to the Magistrates of Jedburgh, and therefore this title which Mr Hilson's predecessor made up in 1845 is not valid unless it is fortified by possession and prescription. But there is no doubt that he and his predecessors have had uninterrupted possession of this mill-lade during the whole of the time since 1845; and that disposes of any objection to their title on the ground that it proceeded a non habente potestatem.

No. 52.

Dec. 7, 1895. Hilson v. Scott.

But then the question remains behind—What is the effect of this conveyance of the mill-lade as regards other persons? I beg to point out that the suspender's charter professes to convey the right of property. There is no doubt about that. It does not profess to convey a right of servitude or any minor right whatever. It professes to convey a complete right of property to Mr Hilson's predecessor. Now, is there anything in our law which should prevent a disposition of such a subject as a mill-lade, a permanent construction, an opus manufactum—it may be on another man's ground—becoming a subject of conveyance in property? I can see none. It may be a question what is the effect of that conveyance in some respects, but that it is a good conveyance of the opus manufactum, the mill-lade, I see no reason whatever to doubt. Whether that would convey the solum of the ground, so taken possession of for the purpose of the construction of this mill-lade, a cœlo ad centrum I do not know that it is necessary to inquire. If I had to express an opinion, I should be disposed to think that it did, but that is not necessary for the decision of this case. That it is a conveyance of the whole opus manufactum as well as the ground necessary for its support, and of the ground in all time coming, I see no reason to doubt, nor do I see where the difficulty lies in law. Therefore, I say, it humbly appears to me that this conveyance of the mill-lade to Mr Hilson's predecessor gives him an absolute right of property in the mill-lade.

Well, then, if that be so, if this mill-lade and the walls and embankments which were constructed to contain the water are his exclusive property, as I think they are, what right has anyone to interfere with them? Nobody has a right to pierce these walls as was proposed by Mr Scott, and to put sewage in the lade, because that is an interference with private property. This is not a case of servitude. The water is no longer flowing in its natural channel. It may be, in a certain sense, flowing very much in situ where it was before, but it is no longer flowing in the natural channel. It is flowing in an artificial channel, in a channel which is the private property of other people, and the water itself has been appropriated and applied to the private uses and purposes of other people. It is in my view just as much while it is so confined within the channel belonging to Mr Hilson his property, and applied to his uses, as if it was flowing in an iron pipe which he had laid down upon the ground. Well, if that be so, what right has any third party to interfere by putting a quantity of sewage or other matter into it? That is an interference, it appears to me, with private exclusive property which ought not to be tolerated. Therefore, in my view in this case, no question of amount of injury caused by the proposed proceedings arises. It may very well be that the parties along whose lands this mill-lade flows may, by taking water from it for forty years, or by using it in other ways for forty years, have upon their part acquired a servitude over it for certain purposes. That may very well be, and it may be that the respondent here has a right to take water from it in certain ways for certain purposes. I do not know, because no such questions are raised in this case. These being my views of the case, I come to the conclusion that we must reverse the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and, holding that this mill-lade is the property of the suspender, find that the respondent has no right to interfere with it by putting any sewage into it.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be recalled. By the decree of sale in 1845, and in that part of it which the Lord Ordinary calls the dispositive part, I find what is to all practical effects an unambiguous conveyance of the mill-lead in question. I think there is no room for any discussion as to whether that means only the opus manufactum erected on the soil, or the soil separate from the erection thereon. I think it is what it is called, the mill-lead, and that that includes at least both soil and erections so far as these are necessary and proper constituent parts of the thing itself. The subsequent part of the decree does not militate against this view. It contains a declarator that the owner of another mill shall "have a joint pro indiviso right of property" in the mill-lead. What right that declarator may give to the other mill owner is a question with which the defender has no concern. But one thing is clear from the declarator, namely, that whether joint or not, it is a right of property, not merely servitude, which the pursuer has in the mill-lead. The pursuer has been infeft in that right of property with the exclusive use appropriate to a proprietor for more than the prescriptive period, and I think he is entitled to interdict the defender, whose proceedings—the legality of which he maintains—are an invasion of the pursuer's rights.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and granted interdict as craved.

WINCHESTER & NICOLSON, S.S.C.—J. MURRAY LAWSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 53.

Dec. 7, 1895. Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans.

RUSSELL, HOPE, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Dickson—Mac Watt.

ALEXANDER PILLANS, Defender (Respondent).—Salvesen—T. B. Morison.

Process—Summons—Amendment—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 29.—The Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, enacts, —"The Court or the Lord Ordinary may at any time amend any error or defect in the record or issues in any action or proceeding in the Court of Session upon such terms as to expenses and otherwise as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made: Provided always that it shall not be competent by amendment of the record or issues under this Act to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading unless all the parties interested shall consent to such amendment."

A firm of iron-merchants raised an action against a rivet manufacturer, concluding for payment of (1) £175; (2) £172, 18s. 11d; (3) £23, 9s. 6d.; (4) £232, 8s. 10d.

In the condescendence the pursuers averred that the defender had entered into a contract to supply the pursuers with 100 tons of rivets, and that in consequence of the defender failing to implement his contract the pursuers had been unable to execute a contract they had made with a shipbuilding company to supply the same quantity of rivets, and had been found liable in an action to pay them the above sums (1) and (2) as damages and costs, and that the pursuers had also lost (3) £23, 9s. 6d., the profits they would have made on the two contracts, and (4) the amount of their solicitor's account in defending the action.

The Lord Ordinary having assoilzied the defender, the pursuers reclaimed, and craved leave to amend the summons by adding an alternative conclusion for payment of £300, and a statement that this sum was the difference between the market price of the rivets undelivered at the date when they should have been delivered, and the contract price.

Held (diss. Lord Adam) that the amendment was incompetent.

2D DIVISION. THIS action was raised by Russell, Hope, & Company, iron and steel merchants, Whitehaven, England, against Alexander Pillans, bolt and rivet manufacturer, Motherwell, concluding for payment of "(First) the sum of £175, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from the 31st day of July 1890; (second) the sum of £172, 18s. 11d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the 20th day of August 1890; (third) the sum of £23, 9s. 6d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation to follow hereon; and (fourth) the sum of £232, 8s. 10d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum also from the date of citation to follow hereon."

The pursuers' averments were to the following effect:—In April 1889 the defender had entered into a contract to supply them with 100 tons of rivets at £7, 15s. per ton, delivery to be made as required. The pursuers had previously entered into a contract to deliver to the Whitehaven Shipbuilding Company, Limited, 100 tons of rivets, at £8 per ton.

By reason of the defender's refusal to supply pursuers with said rivets, as he was bound to do under his contract with the pursuers, they were prevented making delivery to the said Whitehaven Shipbuilding Company, and thereby incurred serious liability to that company. No. 53.

Dec. 7, 1895. Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans.

An action was raised by the company against the present pursuers in the English Courts, and judgment pronounced against them for £175, being the amount first sued for in the present action. The present pursuers further paid to the said company the amount of their costs as taxed, £172, 18s., the sum second sued for. (Cond. 6) "The undelivered balance of rivets falling to be supplied by the defender is 93 tons 18 cwts. 2 lbs., the price of which, at £7, 15s. per ton, is £727, 14s. 7d. The price thereof payable by the said company to the pursuers at £8 per ton is £751, 4s. 1d., and the pursuers have suffered loss to the extent of the difference between the said two sums, or £23, 9s. 6d., which represents their loss of profit, and is the sum third sued for." (Cond. 7) "Further, the pursuers have paid to their own solicitors, Messrs Wright & Brown, Carlisle, the sum of £232, 10s. 8d., as the costs of defending the said action at the instance of the said company against the pursuers, being the sum fourth sued for."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender having failed to implement to the pursuers the contract libelled, is liable to the pursuers in reparation for breach thereof.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender.

The pursuers reclaimed, and presented a note to the Court asking to be allowed to amend their record (1) by adding to the conclusions of the summons "or otherwise to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £300, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation to follow hereon till payment," and by adding to the statement of the pursuers' loss in the condescendence the words "or otherwise the pursuers have suffered loss and damage to the amount of not less than the sum of £300 alternatively sued for, being the difference between the market price at or about 25th March 1890 and the contract price of the rivets then undelivered under said contract, being 93 tons 18 cwts. 2 lbs."

Argued for the pursuers;—The proposed amendment was competent, in respect that it was necessary to determine the real question in controversy between the parties, and that it did not subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or other fund or property than such as were specified in the original summons. The only questions in controversy between the parties were whether the defender was in breach of his contract with the pursuers, and if he was, what was the amount of the damages due for that breach of contract. The action, in short, was an action of damages for breach of contract, and the proposed amendment would not in any way deprive it of that character, but would merely enlarge the criteria which the Court might have in view in assessing the amount of damages. No larger sum was subjected to the adjudication of the Court, for the proposed new conclusion was alternative not cumulative, nor was any other fund or property, for the only fund or property in question was the sum due as damages to the pursuers, if any.[1] Assuming that the Court had a discretion to refuse to allow an amendment even if it were competent, the present amendment ought to be allowed. A proof had been led which was available in this action, but would not be available in another action.

[1] Stewart v. Stewart, 1877, and Shotts Iron Co. v. Turnbull, Salvesen, & Co., 1870, both not reported (Outer-House), but referred to in Mackay, Practice of the Court of Session, i. 485.

No. 53.

Dec. 7, 1895. Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans.

Argued for the defender;—The amendment was incompetent. It would have the effect of converting an action of relief into an action of damages, and so altered the question in controversy between the parties,[1] and it enlarged the conclusions of the summons by claiming a fund not originally concluded for. In any case the Court had a discretion as to allowing amendments, even if they were within the letter of the Act,[2] and that discretion ought to be exercised here by disallowing the amendment.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—This is an action for damages for breach of contract, the conclusions in which are of a very specific character. The ground of action is this: The pursuers entered into a contract with the defender for a supply of rivets to enable them (the pursuers) to fulfil a contract which they had made with a firm of shipbuilders. The latter contract was broken by the pursuers, and they were, in a litigation which ensued, found liable to the shipbuilding firm in a sum of £175 as damages, and in the costs of the litigation, which amounted to £172, 18s. 11d. They had also to pay the costs incurred by them to their own solicitor, which amounted to £232, 8s. 10d. The breach of contract which led to the pursuers requiring to pay these several sums is said to have arisen from the defender having broken his contract with the pursuers; and accordingly in this action there are specific conclusions that the defender should be decerned to make payment of these specific sums, and so reimburse the pursuers. There is a fourth conclusion under which decree is sought for £23, 9s. 6d., being the loss of profit (at the rate of 5s. per ton) suffered by the pursuers, who had contracted with the defender for rivets at £7, 15s. per ton, while they were entitled to £8 per ton for the same rivets from the shipbuilding firm. On the case thus stated the parties joined issue, and the result is that the Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender from the whole conclusions of the summons. The pursuers now propose to amend their summons by adding a new conclusion, alternatively to the existing four, to the effect that the defender should be decerned to pay a sum of £300, with a relative statement of fact that this is the difference between the contract price of the rivets and the price at which they could have been got in the market at the date of the alleged breach on the part of the defender. The pursuers support their motion to have this amendment allowed on the terms of the 29th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868. I am of opinion that the proposed amendment does not fall within the cases provided for by the section referred to, and that it should not be allowed.

The clause of the Act I have referred to distinctly provides that no amendment shall be competent which shall have the effect of submitting to the adjudication of the Court "any larger sum, or any other fund or property, than such as are specified in the summons." That, in my opinion, is what the pursuers propose to do. The original summons in this case concluded (on the grounds which I have already indicated) that the defender should be decerned to reimburse the pursuers in certain sums which [1] Forbes v. Watt's Trustee, Nov. 9, 1870, 9 Macph. 96; Laming & Co. v. Steater, June 21, 1889, 16 R. 828.

[2] Taylor v. Macdougall & Sons, July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1304.

No. 53.

Dec. 7, 1895.
Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans.

they had had to pay, not directly, but consequently upon the defender's breach of contract, as well as another sum of profit which they, in consequence of the same breach of contract, had been prevented from gaining. If the pursuers had got decree for these sums, they could have claimed nothing more on account of the alleged breach from the defender. The sums specially sued for were the measure and limit of their claim. But they propose now to turn this action into an action of damages founded on a different species facti, and for an amount to be ascertained by a totally different standard or criterion. They want now to make this action one for damages to the extent of £300 as due to them for breach of contract, arising from the difference between the contract price and market price at the date of the breach, and irrespective and independent altogether of what they were obliged to pay to the shipbuilding firm. This is not amending any "error or defect" in the record, but setting forth and raising a new action. Suppose for a moment that the judgment pronounced by the Lord Ordinary is wrong. In that case the judgment will be reversed, and the pursuers will get decree as originally concluded for. But if the Lord Ordinary is right, and his judgment is affirmed, what then? The pursuers propose by this amendment that we should proceed to consider whether the defender is liable in damages to the extent of £300, more or less, to the pursuers. But where is the conclusion to that effect in the original summons? There is none, for all the original conclusions (in the case supposed) have been adjudicated on, and the defender assoilzied. There is no original conclusion left. The proposed amendment, therefore, if allowed, would, in my opinion, submit to the adjudication of the Court a claim involving a fund or liability not to be found in the original summons, and therefore incompetent. The only conclusion of the summons which bears the slightest resemblance to that now proposed to be added is the conclusion for loss of profit. But obviously the pursuers do not suggest that that conclusion has any connection with the amendment, for that would only make it clearer that the £300 now proposed to be concluded for is greatly in excess of the sum originally concluded for.

If the proposed amendment is incompetent, that is enough to dispose of the question before us. But I may add that, even were the competency less doubtful than it is, I think it would be very inexpedient to allow the amendment in the whole circumstances, and that it should not be allowed if the Court has any discretion in the matter, as I am disposed to think it has.

LORD ADAM.—As my opinion differs from that of your Lordships, I shall shortly state the grounds on which it is based.

The 29th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, requires the Court to make all such amendments as may be necessary for determining "the real question in controversy between the parties," provided that there shall not be subjected to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum than is specified in the summons.

This is an action of damages in respect of an alleged breach of contract between the pursuers and the defender. The question in controversy is, whether there was such a breach, and if so, what damages are due.

No. 53.

Dec. 7, 1895. Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans.

As originally framed, the summons concluded for payment of certain specific sums which the pursuers had been obliged to pay to another company in respect of the defender's failure to implement his contract with them, and also a sum for loss of profits. There is no doubt that in certain circumstances that might have been a perfectly correct way of measuring the damage. In other circumstances it might not be, and the amount of damage would fall to be otherwise ascertained. It all depended on whether or not the pursuers were able to shew that the loss to them was the direct result of the defender's failure to implement his contract. But after all, this was just a mode of assessing the damage said to be occasioned by the breach of contract. The real question at issue between the parties remained the same, viz., if there was a breach of contract by the defender, what was the loss occasioned thereby to the pursuers.

All that the pursuers propose to do by this amendment is to insert a claim for the amount of damage which had been sustained, if it fell to be calculated by a different mode from that in the condescendence, viz., the difference between the market and the contract price. This amendment is necessary for the purpose of determining the real question in controversy—viz., the amount of damages due. The amendment makes no change in the controversy between the parties. The question in controversy is as to the damages due for breach of contract. The only question proposed to be raised by the amendment is—How are the damages to be estimated? But that does not alter the real matter as in controversy between the parties. It does not subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or different property than is specified in the summons. The sum originally in the summons was £600 and upwards. This alteration makes the sum sued for £300.

I therefore think that the proposed amendment should be allowed.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur in the opinion delivered by Lord Trayner. I certainly would be anxious to give the fullest scope to an Act of Parliament which enabled a pursuer, by altering his pleadings, to get a decision on the real question between the parties. But what is proposed here is to subject to adjudication of the Court a sum which is larger than any of those concluded for in the separate conclusions of the summons. For that reason this amendment, it appears to me, does not fall within the scope of the Act.

Even if it was competent to allow the amendment to be made, I am of opinion that the Act leaves the right to allow or to refuse to allow an amendment to the discretion of the Court, and I think that this is not a case for exercising that discretion by allowing the amendment.

Lord Young and Lord Rutherfurd Clark were absent.

The Court refused the note, and of consent refused the reclaiming note.

W. K. Morton, S.S.C.—P. Morison, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM GOLDIE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Deas.
SCHOOL BOARD OF TORTHORWALD, Defenders (Respondents).—John Wilson.

No. 54.

Dec. 10, 1895.

Goldie v. School Board of Torthorwald.

School—Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—"Salary"—Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 107), sec. 19.—The Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861, sec. 19, enacted that the heritors might permit or require a schoolmaster disqualified by old age or infirmity to resign office, provided that where such resignation is not caused by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, "the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance, the amount whereof shall not be less than two third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to the said office at the date of such resignation thereof."

Held that the word "salary" did not include school fees or interest on mortified money received by a schoolmaster.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

WILLIAM GOLDIE, lately schoolmaster of Torthorwald Public School, raised this action against the School Board of Torthorwald Parish, concluding for declarator that the defenders were bound to grant him a retiring allowance of not less than "two-thirds of the emoluments or salary pertaining to the pursuer's office of schoolmaster at the date of his resignation," and for payment of a sum of £51, 16s. 5d. as retiring allowance.

The pursuer averred that on 18th January 1868 the minister and heritors of the parish of Torthorwald appointed him parochial schoolmaster of the parish. The emoluments or salary which, up till 20th June 1873, pertained to the said office, amounted, exclusive of Government grant and house and garden, to £78, 15s., consisting of salary paid by heritors, £47; school fees, £30; interest on mortified money, £1, 15s. After the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, the pursuer continued as teacher under the School Board of the parish until, in consequence of old age, he resigned on 3d September 1894.

"By sections 19 and 20 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861, and section 61 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,* the pursuer is entitled, as a matter of right, to a retiring allow-

* By section 19 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861, it was enacted that the heritors might permit a schoolmaster disqualified by age or infirmity to resign office "provided that where such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance, the amount whereof shall not be less than two third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to said office at the date of such resignation thereof, and shall not exceed the gross amount of such salary, which retiring allowance shall be payable in all respects in like manner with the salary of the schoolmaster."

Section 55 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), enacts,—"Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained regarding the removal of the teachers of public schools appointed previously to the passing of this Act, such teachers shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained. . . ."

Section 61.—"A school board may permit any teacher of a public school to resign his office upon the condition of receiving a retiring allowance . . . . provided always that nothing herein contained shall affect the right under the existing law to a retiring allowance of any teacher appointed under the recited Acts or any of them."

No. 54.

Dec. 10, 1895. Goldie v. School Board of Torthorwald.

ance during his lifetime of not less than two-thirds of the emoluments or salary pertaining to his office at the date of his resignation. At the date of the pursuer's resignation the emoluments or salary pertaining to his said office, exclusive of the Government grant and house and garden, was £77, 14s. 8d., consisting of £52 paid by the School Board, probate grant in lieu of school fees, £23, 8s., and interest on mortified money, £2, 6s. 8d. Two-thirds of this is £51, 16s. 5d. per annum, the sum sued for."

The defenders stated that prior to 1872 "the schoolmaster's salary was £47 a year, at which sum it was fixed in pursuance of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 107), which took the place of an earlier Act passed in 1803 (42 and 43 Geo. III. c. 54), dealing with schoolmasters' salaries, which amended an old Act passed in 1676 (1 Will. III. c. 26), dealing with the same subject. By the whole of the said Acts the term salary is restricted to the termly payments therein provided for, and is quite distinct from the school fees, the right to which belongs to the schoolmaster at common law. The pursuer's salary, received from the minister and heritors, did not include either school fees or the interest of the mortified money."

The defenders further stated that after the passing of the Education Act of 1872 the School Board fixed the pursuer's salary at £52, and allowed him to receive in addition his own school fees and what grant he might earn from Government.

After the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, the School Board remitted all the fees in the school up to and including the fifth standard. "The whole probate-duty grant thereafter received by the defenders in respect of Torthorwald School in lieu of fees was handed over to the pursuer. . . . Neither the school fees nor interest of mortified money form part of the salary upon which, in terms of the Parochial Schoolmasters Act of 1861, the pursuer's right to a retiring allowance is based. . . . The defenders have all along been willing to pay, and hereby judicially tender, to the pursuer a retiring allowance of £34, 13s. 4d., being two-thirds of his salary."

On 26th October 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the retiring allowance payable to the pursuer amounts to £34, 13s. 4d., being two-thirds of his salary at the date of his resignation, and to that extent decerns and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons." *

---

* "OPINION.—The pursuer here is the late schoolmaster of the parish of Torthorwald, and the question is as to the amount of his retiring allowance, he having lately resigned, and the School Board and he being at issue as to his rights under the Education Statutes.

"The pursuer is admittedly entitled to a retiring allowance. He is an old schoolmaster,—that is to say, he was appointed in 1868 under the Act of 1861 and prior to the Act of 1872. His rights therefore depend on the former of these statutes—the Act of 1861—the Act of 1872 providing merely that nothing in that Act shall prejudice the rights of schoolmasters in office at the date of the Act in respect of a retiring allowance or otherwise. Now, what the Act of 1861 provides as to retiring allowance is this: that where a schoolmaster's resignation 'shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance, the amount whereof shall not be less than two-third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to said office at the date of such resignation

No. 54.

Dec. 10, 1895.
Goldie v. School Board of Torthorwald.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—"Salary," under the Act of 1872, included not only the salary paid by the School Board but also the "emoluments" connected with the office, and the pursuer was entitled to a retiring allowance of not less than two-thirds of the emoluments pertaining to the office.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—Before 1872 the retiring allowance consisted of two-thirds of the fixed salary paid by the heritors, which did not include school fees. No change was introduced by the Act of 1872.

LORD YOUNG.—I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

A schoolmaster appointed after the passing of the Act of 1872 has no right to a retiring allowance at all. The school board is authorised to grant a retiring allowance, but that is entirely in their judgment and discretion. We have nothing to do with the retiring allowance; that is in the judgment of the board.

The question here regards an old schoolmaster, one who was in office when the Act was passed. It was thought fit not to put teachers of this class in the same position with respect to the retiring allowance, and also with respect to removability—but here we are only concerned with the retiring allowance—as schoolmasters appointed after the passing of the Act. It was thought proper and only just to reserve to them what they were entitled to at the passing of the Act, and that is done by the words in thereof, and shall not exceed the gross amount of such salary, which retiring allowance shall be payable in all respects in like manner with the salary of the schoolmaster.'

---

"It is not disputed that the pursuer is entitled to two-thirds of the salary which he enjoyed at the date of his resignation. That salary was, it appears, somewhat larger than it was at the passing of the Act of 1872; but the defenders do not dispute that the pursuer is entitled to the benefit of any increase of his 'salary' proper. The question is whether 'salary' in the sense of the Act of 1861 can be held to include school fees, and the interest of a certain mortification which has always been paid to the schoolmaster.

"Now I should be quite disposed to take a liberal view as to what is covered by the word 'salary.' But throughout the whole legislation on the subject it is impossible in my opinion to doubt that a schoolmaster's salary is something different from and exclusive of the fees, to which formerly he had right at common law, and also different from and exclusive of emoluments coming to him from endowments or parliamentary grants. The salary is and always has been an annual sum fixed and paid, formerly by the heritors and now by the school board; and while it may well include (as has been indeed held) sums so fixed and paid in commutation of fees or in commutation of endowments, it is not suggested that anything of that kind occurred here. The minutes of the defenders carefully distinguish between the pursuer's salary and the school fees and Government grant which he received in addition; and indeed, I do not see how if the school fees were held to be part of the pursuer's salary for the purposes of this question, the Government grant could be held to be in a different position.

"On the whole, therefore, it appears to me that the defenders' tender of a retiring allowance equal to two-thirds of the £52 a year paid to the pursuer at the date of his resignation is an adequate tender, and I propose so to find, and to decern for that amount."

[1] Marshall v. School Board of Ardrossan, Dec. 10, 1879, 7 R. 359, per Lord Deas, 369.

No. 54.

Dec. 10, 1895. Goldie v. School Board of Torthorwald.

section 55, "that such teachers" (that is, teachers before the passing of the Act) "shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained."

This action is with regard to the retiring allowance to which this old schoolmaster was entitled at the date of the passing of the Act of 1872. Here there is no contract or usage on the subject, and therefore we are only concerned with the retiring allowance to which by law he was entitled at the passing of the Act. Now, the only retiring allowance to which by law he was entitled was a certain proportion of his salary, not less than two-thirds of and not exceeding the whole salary. Now, the Act of 1861, which contains the above provisions, specifies the amount of salary which is to be paid to the schoolmaster. This salary was in addition to the fees which were at that time payable direct to the schoolmaster, unless there was a contract whereby the fees should be paid to the trustees of the school, viz., the minister and heritors, who had charge of the school. But the provision as to the salary is limited to the salary, and does not extend to fees at all.

So I think, in the present case, dealing with an old schoolmaster whose rights are regulated by the Act of 1861, the retiring allowance is limited to salary, and does not extend to fees. It makes no difference that fees are in the present case paid not directly to the schoolmaster but are paid to the board, who give the schoolmaster such proportion of them as they see fit. They are fees all the same, and are not to be taken into account any more than fees prior to the passing of the Act. My opinion therefore is in accordance with that of the Lord Ordinary, and I think accordingly that this reclaiming note should be dismissed, and the judgment adhered to.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & A. HASTIE, Solicitors—CONSTABLE & JOHNSTONE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 55.

Dec. 10, 1895. Buchanan & Co. v. Macdonald.

R. BUCHANAN & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Chree.
JOHN MACDONALD, Defender (Appellant).—Salvesen—Clyde.

Sale—Trade Discount—Executory Contract—Notice—Invoice.—A brewer entered into a verbal agreement with a retail dealer to supply him with beer, and to allow him 35 per cent discount when he paid an account. No arrangement was made as to the length of credit to be allowed, but with each consignment of beer an invoice was sent, on which was a printed notice which stated that accounts not paid within three months were not subject to discount. The attention of the dealer was not specially called to the terms of the invoices, and on more than one occasion during a course of dealing extending over two years, the dealer was allowed the usual discount upon accounts not paid within three months.

In an action by the brewer for payment of the full amount of an account not paid within three months, held that by the original contract between the parties the price of the beer was fixed at 65 per cent of the nominal

No. 55.

Dec. 10, 1895.
Buchanan & Co. v. Macdonald.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Inverness-shire.

price; that this contract was not qualified by the terms of the invoices, and therefore that the defender was only liable for the amount of the account after deduction of 35 per cent.

IN January 1895 R. Buchanan & Company, brewers, Inverness, raised an action in the Debts Recovery Court at Inverness against John Macdonald, Lochaber Warehouse, Fort-William, for payment of £45 as the amount of goods supplied by them to the defender between 2d May and 21st July 1894.

On receipt of the summons the defender paid the pursuers £29, 5s., being the amount sued for less discount at the rate of 35 per cent. He denied further liability, pleading that he was entitled to this deduction as the usual trade discount allowed him by the pursuers, and that there was no special stipulation limiting the period of credit.

The pursuers pleaded that the defender had forfeited his right to the usual discount by his delay in making payment.

Proof was allowed. The material parts of the evidence are given below.*

On 20th June 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) assoilzied the defender. On appeal the Sheriff (Ivory) recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and decerned for the sum sued for, less the amount paid to account.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The evidence shewed that the so-called discount of 35 per cent was not an allowance for prompt payment, but that the contract price was ascertained by deducting that percentage from the nominal price. It further shewed that, when entered into, the contract was qualified by no limitation as to the length of credit to be allowed. The invoices were not part of the contract between the parties. Their terms had never been agreed

---

*The defender deponed,—"I have had dealings with the pursuers since May 1891. . . . I agreed with pursuers' traveller when I began to deal that I should receive 35 per cent discount when I paid an account . . . I got this discount without regard to the length of credit I took. There was no agreement, either by writing or word of mouth, as to the length of credit. . . . I received goods on 16th March 1892 from pursuers, and I paid for them in October 1892, and received discount at said rate of 35 per cent; and in like manner I paid on 15th April 1893 for goods received on 19th July 1892, and received same discount."

The pursuers' traveller, Alexander Fraser (a witness for the defender), deponed,—"When I got my first order from defender I made no arrangement with him as to the length of credit he was to be allowed. I had no special instructions from the firm as to discount allowed to defender, but I knew from the books which I kept that defender retained off 35 per cent in settling his accounts, and that percentage was deducted by him whether he settled in three months or in six months. . . . I would have taken payment of account sued for and allowed 35 per cent off as discount if defender paid me at any time before the account was placed in our law-agent's hands." By the Sheriff.—"I never called defender's attention to the 'terms' on invoice form. . . . I had not these 'terms' in view myself in taking orders and receiving payments for goods." Cross.—"If a customer becomes bankrupt, it is our custom to rank for the full amount of our account."

In the invoices sent with the goods supplied to the defender, there were printed the words:—"Terms—3 months. Accounts not paid in full within that time not subject to discount."

On 1st August 1894 the pursuers wrote to the defender,—"We must have settlement in full before sending any more beer; the nett amount of the account, if paid now, £30."

No. 55.

Dec. 10, 1895. Buchanan & Co. v. Macdonald.

to by the defender. Indeed his attention had never been directed to them. They could not, therefore, be held to alter or qualify the contract. It was also clear from the course of dealing between the parties that they were not intended to have any such effect. The allowance of 35 per cent not being a discount for prompt payment, the cases founded on by the pursuers did not apply.

Argued for the pursuers;—The original contract was indefinite in its terms, and did not refer to any specified amount of beer. It was therefore necessary that the invoice sent with each consignment should state the length of credit to be allowed, and the original agreement must be held to be qualified by the terms of the invoices. Each invoice, indeed, constituted a separate contract, and the defender having accepted goods on the conditions therein specified could not subsequently repudiate these conditions. Having failed to pay within the time specified, the defender was not entitled to the discount.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question is, what was the contract as to the price of the beer sold to the defender? Now, the evidence of the defender is very distinct on this point. He says—"I agreed with the pursuers' traveller when I began to deal that I should receive 35 per cent discount when I paid an account," and the rest of his evidence develops that statement, and makes it perfectly clear that the contract which the defender alleges, and to which he depones, was an agreement that when payment was made there should only be due the nominal price less 35 per cent. His case is that the discount was not a discount depending upon the period of payment, but an alteration of the market price of the beer. That direct testimony is corroborated in an important way by the evidence of the pursuers' traveller, who says—"When I got my first order from defender I made no arrangement with him as to the length of credit he was to be allowed." He goes on to say that in the settlement of the defender's accounts an abatement of 35 per cent was allowed, and was recognised as the right of the defender, and the evidence makes it perfectly distinct that, according to the usual manner in which the accounts were treated, the allowance of 35 per cent was a matter of right irrespective altogether of whether the defender paid in two or three months or more. It is important also to note, as corroborating the testimony of the defender, that the pursuers, in writing to him on 1st August 1894, do not suggest the theory now maintained at the bar; for, having some reason of their own for pulling up this customer sharply, they intimate that they would have payment in full although the period of three months had not then run out. I think therefore that it is proved that there was an agreement between the parties to the effect contended for by the defender.

The case for the pursuers is rested almost exclusively upon the terms of the invoices sent with each parcel of goods delivered to the defender, and they suggest that the invoices contain an expression of the contract made each time goods were sent. I reject that theory, because I hold it proved that there was an antecedent contract subsisting between the parties in the terms stated, and that the invoice was not sent to vary or to express the contract, but to furnish a statement of the amount of beer sent.

[1] Duncan v. Aitchison & Co., Jan. 28, 1879, 6 R. 582; In re Cumberland, 1876, L. R., 3 C. D. 803.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree entirely with your Lordship, and have only a few observations to add. In the first place I think that the word "discount" has no technical or universal meaning. In what is perhaps its most common meaning it is equivalent to the payment of interest in advance; as, for example, when a banker advances the amount upon a bill of exchange which is not yet due, discounting the interest up to the day of payment. It is used in another sense for the abatement which is given on a debt, because payment is made at an earlier date than it is customary for such debts to be paid. We know that some business firms have different rates of discount which they allow for payments at different periods. But here the word is used in a different sense, as applying to a case where there is a universal and nominal price for an article, while the fluctations of the market price, or the desirability of establishing an account with a particular individual, are met by alterations in the rate of discount allowed to customers. It is impossible to imagine that so high a rate of discount as 35 per cent could be allowed merely in consideration of prompt payment. The figures are altogether disproportionate to such an arrangement, and there is nothing incredible or indeed improbable in the defender's evidence that he was promised 35 per cent discount irrespective of the time of payment of his current account. The only contrary evidence is contained in the terms of the invoice, but I have always understood that a collateral document such as this can only be referred to as modifying a contract in so far as the contract refers to it. Here, according to all the evidence before us, that of the pursuers' agent and of the defender, the verbal contract was in no way subject to the conditions in the invoices which were afterwards sent to the defender to inform him of the quantity and price of the barrels sent, and of the dates at which he was to receive the consignments. I know of no legal principle requiring the defender to be bound by conditions appearing in a printed paper such as this invoice, which bears no relation to the contract of sale, which was not sent to the purchaser as a proposal for an alteration of the contract previously made, and to which his attention was not specially called.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The difficulty arises from the use of the term "discount," because in its usual sense there is no doubt that it means an allowance made to a buyer for prompt payment. I think it does not mean that in this case, but a deduction to be made from the nominal price in order to ascertain the true contract price, which was to be the nominal price less 35 per cent.

The only other point which creates some difficulty is the terms of the invoices, but I think the answer to the argument founded on the terms of the invoices is, as your Lordship has said, that there was an antecedent contract between the parties by which the price was fixed irrespective of the period of payment, and secondly, because both parties say that they did not take the terms of the invoices into view in making their contract. I say both,

No. 55. Dec. 10, 1895. Buchanan & Co. v. Macdonald.

because the traveller was the agent of the pursuers in making the contract with the defender.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 20th June 1895, and the subsequent interlocutors; of new assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the summons, &c.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 56. Dec. 11, 1895. Scott v. Thurso River Harbour Trustees.

RODERICK SCOTT (Mackay's Trustee), Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—Chree.
JOHN MACKAY, Pursuer (Reclaimer).
THE THURSO RIVER HARBOUR TRUSTEES, Defenders (Respondents).—C. J. Guthrie—D. Anderson.
JAMES BARRON, Defender.

Process—Abandonment of action—Trustee in sequestration—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 10.—The trustee in a sequestration, who had sisted himself as pursuer, and carried on an action raised by the bankrupt prior to sequestration, lodged a minute craving leave to abandon the action. The minuter did not found on the Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 10, and did not propose to pay the defenders' expenses. The Court refused the minute.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Moncreiff.

JOHN MACKAY, contractor, raised an action against the Thurso River Harbour Trustees, and also against James Barron, their engineer, for any interest he might have. The questions raised in the action arose out of a contract under which Mackay had been employed by the Harbour Trustees for the execution of certain works.

After the case had proceeded some length the pursuer was sequestrated, and Roderick Scott, solicitor, Inverness, who had been appointed trustee in the sequestration, was allowed to sist himself as pursuer.

Subsequently Scott lodged a minute containing additional averments, which were allowed to be added to the record, and the case was remitted to proof.

On 9th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) found that the pursuer Scott had failed to prove the averments contained in the minute, and on 18th July he further found that the averments made by the pursuers on record were in part irrelevant, and that the questions raised by the remaining averments fell to be submitted to the arbiter named in the contract between the parties.

The pursuers reclaimed, and thereafter Scott, the trustee, lodged a minute, stating "that the minuter had now ascertained that he was unable to verify the cause of action as set out in the summons, and that the estate under his charge would not yield funds to pay the costs of litigation, that he had been recommended by the creditors to abandon further proceedings, and craved leave for himself to abandon the action."

The minute did not bear to be under the Judicature Act, 1825, and it was admitted at the bar that it was not intended to be presented under the statute. The minuter did not offer to pay expenses.

Argued for the minuter;—The trustee desired to withdraw from the action, leaving the rights of the bankrupt therein entire, and he craved leave to abandon without payment of expenses.* The case was one for exceptional treatment as to expenses, and the motion of the trustee was in the circumstances reasonable.[1]

No. 56.

Dec. 11, 1895.
Scott v. Thurso River Harbour Trustees.

Argued for the defenders;—The defenders were entitled to the whole expenses of the action whether it was abandoned or not. Further, it was incompetent to abandon an action except upon payment of expenses. The trustee had taken up the action, and had thereby got the benefit of the expenses incurred prior to the date at which he was sisted, and therefore, according to the usual rule, he must pay the defenders' expenses as a condition of being allowed to abandon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If this minute of abandonment had been presented in accordance with the Judicature Act, our course would have been clear. The defenders' account of expenses is remitted to the Auditor, and on the taxed expenses being paid the action is then dismissed. But this minute does not purport to be under the statute, and it has been admitted at the bar that it was of distinct intention that it was not presented under the statute. Now, we have no mode of dealing with such a minute, and accordingly I am of opinion that we must refuse it. The pursuer will then be in a position to consider what steps he should take next.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The minuter craves leave, for certain reasons, to abandon the action unconditionally, to get clear of it free of all expense. Now, apart from the consent of the defenders, we could not grant such a motion. A minute of abandonment under the Act is presented under special conditions, viz., payment by the minuter of all expenses, which must be performed before the motion can be granted, but there is no method of dealing with such a minute as this, and accordingly I agree that we must refuse it.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I think it is perfectly plain that the pursuer can only abandon the action under the condition of paying the defenders' expenses. Although he does not offer to do so in the minute which he has lodged, still, if his counsel had stated that he was willing to pay those expenses, I have no doubt that your Lordships would have remitted the defenders' account to the Auditor, with the view of the necessary qualification being inserted in the interlocutor. But when it appears that the pursuer is not willing to pay the defenders' expenses, I think that our only course is to refuse the minute.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the minute.

J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

---

* Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), provides, inter alia, that it is in the power of a pursuer "to abandon the cause on paying full expenses or costs to the defender, and to bring a new action, if otherwise competent."

[1] Hare v. Stein, June 8, 1882, 9 R. 910.

No. 57.

Dec. 11, 1895. Mowat v. Caledonian Banking Co., Limited.

PETER MOWAT, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Craigie—Christie. THE CALEDONIAN BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—W. Campbell—Cullen.

Sale—Improbative offer for sale of heritage—Rei interventus.—In an action to enforce implement of an improbative offer for the sale of heritage, which had been accepted, the pursuer averred that before accepting the offer he had in the knowledge of the offerer incurred considerable expense and trouble in investigating the value of the heritage, and in endeavouring to form a syndicate for its purchase. He pleaded that the offer was validated rei interventu.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the averments were irrelevant.

1st DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ON 28th November 1894 the manager of the Caledonian Banking Company wrote to Peter Mowat, builder, Edinburgh,—"Gerston Distillery. . . . .—I hereby make you definite offer of the above distillery at . . . £11,500 for two months from this date. I hope that you will let us have your acceptance as soon as you conveniently can within that time." This letter was signed by the manager of the bank, but was not holograph of him or tested.

Mowat accepted the offer by holograph letter, dated 26th January 1895.

On 30th January the bank telegraphed to Mowat that their offer had lapsed, as he had failed to deposit five per cent of the price in terms of an arrangement with them.

Mowat thereafter raised an action against the bank; in which he concluded for decree, ordaining them, in implement of their obligation under the letters of 28th November 1894 and 26th January 1895, to grant him a conveyance of the distillery, and alternatively for damages.

In cond. 2 the pursuer set forth the letter of 28th November 1894 by the bank manager. In answer the defenders explained that the letter was neither holograph nor tested, and that the letter fell to be read along with the previous correspondence, and that by letter dated 27th November 1894 the pursuer agreed that along with his acceptance of the defender's offer he would deposit a portion of the price. (Cond. 3) "Following upon said offer, pursuer incurred considerable trouble and expense in making investigations regarding said distillery and its capabilities and prospects. He travelled to London, and also to the north of Scotland, and there, and in Edinburgh, entered into negotiations with various capitalists, with the view of forming a syndicate to work the distillery, and, in connection therewith, he expended considerable time, money, and trouble. This he did on the faith of the offer quoted above, and with the knowledge and encouragement of the defenders and their said manager. . . ." The pursuer then set forth his letter of 26th January 1895, accepting the offer.

The pursuer pleaded;—(3) The defenders are barred from founding on any informality which there may have been in the execution of their offer—(1) rei interventu, and (2) personali exceptione.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

On 10th August the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this

No. 57.

Dec. 11, 1895.
Mowat v. Caledonian Banking Co., Limited.

interlocutor:—"Finds that no effectual contract of sale of the Gerston Distillery, Caithness, was constituted between the pursuer and the defenders by the missives of sale libelled, in respect that the offer by the defenders founded on is not holograph or authenticated, and that it has not been adopted by any document holograph of the manager of the bank, or otherwise probative: Finds that there are no relevant averments of acts of rei interventus on record: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The averments of rei interventus were sufficient. The fact that the alleged rei interventus took place prior to acceptance of the offer did not exclude the doctrine, for informal unilateral deeds could be validated rei interventu.[1] The objection that the offer was not holograph was latent, and could not be founded on by the granters.[2] An endeavour to raise money, though abortive, following upon an offer to sell, might bind the offerer if known to him.[3] The averments afforded at least a good ground for a claim of damages.[4]

The defenders were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only part of the case on which we have heard argument is that based upon rei interventus, as affecting the defenders' improbative offer, and to that plea there is, I think, a complete answer, viz., that every act which the pursuer avers as constituting rei interventus was done by him between the receipt of the improbative offer, and his acceptance thereof, and all the averments amount to is that the pursuer, after receiving the offer, like a sensible man, set about making inquiries as to whether or not it was worth his while to accept it. Accordingly the

---

* "NOTE— . . . I am further of opinion that there is no relevant averment of acts of rei interventus. There could not have been any such acts done in reliance on a completed agreement, for there was no completed agreement until the date of the pursuer's acceptance, and the defenders' repudiation followed immediately. I do not dispute that an offer expressed as open for a certain time may become binding rei interventu, although improbative. The pursuer referred to several cases in which informal unilateral deeds had been made binding rei interventu. Such were the cases of The Dunmore Colliery Company, 1st February 1811, F. C.; United Mutual Mining Company v. Murray, 13th June 1860, 22 D. 1185; and the Church of England Insurance Company v. Wink, 17th July 1857, 19 D. 1079. But I think the pursuer avers no acts which are of the character of acts of rei interventus. He does not say that he relinquished any engagement, or renounced any advantage, or entered into any contract on the faith of the contract. All that he did was to make inquiries about the distillery and endeavour unsuccessfully to raise the money by means of a syndicate. Such acts are not within the category of acts of rei interventus. Bell's Prin., sec. 26; Bell's Com. i. 346; Gardner v. Lucas, 8th February 1878, 5 R. 638, per Lord Shand."

[1] Mylne v. Smith, Nov. 18, 1823, 2 S. 501; Dunmore Coal Co. v. Young, Feb. 1, 1811, F. C.; United Mutual Mining Co. v. Murray, June 13, 1860, 22 D. 1185, 32 Scot. Jur. 540; Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Co. v. Wink, July 17, 1857, 19 D. 1079, 29 Scot. Jur. 486.

[2] Baird's Trustees v. Murray, Nov. 21, 1883, 11 R. 153.

[3] Ibid. per Lord Shand, at p. 166.

[4] Allan v. Gilchrist, March 10, 1875, 2 R. 587.

No. 57.

Dec. 11, 1895. Mowat v. Caledonian Banking Co., Limited.

proposition in law which of necessity was put forward by Mr Christie is to the effect that when an offer, neither holograph nor tested, has been made, if the person to whom it is addressed does anything to inform himself whether it will be to his interest to accept, such actings will be enough to turn the offer into a completed contract. Such a proposition is contrary both to law and common sense; and accordingly I think the Lord Ordinary's decision is right. The bank are entitled, like everyone else, to stand upon their legal rights, and all that they have done has been to point out and found upon the fact that there was no legal agreement. We are not called upon to inquire into, or make any observations on, their conduct in the matter.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ANDERSON & GREEN, S.S.C.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58.

Dec. 11, 1895. Albany Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

THE ALBANY STEAM SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Lorimer.

Company—Reduction of capital—Dispensation with words "and reduced"—Motion for dispensation on presentation of petition for confirmation—Companies Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 4, subsec. 2.—On the presentation of a petition by a limited company for an order confirming the reduction of its capital, the Court, in virtue of the powers conferred by section 4, subsection 2, of the Companies Act, 1877, on the motion of the petitioners, dispensed in the meantime with the addition of the words "and reduced" to the name of the company.

2D DIVISION.

ON 10th December 1895 the Albany Shipping Company, Limited, Dundee, presented a petition to the Court for an order confirming the reduction of its capital. The petitioners stated that there was passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the company on 3d October 1895, and confirmed at a subsequent extraordinary general meeting on 22d October, a special resolution that the capital of the company be reduced from £250,000, divided into 25,000 shares of £10 each, to £125,000, divided into shares of £5 each. The petitioners further stated,—"The reduction of capital resolved upon by the company is a reduction of paid-up capital which is lost or is unrepresented by available assets, and does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital, or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital, and does not in any way affect the rights of creditors of the company."

The petitioners prayed the Court "to dispense in the meantime with the addition by the company of the words 'and reduced' to its name," and "to appoint the petition to be intimated in common form, and to be advertised, and to allow all concerned to lodge answers, and on resuming consideration, to make an order confirming the reduction of the capital," and to dispense altogether with "the addition of the words 'and reduced' to the company's name."

In Single Bills the petitioners, in moving for intimation and advertisement, moved also for a dispensation in terms of the first part of the prayer of their petition. They referred to the sections of the Companies Acts, quoted below,* and to the undernoted authorities.[1] No. 58.

Dec. 11, 1895.
Albany Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

THE COURT (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD TRAYNER) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords dispense in the meantime with the addition by the company of the words 'and reduced' to its name, and appoint the petition, along with this order, to be intimated," &c.

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S., Agents.

ROBERT LOCKHART ALSTON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Wilson.
ALEXANDER ROSS, Defender (Reclaimer).—Kennedy—Watt.
ALEXANDER MUNRO AND ANOTHER, Defenders. No. 59.

Dec. 12, 1895.
Alston v. Ross.

Process—Sist—Road—Action to negative alleged right of way—Sist to give County Council opportunity to intervene—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 42.—The proprietor of an estate brought an action against R., concluding for declarator that he held the estate free of any public right of way over a certain part of it, and for interdict against the defender entering upon it. R., who had used a path over the part of the estate in question for sixteen years, lodged defences. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. Shortly before the diet fixed for proof the defender moved the Lord Ordinary to sist the action, upon the ground that, his funds being exhausted, he was unable to make the necessary preparations for the proof, and that the case was being considered by the County Council, who were entitled under the Local Government Act, 1894, to take steps to vindicate rights of way. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) refused the motion, and the defender having failed to appear at the proof the Lord Ordinary granted decree as against R. as concluded for.

On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and sisted the action hoc statu upon an undertaking by the defender not to use the path during the sist.

ROBERT LOCKHART ALSTON, proprietor of the estate of Rosehall in Sutherlandshire, brought an action in January 1895 against Alexander Ross and others, tenants or occupiers of houses at Inveroykel, con- 1st DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

* The Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131), sec. 10, enacts,—"The company shall, after the date of the passing of any special resolution for reducing its capital, add to its name, until such date as the Court may fix, the words 'and reduced,' as the last words in its name, and those words shall, until such date, be deemed to be part of the name of the company within the meaning of the principal Act."

The Companies Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 4, subsec. 2, enacts,—"The provisions of the Companies Act, 1867, as amended by this Act, shall apply to any company reducing its capital in pursuance of this Act and of the Companies Act, 1867, as amended by this Act: Provided that where the reduction of the capital of a company does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholders of any paid-up capital—(1) The creditors of the company shall not, unless the Court otherwise direct, be entitled to object or required to consent to the reduction; and (2) it shall not be necessary before the presentation of the petition for confirming the reduction to add, and the Court may, if it thinks it expedient so to do, dispense altogether with the addition of, the words 'and reduced,' as mentioned in the Companies Act, 1867."

[1] Langdale Chemical Manure Co., Limited, 1878, W. R. 434; River Plate Fresh Meat Co., 1885, W. N. 14.

No. 59. Dec. 12, 1895. Alston v. Ross.

cluding for declarator that the pursuer had the sole right and property of the lands of Rosehall free of any public right of way over certain portions of that estate which were described, and for interdict against the defenders traversing these portions of the estate.

It was admitted by the pursuer that the defenders had occasionally during the preceding sixteen years used a path over the portions of the estate of Rosehall described in the summons.

Ross lodged defences, and a proof was fixed for 6th November 1895.

On 30th October Ross lodged a minute, in which he stated that he could not proceed to trial, as he had no funds wherewith to make the necessary preparations for the proof, "that the averments of parties in the present action have been brought before the County Councils of the counties of Ross and Sutherland, who are entitled, under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, to take proceedings requisite to vindicate rights of way, and are now being investigated and considered by them; that in the event of the said County Councils, or either of them, defending the present action, or instituting proceedings against the present pursuer, with reference to the right of way in question, then the issue in the present action would be properly and fully tried without expense to the defender; that even in the event of their declining to take action, the defender believes that subscriptions would be obtained from the public to an amount to enable him to meet the outlay necessary to prepare and conduct his case; . . . that the defender is willing, in the event of the cause being sisted, or the proof adjourned, without prejudice to his pleas, to undertake to refrain from using the path in question during the period of sist or postponement."

He thereafter craved the Lord Ordinary to sist the cause hoc statu, or otherwise adjourn the proof for three months, or other reasonable period.

On 2d November the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) refused the defender's motion for adjournment of the proof, and refused also leave to reclaim. On 6th November the motion for adjournment was again made and refused, and on the same date the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having called the proof, and no appearance being made for the defenders, finds, decerns, and declares, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, as against Alexander Ross, the compearing defender, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in refusing the defender's request for delay, as the grounds set forth in the minute were sufficient to support the application. The defender had not come forward at his own time to assert the right of way, but had been brought into Court. He was therefore in a more favourable position as regarded an application for delay than a party who brought an action to have a right of way established. Poverty had been held a sufficient excuse in the case of a pursuer failing to appear at a jury trial,[1] and also in the case of a party failing to lodge papers ordered by the Court.[2] But the defender here had stronger grounds for craving a sist than mere poverty. The Legislature had given the District Committees of County Councils

[1] Sassen v. Campbell, March 10, 1830, 8 S. 707.

[2] Clark v. Newmarch, Nov. 17, 1825, 4 S. 182; Leith v. Leith, June 7, 1822, 1 S. 506.

No. 59.

Dec. 12, 1895.
Alston v. Ross.

the right to vindicate rights of way in the public interest, and a reasonable opportunity should be given the County Council in this case to intervene if it was so advised. The defender's information was that it was not unlikely that the new County Council of Sutherland, which had been elected since the minute was lodged, would resolve to intervene in this dispute. The pursuer would suffer no prejudice by the delay craved, for the defender was willing that the examination of aged witnesses should be proceeded with, and he would undertake not to use the path during the time the case was sisted.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. The action had been raised in January 1895, and the application for further delay was unreasonable. The defender having failed to appear at the proof, he was in default.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If the person asserting a right of way had been the pursuer, and he had failed to attend a diet of proof, we should have been slow to alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. But the pursuer in this case is seeking to negative a right of way claimed by the defender, and to interdict him from using a path which admittedly he has been in the habit of using for a considerable number of years. Accordingly we find that the user of the path is the party attacked, and it is his possession of it which would be altered by an interdict.

Now, the defender points to the statute under which a duty is imposed by Parliament upon the County Council to vindicate rights of way, and states that the question of vindicating this right of way is now under consideration by the County Council. Now I think we are bound to give the system a fair chance. We cannot disregard the defender's averments that the County Council are considering whether to assert this right of way, and we are therefore bound to give him some latitude, on his undertaking not to use the path till the case is disposed of.

I am therefore of opinion that we should recall the interlocutor and sist the case hoc statu on this undertaking being given by the defender, it being left open to either party to come and make a motion to the Court during the sist should matters move more rapidly than is anticipated.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. Of course this interlocutor brings up all the previous interlocutors. I do not understand that we are settling anything about the mode of proof, or anything of that kind. There is no motion of that sort. Our judgment leaves all that open.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect said defender has undertaken to abstain from using the road in question during any sist of this action, recall the said interlocutor, and sist process hoc statu."

ALEXANDER ROSS, S.S.C.—ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

Dec. 12, 1895.
Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane.

MRS CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH HALDANE AND OTHERS (Haldane's Trustees), First Parties.—Grainger Stewart.
JAMES AYLMER LOWTHROP HALDANE, Second Party.—D. Dundas—Gillies Smith.
MRS CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH HALDANE, Third Party.—D. Dundas—Gillies Smith.

Succession—Trust—Denuding—Demand for payment by one of several liars with consent of liferenter.—A testator conveyed his heritable and moveable estates to trustees for payment of certain legacies and annuities, and for payment of the liferent of the remainder to his widow. He further directed his trustees after the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife to pay a provision of £18,000 to his son, and a provision of £8000 to each of his four daughters, and to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his son. He declared that the children's provisions should vest at his decease.

The testator was survived by his widow and by his five children. The son applied to the trustees for payment of his provision of £18,000. The widow consented to the application, and offered to discharge her liferent in regard to that sum. The funds in the hands of the trustees at the date of the application were amply sufficient to meet all the children's provisions.

Held that the trustees were not bound to accede to the son's demand, in respect that the daughters were entitled to pari passu payment of their provisions along with the son, and that it was possible that when the date of payment arrived the estate might be insufficient to pay the provisions in full.

1ST DIVISION. DR DANIEL RUTHERFORD HALDANE, Edinburgh, died on 12th April 1887, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for, inter alia, the following purposes:—Payment of debts, expenses, and legacies. In the seventh place, for payment to his widow of an annuity of £500 during her lifetime, as also for payment of the following annuities to his children after his decease, but only during the lifetime of his widow, and subject to termination thereof in the event after specified, viz., to his son James A. L. Haldane an annuity of £210, and to each of his four daughters an annuity of £100. In the eighth place, for payment of the free annual proceeds of his estate, after implement of the previous purposes, to his widow during her lifetime, but under burden of her bearing the expense of the maintenance of his daughters so long as they lived in family with her. In the ninth place, at the first term of Whitsunday and Martinmas after the decease of the longest liver of himself and his wife, for payment of the following further provisions to his children, viz., to his son £18,000, and to each of his four daughters £8000. In the last place, the testator directed his trustees to set aside and hold for behoof of his son the whole residue and remainder of his estate. The testator further declared that, notwithstanding the terms of payment before specified, and the provisions therein before granted to his son and daughters, it should be in the power of his son, with the concurrence of his widow, after his decease, to apply for and obtain from the trustees payment of the sum of £5000 as a payment to account of the provision of £18,000, but which payment should not bear any interest against him until the term of payment of the said provision, but on payment of said sum of £5000 the annuity of £210 provided to him should cease. Power was also given in similar terms to any daughter on her marriage to apply for and obtain an advance of £2500 on similar conditions as to interest and annuities. It was declared that, notwithstanding the terms of payment of the children's provisions, they should become vested in them at the date of the testator's decease.

No. 60.

Dec. 12, 1895. Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane.

The testator was survived by his wife, son, and four daughters.

In exercise of the power conferred upon him, the testator's son obtained advances from the trustees amounting to £3010 to account of his provision of £18,000. After making these advances and discharging the primary purposes of the trust, the value of the investments in the charge of the trustees (including a sum of £4832 placed in the names of the testator's marriage-contract trustees to meet any contingent claims under his marriage-contract) was estimated in 1895 to amount to £60,601. The only subsisting claims against the trust-estate, except those of the testator's wife and children, were certain life annuities amounting to £117 for which the deceased was liable. The total amount of the provisions made to the children under the ninth purpose of the settlement, as reduced by the advances already made to the son, was £46,990.

In these circumstances the testator's son, with the consent and concurrence of his mother, requested the trustees to pay over to him the balance of his provision of £18,000, amounting to £14,990, in exchange for a joint deed of discharge by himself and his mother, in which he would renounce all right to the annuity provided to him, and his mother would renounce all right of liferent over the said sum, and agree that her annuity of £500 should suffer any diminution necessary to admit of the other annuities being paid in full.

The trustees having declined to comply with this request without the sanction of the Court, a special case was presented, to which the trustees were first parties, the testator's son, James Aylmer Haldane, second party, and the testator's widow, Mrs Haldane, third party, in order to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the following question:—"Whether the first parties are entitled and bound to pay over to the second party the balance of his foresaid provision, amounting to £14,990, in exchange for delivery to them of a discharge by him and the third party, in the terms above indicated?"

Argued for the second and third parties;—The widow's liferent and annuity were not alimentary, but were capable of being discharged, and she was willing to discharge her rights. The security for the daughters' provisions would be ample, even if the payment asked for was made. The trustees were therefore bound to pay over the balance of the son's provision which had vested in him, on receiving a discharge from the second and third parties in the terms offered.[1]

Argued for the first parties;—The advance so far as in excess of £5000 would be contrary to the testator's implied intention, and could not be granted without impairing the security of the other fiars—the testator's daughters. In all the cases referred to by Lord Watson in the case of Muirhead,[1] where a party entitled to the fee of estate liferented by someone else had been held entitled to payment before the natural expiry of the liferent, the party demanding payment had been alone interested in the fee. The rule of these cases did not apply when other parties were interested in the fee,[2] for

[1] Rainsford v. Maxwell, Feb. 6, 1852, 14 D. 450, 24 Scot. Jur. 221; Miller's Trustees v. Miller, Dec. 19, 1890, 18 R. 301; Muirhead v. Muirhead, May 12, 1890, 17 R. (H. L.) 45, per Lord Watson, at p. 48.

[2] Grieve's Trustees v. Bethune, &c., June 9, 1830, 8 S. 896.

No. 60. in such cases payment to one fiar would decrease the security of the other fiars.

Dec. 12, 1895. Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Unless the trustees are bound to pay over the money which they are asked to pay over by the second party, we cannot answer the question put to us in the affirmative. The question is, "Is there an obligation upon the trustees to pay over this money?" The payment which is asked is of the capital of the provision destined to the second party in fee, but this is not the case of a fund directed to be set aside as the applicant's own property. In such a fund the other beneficiaries have no interest, because they can never have any right to it. Unfortunately the right of the second party is only to share pari passu along with his sisters in the fee of this estate,—he to the extent of £18,000, and they to the extent of £8000 each,—and it is perfectly plain that, if the estate by loss on investments should fall to such an extent as to become inadequate to provide for the sum of £18,000 bequeathed to the second party, and for the four provisions of £8000 bequeathed to his sisters, these provisions would suffer a pro rata diminution. The trustees point to this consideration, and argue that the question must be answered in the negative. It seems to me impossible to hold that the trustees are bound to make the payment asked for. It may be that they are entitled, in the exercise of their discretion to make it, but with that we have nothing to do.

LORD ADAM.—I agree. I think, with your Lordship, that the question is whether the trustees are bound to pay over the money, not whether they are entitled to do so in the exercise of their discretion. That is not our business. I think, as was pointed out by Mr Grainger Stewart, that this distinction exists in the cases where such advances have been authorised, that in these cases the applicant was entitled to the fee of the whole estate, so that no other party could be injured by the advance. But when the applicant is only entitled to the fee of part of the estate, other parties might suffer if the estate left in the trustees' hands should ultimately prove insufficient to provide for payment of the whole of the provisions of the settlement.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree. There may or may not be any practical risk in the trustees making the desired payment. That is not a question for us but for the trustees. We, however, cannot answer the question put to us in the affirmative, unless we can say, admitting the possibility of risk, that no liability would attach to the trustees in the event of the estate diminishing in value, and I do not think that we can possibly say that. I agree that, as there are five legatees with equal rights to payment out of a common fund, it is impossible to say that the trustees have now the right to pay one of these legatees in full, leaving any loss which may arise from a future diminution to fall exclusively upon the others. If we were to answer the question in the affirmative, we should affirm, as Mr Dundas conceded, that payment in full to the son would afford the trustees a good answer to any claim which might be made by the daughters in the event of the funds remaining in their hands proving insufficient to satisfy the daughters' provisions. I am of opinion that we cannot say that the trustees would have a good answer to such a claim, and I therefore agree that we must answer the question in the negative. No. 60.

Dec. 12, 1895. Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the first parties are not bound to pay over to the second party the balance of the provision in his favour in his father's trust-disposition and settlement, amounting to £14,990, in exchange for delivery to them of a discharge by him and the third party, in the terms indicated, and decern."

W. & F. HALDANE, W.S., Agents.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF CERES, Pursuers (Reclaimers). —Rankine—A. M. Anderson.
WILLIAM M'FARLANE, Defender (Respondent).—Kennedy.
JAMES MARTIN AND OTHERS, Defenders. No. 61.

Dec. 12, 1895. Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane.

Property—Competing Titles—Superior and Vassal—School Board possessing transferred school on personal title—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 38.—In 1833 A granted a feu-disposition of a portion of the lands of Craigrothie, upon which a schoolhouse had been built, to B, who entered into possession but did not take infeftment. In 1873 B transferred the schoolhouse and ground to the school board of the parish, who got possession, but no formal conveyance in favour of the school board was executed. In 1883 D bought the lands of Craigrothie, and duly completed his titles by infeftment upon a disposition, which contained a clause of warrandice excepting all feu-rights granted by the disponer or his predecessors.

In an action brought by the school board against D for declarator of their right to the ground possessed by them, the pursuers founded upon the unfeudalised feu-disposition and on section 38 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, which enacts that when a school has been transferred to a school board, the school and the site shall vest in the school board. The pursuers did not allege that D knew of their right at the date of his purchase. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) (1) that D's right to the lands was not affected by the unfeudalised feu-disposition; and (2) that section 38 of the Act did not give the school board a better title than that of their author, and therefore that their title was not valid in competition with the title of D.

Property—Disposition—Warrandice—Exception of existing feu-rights—Unrecorded feu-disposition.—Opinions that an exception in a clause of warrandice "of all feu-rights granted by the disponer or his predecessors," fell to be construed as meaning all feu-rights completed by infeftment.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

BY feu-disposition dated in 1833 William Wilson of Craigrothie, Ceres, in the county of Fife, feued a piece of ground upon which a schoolhouse had previously been built, being part of the lands of Craigrothie, to certain of the inhabitants of the village of Craigrothie. The reddendo was one penny Scots, if asked only, and the warrandice was at all hands and against all mortals.

The piece of ground above disponed was possessed by the original disponees and their successors down to the year 1873, the school being managed by a body of trustees, but no infeftment was ever taken upon the feu-disposition. After the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, it was resolved to transfer the schoolhouse and ground to the Ceres School Board, and the School Board got possession, but no formal conveyance was executed.

No. 61.

Dec. 12, 1895. Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane.

By a series of gratuitous dispositions the lands of Craigrothie passed from William Wilson to Frederick Honey, who, in 1883, sold the lands to William M'Farlane. The disposition in M'Farlane's favour did not in its dispositive clause except the ground feued in 1833, but it contained the following clause of warrandice:—"And I grant warrandice, but excepting always from the warrandice the current tacks or leases, and all feu-rights and other subaltern rights of the said lands granted by me or my predecessors or authors to the tenants, feuars, and vassals thereof, without prejudice to the right of the said William M'Farlane or his foresaids to quarrel or impugn the same upon any ground in law not inferring warrandice against me or my foresaids." William M'Farlane duly completed his title by infeftment.

In 1894 William M'Farlane intimated to the Ceres School Board that they had no legal title to the ground they occupied, and offered them a feu-charter if they would pay a feu-duty of £5 a year. Upon their refusing to accept this offer he threatened them with eviction.

The School Board accordingly raised an action against William M'Farlane, and against the heirs (in terms of the feu-disposition of 1833) of the parties in whose favour that disposition had been granted, for declarator that the pursuers had the full right and title to the piece of ground disponed in 1833, and to have that piece of ground adjudged to belong to them.

The pursuers pleaded;—The pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, in virtue of (a) the feu-disposition first referred to; (b) the transfer from the said trustees and managers to the pursuers; and (c) the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.*

William M'Farlane lodged defences, and pleaded that the pursuers had no legal title which could compete with his infeftment as singular successor.

On 14th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) sustained the defences and assoilzied the defender.†

---

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), section 38, provides,—"With respect to schools now existing, or which may hereafter exist, in any parish or burgh erected or acquired and maintained, or partly maintained, with funds derived from contributions or donations . . . . be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the person or persons vested with the title to any such school, with the consent of the person or persons having the administration of the trusts upon which the same is held, to transfer such school, together with the site thereof, and any land or teacher's house held and used in connection therewith, to the school board of the parish or burgh in which it is situated . . . and it shall be lawful for the school board, with the sanction of the Board of Education, to accept of such transference; and on the same being made and accepted, the said school, with the site and any land and teacher's house included in the transference, shall be vested in the school board, and the school shall thereafter be deemed to be a public school under this Act, and shall be maintained and managed by the school board, and be subject to all the provisions of this Act accordingly. . . ."

Section 39 provides that "the transference may be effected by an ordinary disposition or other deed of conveyance by the persons vested with the title, recorded in the Register of Sasines."

† "OPINION.—The defender William M'Farlane is a purchaser of the estate upon which the pursuers' school is built, and his title has been com-

No. 61.

Dec. 12, 1895.
Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) If the pursuers had been evicted by the defender's author they would have had a claim against him under the clause of warrandice contained in the feu-disposition of 1833, as he was a gratuitous disponee of their author. But the defender was not in a better position than his author, because he had accepted a disposition containing a clause of warrandice which excepted from the warrandice all feu-rights granted by the disponer or his predecessors. This exception included the feu-disposition of 1833, even although that deed had never been feudalised, and that deed accordingly could not be challenged by the defender.[1] A person who accepted a disposition with a clause of warrandice in these terms was put upon his inquiry, and could not found upon the fact that a feu-right granted by the predecessor of his author was not on record. The records were not conclusive in all cases as to the extent of the rights conveyed, e.g., they did not disclose servitudes. (2) At anyrate, the effect of the transference to the School Board was to give them a pleted by infeftment. The pursuers' title, on the other hand, is an unfeudalised feu-disposition granted so long ago as 1833.

---

"It is not said that the defender had any notice of the pursuers' right, or that he even knew of the existence of the school. Prima facie, therefore, it is a case to which the general rule that a singular successor takes the lands free from the personal obligations of his predecessor and unaffected by burdens not appearing upon the records applies.

"The pursuers' argument was mainly founded upon the terms of the clause of warrandice.

"That clause excepts from the disposition leases and feu-rights, but gives liberty to the defender to challenge leases or feu-rights on any ground not inferring warrandice against the disponer.

"The argument of the pursuers was that the defender could not challenge their right, because to do so would infer warrandice against his author.

"It may be doubted whether the pursuers have a title to state that argument, because they were not parties to the disposition, nor in any way privy to the contract between the defender and his author. But apart from that, it seems to me that a challenge of the pursuers' title on the part of the defender would not infer warrandice against the disponer. The pursuers' title is challengeable not on account of any defect in the disponer's title, or anything which he has done, but simply because the pursuers, or those in whose right they are, neglected to put their title upon record. In such a case I do not think that there could be any recourse under the clause of warrandice in the feu-disposition, because the defect in the title is entirely attributable to the grantees.

"The pursuers relied upon the case of Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun (M. 10,461). In that case, however, the ground of judgment was that Lord Hopetoun was barred personali exceptione from challenging the perpetual lease which was in question, it being expressly excepted in the clause of warrandice in the disposition. It appears to me that that decision has no application here, because there is no express mention of the pursuer's feu-right in the disposition, and, as I have said, it is not alleged that the defender had any notice of the existence of any right on the pursuers' part, or even knew of the existence of the school.

"I may add that I do not think that the pursuers derive any aid from the provisions of the Education Act, 1872. Section 38 provides for the transference of schools in the position of that in question to the school board. It is there enacted that the persons 'vested with the title to any such school,' may transfer 'such school, together with the site thereof, and any

---

[1] Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun, 1763, M. 10,461.

No. 61.

Dec. 12, 1895. Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane.

vested title to the subjects transferred, and this right was as valid as a feudalised title. Section 38 of the Education Act was to be distinguished from section 39. A formal conveyance, such as was referred to in section 39, was not required to vest the subjects transferred in the school board in terms of section 38.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The exception of "feu-rights" contained in the clause of warrandice in the disposition in the defender's favour did not include unfeudalised dispositions. The defender in purchasing was entitled to rely upon the records, and the pursuers had only themselves to blame if their title was challengeable because it was not recorded. The case of Wight[1] was not applicable, for there the perpetual lease which was challenged by the defender was expressly excepted in his title. (2) The provisions of section 38 of the Education Act did not give the pursuers a better title than was possessed by their authors.

Lord Adam.—So long ago as 1833 the pursuers' predecessors obtained a feu-disposition from the then proprietor of Craigrothie of a small piece of land, for the purpose of building a schoolhouse. The feu-disposition contained a clause of warrandice, and we are told no infeftment was taken on the disposition. In 1873 the successors of the original disponees, under terms of the Education Act, transferred the ground and school buildings to the pursuers, but neither were they infeft. Now, on the other hand, the property of Craigrothie estate had during this period changed hands several times without any mention being made in the dispositions of the feu given off it in 1833. Then, in 1883 Mr Frederick Honey sold it to the defender, and the dispositive clause in the disposition did not except the piece of ground occupied by the pursuers, but there was a clause of warrandice in the following terms:—(His Lordship here quoted the clause of warrandice). Now, it appears to me that this is simply a competition of titles. The defender land or teacher's house held and used in connection therewith to the school board,' and if the school board, with the sanction of the Board of Education, accept such transference, 'the school, with the site, and any land or teacher's house included in the transference, shall be vested in the school board.' By the 39th section it is provided that 'the transference may be effected by an ordinary disposition or other deed of conveyance by the persons vested with the title, recorded in the Register of Sasines.'

---

"If, as in this case, the trustees of a subscription school have only a personal title, I do not think that a transference carried out under the 38th section gives to the school board any better title than that of the trustees. I think that they only acquire right to the title as it stands in the person of the trustees. Further, the 39th section points out the way in which the school board may complete their title. It is to be by an ordinary disposition by the persons vested in the title. If the School Board had taken a disposition from the trustees in 1873, when the transference is said to have been made, and put it upon record, there would have been no question; but, as they neglected to do so, I am of opinion that they are in no better position than the trustees would have been in if the transference had not been made, and that their sole title, in a question with the defender, is the unfeudalised feu-disposition of 1833, of which the defender is not said to have had any knowledge or notice.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to the decree which they seek."

[1] Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun, 1763, M. 10,461.

No. 61.

Dec. 12, 1895.
Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane.

is infeft in the land with a regular feudal title, and the proposal of the pursuers is to oust him from the land—for this is what their action comes to—on the ground that they have a personal title thereto. I certainly have never heard of the real title yielding to the personal in such a competition.

But the first argument advanced by the pursuers is on the clause of warrandice, and it is said that in the grant to the defender there were excepted "all feu-rights granted by me or my predecessors." Now, I think that by "feu-rights" are meant completed feu-rights capable of being brought into competition with those disponed, and not merely personal rights, and I agree with Mr Kennedy that the exception does not apply to a case where the defect in the disponee's title arises from his own neglect in not carrying out the plain duty to himself of making his title good by infeftment.

The only other argument is based upon sections 38 and 39 of the Education Act of 1872, but it does not appear to me that these sections make any difference. If there has been a conveyance to the School Board, that cannot give to them any better title than their authors had. If the latter had only a personal title the statutory transference cannot make it a real one. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I must confess that I have some sympathy with the position of the pursuers in the case, because they and their predecessors have been in possession for many years of the land occupied by the schoolhouse. It was given to their predecessors in 1833 by a disposition by the then proprietor of Craigrothie for the reddendo of a penny Scots, and they have been in possession of it ever since. The estate of Craigrothie has passed by various gratuitous dispositions to disponees of the original proprietor, but in the year 1883 the lands were bought by the present defender, who is willing to allow the School Board to remain, but only on payment of a feu-duty of £5 a year. I am afraid that the position in which the School Board are placed must be ascribed to those who administered their affairs, because they might have made their right certain by taking infeftment from the superior, or after the alteration in our conveyancing procedure by putting their disposition on record. They took no such step, and accordingly their right was a personal one when the defender bought the estate of Craigrothie. The only ground which is suggested on which their right can prevail against the real right of the defender is that the clause of warrandice in the disposition in his favour must be held to except the grant in the pursuers' favour. I am unable to accept that construction of the clause of warrandice. I agree with Lord Adam that the "feu-rights" which are excepted in the clause must be rights which are capable of being brought into competition with the right granted to the disponee. If we were to take the opposite view the result would be that no buyer could contract in safety upon the faith of the records, but every buyer would run the risk of being evicted by parties holding latent personal rights not appearing upon record. We must assume, because there is no averment to the contrary, that the defender knew nothing of this right when he purchased the property. He therefore bought the estate in the faith that no rights existed except such as appeared on the record, and the question which has arisen is, as Lord Adam has said, whether in a competition of titles a personal right which is older in date can prevail against his real right. I am perfectly clear that that is not a question capable of discussion.

No. 61.

Dec. 12, 1895. Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane.

On the second point, as to the effect of the Statute of 1872, I also agree.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

GRAY & KINNISON, S.S.C.—MARTIN & M'GLASHAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 62.

Dec. 13, 1895. Sutherland v. Urquhart.

JOHN SUTHERLAND, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Brown.
BEAUCHAMP C. URQUHART, Defender (Appellant).—Johnston—Cullen.

Lease—Claim by tenant under a separate contract—Counter claim by landlord under the lease—Liquid and Illiquid.—In an action by an outgoing tenant against his landlord for the price of the waygoing crop, which had been ascertained, as provided for by the lease, in a submission entered into between the parties at its termination, the defender, who had taken over the crop and admitted that the price was due, pleaded that he was entitled to set off against the pursuer's claim an illiquid counter claim under the lease for damages against the tenant for miscropping and for failing to upkeep buildings. Held that the landlord's illiquid counter claim under the lease was not a relevant defence to the tenant's claim for the sum found due to him by the decreet-arbitral.

Lovie v. Baird's Trustees, October 16, 1895, supra, p. 1, distinguished.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

IN April 1895 John Sutherland, farmer, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Mr Beauchamp C. Urquhart, proprietor of the estate of Byth, concluding for payment of £68, 11s. 10d.

The pursuer averred that he had been tenant under a lease of the farm of Upper Tillymauld, belonging to the defender, up to Whitsunday 1894. At his removal the defender entered, along with him, into a submission to arbiters to fix the value of the waygoing corn crop. The arbiters fixed the value at £136, 7s. 7d., and the defender took over the crop. The pursuer was due to the defender certain sums, including £62, 6s. 7d. for rent, and the sum sued for was the balance, after deducting these sums, of the valuation price.

The defender admitted these averments, and that he refused to make payment of the balance claimed, "and explained that the pursuer has failed to implement the terms of the said lease as to the upkeep of buildings and the cropping of the land, and has rendered himself liable to the defender in the sum of £205, 13s. 7d., for which sum he has raised an action in this Court, together with the liquidate penalty of £72 as stipulated in the said lease."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) No relevant defence.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being due the defender a larger sum than that now sued for, the defender is entitled to compensate, and should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 27th June 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) sustained the pursuer's second plea in law, and decerned against the defender for the sum sued for.

No. 62.

Dec. 13, 1895. Sutherland v. Urquhart.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Crawford), on 16th August 1895, affirmed his Substitute's interlocutor.*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The claim and the counter claim were both referable to the same contract. They both resulted from the relation of landlord and tenant, and arose in the course of determining, on the expiry of the lease, the pecuniary rights and liabilities of the parties hinc inde. The valuation of the grain crop was carried through because of the provisions of the lease.† The case of Lovie v. Baird's Trustees[1] was not distinguishable from the present, and should be followed.

The respondent argued;—This was not a case of mutual claims founded on the same contract. The submission to arbiters and the lease were distinct and separate agreements. Lovie's case was not in point. In any view, the person who had received the grain crop was bound to pay the ascertained price of it, and was not entitled to set off an illiquid and indefinite claim for damages extending over a course of years against a liquid claim of debt.[2]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Sheriff of Aberdeen in an action at the instance of a tenant against his landlord, but the action is not founded on the contract of lease, but on a separate and distinct contract, which, so far as the record goes, has no necessary connec-

* "NOTE.—There is no doubt considerable force in the argument that it would be equitable and convenient that the pecuniary claims on either side, arising out of the relation of landlord and tenant of a farm at the expiry of a lease, should be considered and be disposed of together. I have therefore given very careful consideration to the numerous cases which have more or less bearing on this question, particularly to those which were cited at the hearing. I think it is the case that, in the question whether under any circumstances and in any form an illiquid claim can be presented as an answer to a liquid claim, the tendency of the Supreme Court for some time has been to relax the rigidity of the old rule. But even in the most favourable cases for the defender, such as Stark v. Davie, 18th July 1876, 3 R. 114, and Munro v. M'Geogh, 15th November 1888, 16 R. 1893, the illiquid claim against a demand for rent has been sustained, as entitling the defender to an abatement of the rent. In short, it has, in certain circumstances, been accepted as a direct answer to the claim for rent. Obviously the defender's claims for damage for miscropping are not in the same sense a direct answer to the pursuer's claim in this action, and they have not been so pleaded. They are pleaded on record in the form of compensation, but it is clear that the claims not being liquid that plea cannot be given effect to, and it was not insisted in at the hearing. What the defender did claim was the right of retention, which he asked should be given effect to, either by conjoining the actions or sisting the process. I think there is distinct authority against conjoining an action founded on an illiquid claim with one founded on a liquid claim, and no precedent or authority for a different course was cited to me. . . ."

† The lease (which was produced) provided that in August in the year of removal the quantity of the grain crop should be ascertained by arbiters, and that the proprietor or incoming tenant should then be at liberty to take possession thereof, the price to be according to the fiars' prices to be fixed in the following spring.

[1] Lovie v. Baird's Trustees, Oct. 16, 1895, supra, p. 1.

[2] Macrae v. Gordon, June 1, 1842, 4 D. 1310, 14 Scot. Jur. 423; M'Rae v. M'Pherson, Nov. 19, 1843, 6 D. 302, 16 Scot. Jur. 169.

No. 62.
Dec. 13, 1895.
Sutherland v. Urquhart.

tion with the lease. The allegation is that when the tenant removed from the farm the defender entered into a submission with him to fix the value of the grain crop upon the farm, that upon the value being ascertained the landlord took the grain crop over at the fixed sum of £136, 7s. 7d., and that at the date of the valuation the pursuer was due to the defender a balance of rent amounting to £62, 6s. 7d. Then the pursuer says that he is willing to admit his liability for the rent, but that the defender refuses to pay him the balance that still remains of the valued price of the grain crop. I agree with the Sheriff that the only defence to this action, which is that the tenant is liable in damages for miscropping, and failure to upkeep buildings, is an attempt to set off an illiquid claim of damages against a liquid claim of debt. The case appears to me to afford a very simple instance of the rule that no such right of retention or claim to set off can be allowed. The landlord has bought and received the grain crop at a fixed price, and he then claims to set off, against the right of the seller to obtain payment of the price, an illiquid counter claim of damages. Such a defence cannot be sustained.

The Sheriff refers to a series of cases, in which it was held that a claim for rent might be compensated by a counter claim on the part of a tenant, though the amount of the rent due was fixed by the lease, and therefore was so far liquid. But these decisions have no application to the present case. They are all illustrations of the rule that one party to a mutual contract cannot enforce the obligations in his favour, while at the same time he refuses to implement the counter obligations to the other party. It does not affect that rule that the landlord's claim for rent is ex facie of the lease a liquid claim, because the case against him—in this class of cases—is that the full amount so fixed is not due, the tenant not having received the full consideration in respect that he has not been put in full possession of the subjects of the lease.

The case of Lovie v. Baird's Trustees,[1] on which the appellant founded, appears to me simply another illustration of the same rule. But I think that there was in that case another ground very clearly distinguishing it from the present. In that case the tenant was in arrear of rent, and the landlord had claims for rent against him extending over a considerable period. The tenant met these by counter claims, which were illiquid in themselves, but before the controversy was at an end the termination of the lease arrived, and as a consequence the tenant was required to give over to the landlord (or to the incoming tenant) certain houses, grass, fallow land, and dung, upon condition that he should be paid "according to the valuation of men mutually chosen as aforesaid, for the value of all sown grass, for the dung made upon the farm subsequent to the time of turnip sowing in the previous year, for the value of labour done to the break, for green crop or fallow land in that year." Now, upon that supposition the value of these things was fixed, and the tenant then brought an action against the landlord for the amount of the valuation irrespective altogether of the landlord's claims against him. It was held that the landlord was entitled to a proof of his claims, and to retain the amount of the valuation. But then the landlord's claim was just as liquid as the tenant's, for his claim was for arrears of rent, which [1] Oct. 16, 1895, supra, p. 1.

No. 62.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Sutherland v. Urquhart.

was a liquid sum—the tenant's was for the amount of the valuation. Both parties were claiming on counter obligations in a mutual contract. In this case the contract on which the tenant founds is separable if not separate from the lease. The landlord according to his own statement has received the entire consideration for the money which he is now asked to pay. Accordingly this case does not fall under the rule of the cases to which I have adverted.

It appears to me, therefore, that the judgment of the Sheriff in the action at the instance of the tenant must be affirmed.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff.

HENRY & SCOTT, W.S.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

THE TAYPORT LAND COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Johnston—Cullen.

MRS MAITLAND DOUGALL AND OTHERS (Dougall's Trustees) AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—D. Dundas—Craigie.

Superior and Vassal—Ultra vires—Feu-charter—Title to sue—Reduction by vassal of the feu-contract in favour of his predecessor on the ground that it was ultra vires of the granter.—A feu granted by trustees in 1867 was sold by the vassal in 1888 to A, who recorded the disposition in his favour in the Register of Sasines, and thereby obtained an implied entry.

In 1895 A raised an action against the trustees for reduction of the feu-charter, on the ground that it was ultra vires of the trustees.

Held that the ground of reduction stated was not relevant, in respect (1) that the pursuer, if prejudiced, was not prejudiced by the feu-charter, but by the contract he had made with the original vassal, to which the trustees were not parties; (2) that the pursuer, being an entered vassal, was not entitled to reduce the feu-contract without clearing the record of the disposition in his favour.

Observed, that if the pursuer succeeded in reducing the disposition in his favour, he would then have no title or interest to reduce the feu-charter.

Prescription.—Question, whether a feu-charter granted by trustees in 1867, and bearing to be granted in the exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of Parliament (which was mentioned), and only in so far as consistent with the Act, could be validated by prescriptive possession, so as to exclude the plea that it was ultra vires of the trustees in respect that the conditions of the Act had not been complied with.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.

MRS ELIZABETH MAITLAND DOUGALL AND OTHERS being infeft as trustees in the estate of Scotscraig under a trust-disposition which conferred no power to feu, obtained an Act, entitled the Scotscraig Estate Act, 1857, whereby they were authorised to feu part of the estate, subject to certain conditions.

In 1867 the Scotscraig trustees feued two portions of the estate to David Stewart Littlejohn and James Henderson by separate feu-charters.

Littlejohn and Henderson continued to possess the pieces of ground feued to them until the year 1888, when they sold and disponed their feus to the Tayport Land Company for £1000.

In 1895 the Tayport Land Company brought an action against the Scotscraig trustees, and against Mrs Elizabeth Maitland Dougall, as the liferentrix in possession of that estate, for reduction of the two feu-charters granted by the Scotscraig trustees in 1867, with all that

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895. Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

had followed or might follow thereon; and further, whether the feu-charters should be reduced or not, for declarator that the granting of the feu-charters was ultra vires of the granters thereof under the Scotscraig Estate Act, 1857, and that the feu-charters did not constitute valid feu-rights, and that the defenders were not entitled to require from the pursuers implement of the obligations which bore to be prestable from the vassals thereunder.

The pursuers set forth the disposition by Littlejohn and Henderson in their favour, dated 28th November and recorded in the General Register of Sasines 4th December 1888. (Cond. 2) "The title of the said David Stewart Littlejohn and James Henderson to the said two pieces of ground purported to consist of two feu-charters granted in their favour by Mrs Elizabeth Kinnear Heriot Maitland Dougall of Scotscraig, . . . and others, trustees under the trust-disposition and deed of assumption therein mentioned, as authorised by an Act of Parliament, 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 50, styled the Scotscraig Estate Act, 1857, . . . dated both of said feu-charters the 14th and 19th February, and both recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines, &c., for the shire of Fife on 5th March 1867. . . . By each of said feu-charters there bears to be feued a piece of ground, part of the farm of Garpit, on the estate of Scotscraig, consisting of 1 acre 3 roods 6 poles and 7 yards or thereby imperial measure, being the two pieces of ground more particularly described in the summons. Each of the feu-charters contains a clause declaring that the same is granted 'only in so far as consistent with the Scotscraig Estate Act.'" (Cond. 3) " . . . In the course of last year the pursuer ascertained that the said feu-charters are inept and invalid, in respect that the granting thereof was ultra vires of the Scotscraig trustees under the said Scotscraig Estate Act. By the said Act, under the authority of which the charters bear to be granted, power is conferred on the said trustees to feu a certain portion of the estate, but it is by section 2 of the Act provided, inter alia, that the lands which may be sold and disponed in feu under the authority of the Act shall only be feued 'in parcels to an extent not greater than one imperial acre and a-half or thereby for each feu.' As above set forth, each of the said feu-charters bears to feu a piece of ground extending to 1 acre 3 roods 6 poles and 7 yards imperial measure."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect the said feu-charters were made ultra vires of the granters thereof under the Act of Parliament, they are invalid and ineffectual to constitute feu-rights of the pieces of ground in question, and ought to be reduced. (2) In respect the said feu-charters do not constitute valid feu-rights, the defenders are not entitled to require from the pursuer performance of the obligations of vassal thereunder.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) No relevant case. (3) On a sound construction of the Scotscraig Estate Act, 1857, the said charters being unchallengeable, the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, with expenses. (4) The pursuer and the pursuer's authors having possessed the ground contained in said charters on ex facie valid irredeemable titles, recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines, for the space of more than twenty years continually and together, peaceably and without any lawful interruption made, and separatim, they having accepted said charters from the defenders, the pursuer is barred from insisting in the present action of reduction and declarator.

On 17th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) assoilzied the defenders.*

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895.

Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuers now seek to reduce those feu-charters, on the ground that it was ultra vires of the Scotscraig trustees to grant feus to the extent of one acre and three-quarters, as the private Act only gave them power to feu in parcels not greater than one acre and a half or thereby. Put baldly, the question is, Whether, when trustees are empowered to grant feus of an acre and a half or thereby the grant is to be set aside, after an interval of twenty years, because the extent of the feu granted was an acre and three-quarters, and this not at the instance of a beneficiary, but because the feuar wishes to be quit of his bargain? When a purchaser having, equally with the seller, means of forming an opinion as to the powers of the seller, accepts a feu, there is much force in the plea that he is personally barred from raising such an action. But passing from that, the words 'or thereby' are usually somewhat narrowly construed, as for instance the case of Yeaman v. Gilruth, 1792, Hume's Dec. 783. In that case the Court, in confining the expression to 'minute errors or fractional deficiency,' may have been partly influenced by the consideration that, in their opinion, the gross rent was fixed with reference to the particular number of acres specified. Here there is not the same necessity for such a rigid construction; and there may have been reasons, which at this distance of time it may not be easy to establish, such as the position and shape of the ground, which led to and justified feus of that exceptional extent being granted. Still, an addition equal to one sixth of the whole extent permitted by the Act is somewhat liberal, and I prefer to rest my judgment on other grounds. I am of opinion that the pursuers' case is excluded by prescription, which operates in more ways than one. The pursuers' authors and themselves have possessed the ground in question for more than twenty years upon ex facie valid titles, and therefore, by force of the Acts, 1617, c. 12, and the Conveyancing Act of 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 34, the titles to their feus are unchallengeable.

"Therefore, the sole ground of reduction, viz., that the feu-charters are invalid, entirely fails; and the pursuers have no valid excuse for refusing to pay the feu-duties stipulated for in their titles, to which feu-duties again the defenders have prescriptive right.

"The pursuers' counsel argued that the feu-charters are not ex facie valid, in respect that they bear to be granted under the authority of the Scotscraig Estate Act, 1857; and that, when that Act is examined, it is seen that the feus exceed the dimensions permitted by the Act. This contention, in my opinion, is unsound, and there is ample authority against it. On the face of the deeds there is nothing to shew that they are inconsistent with the powers conferred by the Scotscraig Estate Act. The object of the positive prescription is to prevent inquiry into the validity of the warrants on which a grant of lands proceeds; and there is no authority for importing by reference into a feu-charter the terms of an Act of Parliament in virtue of which it bears to have been granted. To cite one authority, the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Cunynghame, 5 Sh. 57, is directly in point. In that case the defender's titles bore that the Crown had right to the superiority of the lands disponed by virtue of the Act of Annexation, 1587, c. 29. After the lands had been possessed for upwards of forty years the right of the holder was challenged, on the ground that, in the Act of Annexation, there is an express exception of the right of the Crown to lay patronages; that therefore the titles were inept, being derived a non habente potestatem; and that, as the Act of Annexation was a public statute, and reference was expressly made to it in the charter, the defender must be held to have known that his titles were derived a non habente potestatem. But the case for the pursuer was held to be untenable. The judgment proceeded on the ground that, the title being ex facie valid, it was not permissible to

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895. Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The charters were ultra vires of the trustees. The words "or thereby" were not intended to enable the trustees deliberately to grant feus in excess of the size specified in the Act, but only to cover slight errors in measurement.[1] They were to be all the more strictly construed as they occurred in an Act of Parliament. (2) The defect in the charters was patent, as each was granted only in so far as consistent with, and subject to, the conditions in the Act. The defect, therefore, could not be cured by prescription. In the cases of the Duke of Buccleuch[2] and Macdonald[2] the defect was not apparent on the face of the titles, but required extrinsic evidence to disclose it.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The words "or thereby" were evidently intended to give the trustees a discretion. They should, therefore, be liberally construed, and the trustees could not be held to have exceeded the limits of the discretion given them. (2) Assuming, however, that the charters were ultra vires, the limitation in the trustees' power was not set forth in the deed, and the defect was therefore latent.[2] Prior to 1874 conditions could not be validly imported into a deed by reference, and after that date only by reference to a recorded deed.[3] The case was, therefore, similar to that of a grant a non habente potestatem, and the object of the law of prescription was to bar inquiry into such defects after the prescriptive period.[4] (3) Further, as the condition had not been validly imported into the charters, and did not appear on record, the pursuers, being singular successors of the original vassal, could not be bound thereby.[5] (4) But if the defect were held to be patent, then the pursuers, having accepted a conveyance in knowledge of the defect, could not found upon it as a ground for repudiating the charters.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is well

---

read into it the terms of the Act of Annexation which, if read in, would have shewn that the grant was ultra vires. . . .

"It was also maintained that prescription cannot validate a breach of trust. That, again, is not a plea which is open to the pursuers. If their right to their feus has been validated by prescription running against the trustees, it does not matter to them what claims of damages the beneficiaries may have against the trustees. Prescription will not protect trustees from the consequences of a breach of trust against a claim at the instance of a beneficiary, and they will not be entitled to retain trust property or profit for their own benefit so obtained. But it does not follow that the party in whose favour a charter of part of the trust-estate has in breach of trust been granted, and whose right has been fortified against all concerned by the running of prescription, is entitled to found upon the breach of trust for the purpose of getting rid of his bargain when his right is not challenged either by the trustees or by the beneficiaries.

"On the whole, I am of opinion that the defenders should be assoilzied."

[1] Yeaman v. Gilruth, 1792, Hume's Dec. 783.

[2] The Duke of Buccleuch v. Cunynghame, Nov. 30, 1826, 5 S. 57; Macdonald v. Lockhart, Dec. 22, 1842, 5 D. 372, 15 Scot. Jur. 169.

[3] Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 32.

[4] Lord Advocate v. Graham, Dec. 10, 1867, 7 D. 183, per Lord Moncreiff, p. 205, 17 Scot. Jur. 90.

[5] Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Aug. 3, 1840, 1 Robinson, 296, per Lord Gillies, &c., at p. 313.

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

founded, although I am not prepared to assent to all the reasons which his Lordship has given in support of it.

The pursuers seek for reduction of two feu-charters dated in 1867, as having been "made and executed to their great hurt and prejudice." But they were not parties to the contract in performance of which the charters were granted; they do not represent either of the parties, and they do not allege any antecedent right or interest in the lands. Their case is that, in 1888, twenty-one years after the execution of the charters, they purchased the lands from the original feuars for a sum of £1000, and accepted a disposition which they recorded in the Register of Sasines. It follows that if they have been prejudiced it is not by the making and execution of the charters, but by a subsequent contract of purchase and sale to which the granters of the charters were no parties. But they do not complain of the transaction by which they have been brought into the position of vassals. They do not propose to reduce the contract or the disposition by which it was carried into effect. If they obtained decree, therefore, the original charters which form the foundation of their title would be reduced, but they would still continue to hold the lands of and under the defenders as superiors by virtue of charters by progress, because the registration of the disposition in their favour is equivalent to infeftment and entry by confirmation, and neither the infeftment nor the entry would be touched by the decree. This would be a fatal objection to the present action if the pursuers' case were otherwise well founded. They cannot obtain a decree which would impugn the validity of the feu-right without effectually clearing the record, and it is unnecessary to say that a general conclusion for the reduction of all that may have followed upon the charters would be totally unavailing to strike a recorded deed out of the Register of Sasines. But it is evident from the condescendence that this is not only a technical defect in the structure of the summons. The objection goes to the very foundation of the pursuers' case on the merits. For they have alleged no ground in fact or law on which they could pretend a right to set aside their contract with the sellers, or to reject the title which has been given to them in fulfilment of it, and which they have in fact accepted. The Lord Ordinary suggests that the pursuers are practically the same persons as the sellers. But the facts to which his Lordship refers are not before us, and in a discussion on relevancy we must take their own account of themselves and their relation to the other parties to be correct. Now, they represent themselves to be perfectly independent purchasers from the original vassals. Their complaint is that the defenders, who hold the estate of Scotscraig in trust, have exceeded the power to feu conferred upon them by a private Act of Parliament—the Scotscraig Estate Act—inasmuch as the Act authorises them to feu "in parcels to an extent not greater than one imperial acre and a-half or thereby"; whereas each of the feu-charters in question bears to feu a piece of ground extending to an acre and three-quarters. The defenders answer that the deviation of a quarter of an acre from the fixed standard does not exceed the reasonable latitude allowed by the qualifying words "or thereby," and they point out that such decisions as that referred to by the Lord Ordinary, where these words were used with reference to a specific area which had been actually measured, and were intended

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895. Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

to allow for errors of measurement and nothing else, can have no bearing on their construction when they are used to regulate the discretion of trustees in the administration of a feuing estate. This answer is at least plausible, but I express no opinion as to its validity on the one hand or the merits of the objection on the other, because the persons who would have a title to impugn the charter on this ground are not now before us, and would not be bound by a decision in this action if they are not bound by the actings of the trustees. I assume, therefore, for the present purpose, although I am by no means satisfied, that the charters may be challengeable at the instance of the fiar to whom the estate of Scotscraig may open on the expiry of the liferent. But this infirmity of the pursuers' title, if it exists, does not arise from any failure or breach of contract on the part of their vendors. It is a quality of the right which formed the subject of the contract of sale; and on their own shewing it is a quality which is patent on the face of the charters, and was perfectly well known to them when they made the purchase. For they aver, and it is the fact, that each of the feu-charters contains a clause "Declaring that these presents are granted only in so far as consistent with the Scotscraig Estate Act, and subject to all the conditions of the said Act," and therefore the original vassals and purchasers who may acquire right from them are duly certiorated that the authority of the granters is defined by the Act of Parliament, and further, that they do not undertake to warrant the validity of the grant except in so far as it may be consistent with the Act. The purchaser of a feu-right so constituted cannot set aside his contract on the ground that he has discovered an inconsistency between the Act of Parliament and the grant, because the bargain is that he shall take the title subject to that inconvenience. The pursuers do not allege that the Act of Parliament was withheld from them, or that there was any material error or any concealment or misrepresentation which would enable them to avoid the contract. They do not even aver explicitly that they were not perfectly well aware before the contract was completed of the alleged discrepancy between the charter and the Act of Parliament. What they say is that in the course of last year they ascertained that, and that may perhaps imply that they did not know it before. But we must assume that the charters and the Act of Parliament were both before them. They either read the Act or took the risk of what it might contain, and they cannot be allowed to say, after they have accepted a conveyance, that anything the Act contains is a new discovery to them. Accordingly, they do not attempt to set aside the contract of sale, and they do not allege any ground on which they would be entitled to do so. The assumption of the action is that the sale is perfectly valid and binding, and consequently that they were required to accept and record a conveyance, and so take over the land with its liabilities, and enter with the superior in place of the disponers, because otherwise they would have no title or interest to complain of the charters. They have no contract with the superior except that which they have made by entering to the lands in accordance with their obligation to the original vassal. But they cannot be bound to the vassal disponing to accept the title as it stands, and at the same time entitled to reject it as insufficient, and set it aside as against the superior, because they have no right against

No. 63.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

the superior except that which they derive from the disponers, and that is only the right to enter in room and place of the disponers under the charter as it stands. There is no suggestion on record that the original vassals could have set aside the charters. It appears that they continued to possess for twenty years without raising any question whatever as to their liability as vassals, and we are bound to assume in the first place that their title expresses exactly the terms of the contract on which they agreed to take the lands, and secondly, that they were perfectly well aware when they accepted it of everything that is contained in the Act of Parliament, and therefore that they had no right to complain of the defect which the pursuers allege. But if that be so, the original vassals cannot get rid of their liability except by finding a disponee to take their place. But the disponee can have no other right as against the superior but that of the disponer in whose place he stands, and therefore it seems to me to be out of the question to maintain that he can reduce a feu-charter which was unimpeachable at the instance of the disponer, and so extinguish the feu-right and relieve the disponer as well as himself of all liabilities of the contract of feu. But I do not think their case would be better if we were to assume, contrary to the fair implication of their own statement, that they were entitled to get rid of their contract as against the original vassals. They appear to me to be in this dilemma. If the contract with the original vassals is unimpeachable they have no ground of complaint, because they have obtained exactly the right which they contracted to purchase. If, on the other hand, they are entitled to get rid of the contract of sale and its consequences, their remedy is to reduce the disposition on which they are entered, and in that case they have no concern with the lands, and no title or interest to object to the charters.

On the whole, therefore, I am unable to see any tenable ground on which the action can be supported.

In the view I have taken the question whether the pursuers' right has been validated by the positive prescription does not arise, and I think we should not consider it, both because it is not necessary to the decision of the case and also because it cannot, in my opinion, be well raised or effectually decided between the parties to this action. It can only arise on the assumption that the defenders have, in the first place, exceeded their powers by including too large an area in one feu, and, in the second place, failed to protect the trust-estate by importing the conditions of the statute into the title which they granted to the pursuers' authors in such a way as to make them binding upon singular successors, because it is obvious that the vassal cannot prescribe against his own title, and therefore cannot acquire a right inconsistent with the conditions of the Act of Parliament, if these have been well expressed in the title. Accordingly, to enable the defenders to maintain their plea of prescription, they found it necessary to argue that the conditions of the Act of Parliament have not been made to affect the title, because they have not been so expressed as to satisfy the requirements either of the Act itself, which prescribes the method by which its conditions are to be made effectual, or of the general law established by the Conveyancing Statute. I doubt whether the trustees have any title to state that plea. The assumption of the argument is that the pursuers' title

No. 63.
Dec. 13, 1895.
Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees.

may be challenged as ultra vires of the trustees at the instance of some future beneficiary who will not be bound by their actings, or by the concurrence of all the existing beneficiaries in the defence stated in this action. But if such a hypothetical beneficiary, at whose instance the title might be challenged, is not bound by the acts of the trustees, he will not be bound by a judgment pronounced upon a plea stated by the trustees to support their acts. I should therefore have thought that, if the trustees were otherwise entitled to insist in their argument founded upon prescription, this is not a competent action for its disposal, because the judgment would not afford a conclusive answer to the beneficiary whose challenge is assumed as the ground of the trustees' title to maintain the argument in question.

LORD ADAM and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

JAMES S. STURROCK, W.S.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 64.
Dec. 13, 1895.*
Gibson v. Clark.

ALEXANDER GIBSON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Salvesen—W. Thomson.
JOHN GILCHRIST CLARK AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Dickson—Clyde.

Landlord and Tenant—Desertion of farm—Appointment of manager—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Judicial Factor—Reduction.—Where a tenant has deserted a farm without making proper provision for its management, it is competent for the Sheriff, on the petition of the landlord, to appoint an interim manager.

A landlord, on 31st August 1894, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for the appointment of a manager upon a farm, alleging that the tenant had almost entirely displenished the farm, had left it without appointing any manager, and was believed to have gone to America without the intention of returning. No appearance was entered for the tenant, who had left for America on 24th August, and the Sheriff, without inquiry, made the appointment craved, and by an interlocutor dated 10th October, pronounced a fortnight after the tenant had returned to his farm, approved the manager's report of his management, and granted him a discharge.

Thereafter the tenant raised an action against the landlord concluding for reduction of the decree appointing the manager, and of the subsequent interlocutors, on the ground that the application to the Sheriff was incompetent, and that, in any view, the Sheriff was not entitled to grant the petition without making inquiry. He averred that he had not deserted the farm, but had been merely temporarily absent from it. He made no claim for damages in the action, and did not aver that he had suffered pecuniary loss by the defender's proceedings. He stated, however, that he reserved his claim for damages in respect thereof.

After a proof the Court (diss. Lord M'Laren, aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) assoilzied the defender, holding that in the absence of any claim for damages the only ground of action which fell to be considered was the competency of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court, and that as it had been proved that the landlord had reasonable grounds for believing that the tenant had deserted his farm without making any proper provision for its management, these proceedings were competent.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) (1) that the tenant had done nothing of which the landlord had a right to complain; (2) that the ex parte statement

* Decided Nov. 29, 1895.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

of fact upon which the landlord had obtained the decree depriving the tenant of the management of his farm having been disproved, the landlord was responsible therefor, upon the principle recognised in cases where interdict had been obtained upon an erroneous ex parte statement, and that the landlord's bona fides was no relevant defence; and (3) that the tenant's action of reduction, at all events in so far as regarded the Sheriff's interlocutor approving the manager's report and discharging him, was competent.

Observed by Lord Kinnear, that the pursuer was not entitled to reduce, as a decree in absence, the interlocutor approving the manager's account of his intromissions and discharging him, as he had not averred that the interlocutor was wrong.

Opinion on the question whether the analogy of an action for wrongous use of interdict was applicable to such a proceeding as the petition reserved, per Lord Kinnear.

Brock v. Buchanan, 13 D. 1069, followed; Affleck v. Affleck, 24 D. 291, commented on.

Process—Citation—Edictal Citation—Sheriff Court Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 70), sec. 9.—The Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 9, enacts that "the Sheriff Clerk shall, in all warrants to cite or charge persons furth of Scotland, insert a warrant to cité or charge edictally." A landlord presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for the appointment of a manager upon a farm, alleging that the tenant had deserted the farm and gone to America. The warrant of citation contained no warrant to cite the respondent edictally, and the petition was served by leaving a copy at the farmhouse, where his family continued to reside. No appearance having been entered for the tenant, the petition was granted. The tenant, who returned to this country within a month, brought an action of reduction of the appointment of the manager on the ground, inter alia, that there had been no edictal citation. In the action he averred that he had been only temporarily absent from the farm. The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) repelled the plea, on the ground that if the defender's absence was temporary edictal citation was not necessary.

Process—Citation—Execution of Citation.—In a Sheriff Court petition the service copy of the petition bore a citation dated 1st September, requiring the defender to lodge a notice of appearance "within forty-eight hours after the date of this my citation"; the execution returned upon the petition bore that it was served upon the 31st August; and the Sheriff pronounced decree in absence on 3d September.

In a reduction of the execution, held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that in the absence of other contradictory evidence than the service copy of the petition, with the citation thereon, the date of the execution fell to be taken as the date of service, and that the inducice fell to be reckoned therefrom.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action brought by Alexander Gibson, tenant, under a fifteen years' lease, of the farm of Birkbush, against his landlord, John Gilchrist Clark, of Speddoch, and also against Alexander Smith, gardener, Speddoch, to have certain proceedings taken by the landlord in the Sheriff Court during the tenant's absence reduced.

The proceedings in question were as follows:—

On 31st August 1894, when three years of Mr Gibson's lease had still to run, Mr Clark presented a petition against him in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, in which the prayer was:—"To appoint a fit and proper person to take charge of the lands and farm of Birkbush, in the parish of Irongray and stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and stock and effects thereon, presently tenanted by the said Alexander Gibson, and to labour and cultivate the whole lands requiring to be laboured and cultivated for the year ending at Whitsunday, and separation of crop 1895, and to reap the crops presently growing on the said farm, in order that the pursuer's rights may not be prejudiced; also to purchase all seeds and manures that may be required for the proper cultivation of the land, and generally to do everything necessary in order that the present crop may be suitably reaped, and the crop of 1895 suitably and seasonably sown, and to deal with the crops, stock, and effects thereon, including the selling and disposing thereof, in such way as he may consider best, and to report to your Lordship an account of his outlays and intromissions and management foresaid, and to decern against the defender for whatever balance may become due thereon, with expenses of management and process, reserving to the pursuer all claims competent to him for rent, interest, and expenses, and for damages or otherwise."

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

The petitioner, Mr Clark, averred,—"The defender is in insolvent circumstances, and diligence has recently been used against him at the instance of certain creditors. He has recently removed the most of his stock from the farm to the extent of almost entirely displenishing the same, and he has left the farm without instructing any proper person to take charge thereof. It is believed that he has gone to America without any intention of returning. The corn crop and the meadow hay crop of the current year are ripe for cutting, and require to be immediately cut and stacked, and, unless immediately attended to, are in danger of being lost, to the prejudice of the pursuer as proprietor and his legal rights, unless an immediate remedy be obtained in the premises as herein prayed for. The pursuer respectfully suggests Mr Alexander Smith, gardener, Speddoch, parish of Holywood, as a suitable person to act as manager."

The petitioner pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having left the farm without making suitable arrangements for the reaping of this year's crops, involving not only the loss of said crops but also the deterioration of the land to the prejudice of the pursuer and the defender's creditors, a manager should be appointed in terms of the prayer of the petition.

Upon 31st August 1894 Honorary Sheriff-substitute Williamson granted warrant "to cite the defender upon forty-eight hours' warning."

The formal execution of this citation bore that the petition had been served upon Mr Gibson by leaving a copy in the hands of a servant at Birkbush "upon the 31st August 1894."

The service copy of the petition bore this citation:—

"I, . . . sheriff-officer, do hereby lawfully serve the foregoing copy petition, . . . and deliverance thereon, upon you, . . . and require you, if you intend to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge . . . a notice of appearance within forty-eight hours after the date of this my citation, . . . all in terms of the [Citation Amendment Act, 1882.] said deliverance.

J. M. S. 3 September

"This I do upon the [Thirty] first day of ^[August] Eighteen hundred and [eighty] 94 years." *

On 3d September 1894 the Honorary Sheriff-substitute, "in respect the defender has not entered appearance," appointed Mr Smith to take charge of the farm, with all the powers craved.

Mr Smith thereafter entered upon his duties, and sold the whole corn, hay, and potatoes, and a portion of the turnip crop on the ground by public roup. Upon 9th October 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) remitted Mr Smith's account of expenses to the Auditor,

* The words within brackets were deleted in the citation.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

and on 10th October 1894 he approved of the Auditor's report upon the pursuer's account of expenses, and also of the manager's report of his management produced, found that there was no balance in the hands of the manager, and discharged the manager of his intromissions.

Mr Gibson raised the present action of reduction on 16th October 1894 against Mr Clark, and also against Mr Smith, concluding for reduction of (first) the warrant of citation in the petition, dated 31st August 1894; (second) "a pretended service of said petition," dated 1st September 1894; (third) the interlocutor of 3d September 1894; (fourth) the interlocutor of 9th October 1894; and (fifth) the interlocutor of 10th October 1894.

The pursuer, inter alia, averred that the statements made by the defender in the petition in the Sheriff Court were not true; that he had left the farm on 24th August 1894 to visit Canada and the United States, partly on business and partly on pleasure; that he had made arrangements for the management of the farm during his absence; and that he had returned on 22d September 1894.

The pursuer further averred;—"No warrant to cite the defender edictally was craved, and none was granted. On the first day of September following, a service copy of the petition with citation thereon, herewith produced and herein held repeated brevitatis causa, was left for the pursuer at his residence of Birkbush aforesaid, which he did not receive until his return home. On 3d September 1894, before the expiry of the induciæ, and on the motion of the agent for the petitioner, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced a pretended interlocutor or decree appointing the said Alexander Smith manager. . . ." "The pursuer reserves his claim of damages in respect of said illegal and oppressive proceedings."

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The said pretended decrees or interlocutors having been pronounced irregularly, and incompetently, ought to be reduced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. 2. The said pretended decrees or interlocutors are reducible in respect they were pronounced (1) in a petition which was incompetent in the Sheriff Court; (2) in a petition at the instance of a person who had no title or interest to insist in the same; (3) the warrant for service being irregular and incompetent; (4) the service following thereon being irregular and incompetent; (5) the procedure in said petition was incompetent and contrary to the provisions of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876; and (6) the granting of the prayer of the petition, without inquiry into the facts was incompetent and ultra vires; and (7) the interlocutor making the said appointment was void from uncertainty and ambiguity. 3. In the circumstances condescended on, the pretended decrees or interlocutors ought to be reduced, and the defender, John Gilchrist Clark, found liable in expenses, and also the defender Alexander Smith, in the event of his entering appearance to defend this action.

The defender pleaded;—1. The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient at law to support the conclusions of the summons the defender is entitled to absolvitor. 4. The whole proceedings in said petition having been regularly and orderly taken, the same ought not to be reduced. 5. The said petition having been presented in the circumstances condescended on, and the proceedings thereunder having all been taken and carried out in good faith, and without infringement of the pursuer's rights and interests, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 21st February 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) repelled

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

the pursuer's plea that the warrant for service was irregular and incompetent; quoad ultra before further answer allowed parties a proof.*

At the proof the pursuer led the following evidence:—Alexander Gibson, pursuer (47), deponed,—" . . . Birkbush is mostly pastoral land, and it can carry from six to seven score of sheep. My experience of it is that it is more fit for a sheep farm than for anything else. . . . I first had it as a sheep farm, and then finding that the fences were not very good I thought I would try it as a dairy farm, and I made the change about Martinmas 1892. . . ." Witness then deponed that he obtained twelve cows, and let them on a bowing contract to a man Mackenzie. "He was my bower for half a year only. The next bower was Thomas Kirk, and he paid me £8 a cow per annum, and £7 each for three queys. I found all along that the place was evidently not suitable for a dairy farm. I had difficulty with Mackenzie as well as Kirk, and they were always making complaints. They complained about a weed called a leek, which was on the farm at a certain season of the year, and which made the milk bitter. Kirk also complained about there being no proper milk-house in which to make his cheeses; the usual place was too near the midden, and he had to make his cheeses in the straw-house. I made up my mind to change the farm back again into a sheep farm, and with that object in view I arranged with Kirk, whose contract was hardly out, that I should sell the cows. The sale of the cows took place about 22d August 1894, but I arranged with Kirk before, that, under the circumstances, that was as good a time as I could get to sell the cows. . . . I was intending when I came back to put sheep upon the farm, and it would do the grass good in the meantime to be cleaned so as to be ready for the sheep. After I returned from America I bought 116 sheep for the purpose at the first market for ewes. . . . I went to America to see the country and the land, and I went along with a Mr Green. The date when I left the farm was about the 24th August, and I sailed from Liverpool. The defenders aver on record that I left a young family without means of support, but that is not true. My family consists of John, twenty-two years of age, who is a butcher in Maxwelltown, Maggie, nineteen, James, fifteen, Annie, thirteen, Alexandrina, ten, Jessie, nine, and Thomas, seven. I am a widower, and my daughter Maggie acts as my housekeeper. When I left for America I left £35 with my daughter. . . . I told my family that I intended going to America. (Q.) Did you tell them that you were just

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuer objects to the warrant of citation. This objection is founded on section 9 of the Sheriff Court Act (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), which enacts that 'the Sheriff-clerk shall, in all warrants to cite or charge persons furth of Scotland, insert a warrant to cite or charge edictally.' There is no warrant to cite edictally in the warrant in this case, and it is said that there should have been such a warrant, because the petitioner, in the Sheriff Court petition, states his belief that the present pursuer had gone to America without intention to return. But the pursuer cannot maintain the plea, because he denies that he had left the country without intention to return. I think that the clause does not require edictal citation whenever a defender happens to be temporarily abroad, but means only that when the circumstances are such as to necessitate edictal citation, according to ordinary practice in the Court of Session, a special warrant for it shall be issued by the Sheriff-clerk. I think that I am in a position to repel the plea that the warrant for service was incompetent."

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

going for a visit? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And that you would be back in a few weeks? (A.) Yes. I also told Mr Edgar of Killyleoch where I was going, and I also told my son John. . . . I arranged with Thomas Kirk, the bower, that he was to look after my harvest, and that in return for that he should get £6, 10s. and his own food. Kirk had a servant girl, about seventeen or eighteen years of age, who used to do the milking, and I arranged that she should get £4, 10s. for helping with the harvest. There was also a man called Peter Thomson, who had taken the cutting of my hay, and I arranged with him that he should help with the reaper, and I would pay him when I returned. . . . About ten days before I left I also arranged with two women, who had been in the custom of working to me at different times, to help with the harvest. . . . I went to America with Mr Green, whom I had known for twenty years, and he was going there at that time at anyrate. My object in going to America was to look at land there, with a view to possibly returning there at some future date. I went down through Canada to America. . . . I returned home from America on Saturday morning about 22d September last. . . . There were from twelve to fourteen acres of corn to cut. I had left quite sufficient hands to do all that was required, and with the reaping machine which belonged to me they would have cut the corn in six or seven days. . . . Before leaving I had sold twelve cows and about two score of ewes, mostly fat. That was the proper time to sell the ewes. I left on the farm two horses and a pony, three cows, and the usual farm poultry. At the time I left there were also on the farm, summering, seventy sheep, for which I received 4d. a week of rent. It is quite the usual thing for farmers down in my district to let out their pasture in that way. I have as cautioner for my rent a lady who is a landed proprietrix. . . . At the date of these proceedings there was no rent due by me. The statements in the petition as to my being in insolvent circumstances, leaving the farm without proper care, and going to America without any intention of returning, are all untrue. Cross.—The extent of my farm will be something like 297 acres. About 125 acres of that is hill pasture, and the balance is arable and open wood. The open wood will extend to possibly ten acres. I kept it as a sheep farm down till 1889, and since then it has been mostly a dairy farm. (Q.) When you had sheep on the farm down till 1889, what did you do with the arable land? (A.) I let the sheep come down from the hill. The three cows that were left were part of those let to Kirk. . . . I know what became of these cows. Two of them had been got from Mr Brown, and he came and took them back as they had not been paid for. I kept the remaining cow for about three months and sold her. . . . I had no servant on the farm except Kirk, who was engaged for the harvest. The horses were looked after by Kirk and my son, who was about fifteen years of age. (Q.) Did you give any instructions to anybody as to who was to manage the farm when you left? (A.) Kirk was to manage the harvest and the hay, and that was all there was to manage until I returned. . . . From May last year onwards I had one or two summonses served upon me. . . . (Q.) Is it not the case that there were so many summonses against you last year that you cannot remember them all or the dates of them? (A.) I paid every one that was a just debt. . . . Being referred to these summonses, depones,—I still say that I was not in pecuniary difficulties last year. I allowed so many summonses to be raised against me because a good many of the claimants were wanting a third more than I owed them. I believe that there was a cessio raised against me, but that was behind my back, while I was in America. (Q.) Was there anybody to look after your affairs while you were away in America? (A.) My daughter could do anything that was wanted. She is a girl of nineteen. . . . I saw Mrs Kirk on the evening of Friday, 24th August. . . . She asked me where I was going, and I said that I might be at America before I returned. It was not uncertain to me where I was going, but I did not want everyone to know where I went. . . . Re-examined.—(Q.) Did you find that the proceedings to appoint Smith manager of your farm had got known all over the neighbourhood? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Had people imagined from these proceedings that you were bankrupt? (A.) I quite understood that. (Q.) Had the knowledge of these proceedings caused a great many people to raise actions? (A.) Yes." [Witness then deponed that he had inserted a notice in the Dumfries and Galloway Courier of 26th September 1894, requesting persons having claims against him to lodge them with his agent.] "My creditors put in claims, and I have settled with them all."

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

Peter Thomson (56), deponed,—"I was engaged by pursuer to cut his meadow hay. . . . Pursuer made an arrangement with me about helping to cut his corn. . . . I made a road through the corn field for the machine after pursuer went away. . . . I remember when Smith came as manager, and I had cut the roads then. The corn was not ripe then. . . . I remember that we were stopped in our work sometime after pursuer went away. Word came that Symons [solicitor, Dumfries, the landlord's agent] was going to take possession of the crop on the farm. We sent the dairyman's wife down to Symons to see who was to pay us after that, because we thought that if Symons was taking possession of the crop the pursuer had no business to pay us. Symons wanted us to go on, but he refused to give us a line to go on, and we refused to go on any further until we got a line. The result was that we did not go on any further. I remember of Smith coming and taking possession. At the time we stopped work the corn was not quite ripe."

Margaret Gibson (19), deponed,—"I remember of my father going away to America on 24th August last year. He told me that he was going about a week before he left. He said that he was going to look at some land, and that he might be away for three weeks or a month, but he did not know exactly. He told me that he was going with a Mr Green. My father is a dealer and moves about a good deal, and I was not surprised at his going away. Before he left, I got £35 from him to use in the house and to pay workers at the harvest, if there were any. He told me that he had engaged for the harvest two workers from Dunscore, and also Peter Thomson, Thomas Kirk, and Kirk's girl. My immediately younger brother is in the habit of working on the farm and looking after the horses, and he had driven the reaping machine the year before last. . . . I remember that the day after my father left, Mr Symons, solicitor, Dumfries, who acted for the landlord, called. He asked me if the cowman was about, referring to Kirk. I think that would be between five and six o'clock in the evening, but I am not sure. He asked nothing more at me. He did not ask where my father was. He did not ask if I knew anything about where my father had gone, nor did he ask if my father had left me any money. I do not remember exactly when Smith, the manager, first came to the farm. Smith was at the farm before the paper No. 25 [the service copy of the petition for the appointment of a manager] was handed in. He came and took a note of the implements on the farm, and also a note of the furniture before No. 25 was handed in. . . . Smith asked me once if I knew where my father was, and I said I had not had a letter from him and did not know where he was then, meaning at the time he was speaking to me. (Q.) Did you let Mr Smith know that your father would be back in a few weeks? (A.) I do not remember whether I said that or not. I know that my father wrote two letters to my elder brother. My brother told me two or three days after he got the letters, and I saw the letters and read them. . . . Cross.— . . . Besides telling me that he was going away, I know that my father told my brother James and my sister Annie, but I don't know whether he told the others or not. He told my brother and sister the same day as he told me, but not at the same time. That was a week before he left. He told me the day he meant to leave, and I knew that he was going on Friday the 24th August. He told me he was going away on the Friday about a week before that. . . . Between the time my father told me and the time he actually went on the Friday I did not tell anybody he was going away. He told me that he did not wish people to know much about his going away, because they were always saying plenty about things. My father did not give me any reason for not wanting people to know that he was going, and he merely said that he did not wish me to speak about it. . . . The £35 was in notes, and my father got back £22, 10s. of the money on his return. In point of fact I did not pay anything to any of the harvesters at all. . . . Mr Symons and Mr Smith asked me several times where my father was, but I never had a letter from my father until the Thursday before he came home, and he came home on the Saturday. Mr Symons and Mr Smith asked me repeatedly where my father was, but I don't think they asked me where he had gone. When they asked me where my father was, I said I did not know, because I had not heard from him. It did not occur to me to tell them that my father had gone to America, because I did not think it was any of their business. That was partly because my father had asked me not to tell people where he was going to. I know Mr Smith who had the management of the farm. I remember the first time he came up to the farm and asked about my father. He saw me at that time, and I remember of his asking where my father was, my answer to him being that I did not know. . . . Re-examined.—I don't remember whether it was before or after the petition, No. 25, was served that Mr Symons and Mr Smith made the inquiries which I have referred to. Neither Mr Symons nor Mr Smith asked me if my father was away for good or if he was coming back. I never said anything to anybody to lead them to believe that my father had gone to America without any intention of returning, and I knew that was untrue. The people in our neighbourhood gossip a good deal, and I suppose that was the reason why my father did not want me to say anything about his going away. . . . The people were saying that they heard that my father was not going to come back. (Shewn No. 45.) [This was a petition presented by the landlord to the Sheriff on 8th September 1894 for declarator that the lease was at an end, and for removing at Martinmas 1894. It set forth that the tenant had deserted his farm.] That is the petition of removing which was left with me. I read that petition when I got it. (Q.) Were you frightened after reading it

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

that you would be put out of the house? (A.) We knew we would be."

Thomas Kirk (37). Examined.—" . . . In August 1894 the pursuer proposed to me to sell the cows, and I consented to his doing so. . . . He gave me instructions as to looking after the harvest in his absence. It was agreed between us that I was to get a wage of £6 or £6, 10s. for reaping the harvest. At that time I had a girl servant for the milking of the cows, and pursuer said that he would give her £3, 10s. for helping with the harvest. . . . Pursuer also informed me that he had spoken to two women belonging to Dunscore as to helping with the harvest. There was also a man called Peter Thomson, who had been hired for the harvest at another place, but he was to assist us till he went away there. With that staff I think we might have managed to reap the whole harvest, as there was not very much to do. A good deal of the hay had been cut before that time, and the pursuer and his son James had also cut a little of the corn before he went away. Peter Thomson and I cut part of the corn on the top of the field afterwards. As near as I remember, the pursuer left on the Thursday night, and on the following Sunday I had a call from Mr Symons, the solicitor. At that time the stock on the farm consisted of three horses, three cows, seven sheep, and a ewe and lamb; and to the best of my knowledge all the implements were on the place also. Mr Symons came and asked me about the pursuer being away, and he also asked me if I was left in charge of the farm or the crop, and I said I was engaged for the harvest—for the cutting of the crop. I also said that I had heard that morning that the pursuer was going to America, and I asked Mr Symons who would pay us for the cutting of the crop in case the pursuer did not return. Mr Symons replied that if the pursuer returned he would pay us, and if not, somebody would pay us. I was led to speak to Mr Symons about the possibility of the pursuer not returning by the rumour that got up in the country. The pursuer had given me to understand that he was coming back; but after he left a rumour got up that he was not coming back, and that is what caused me to speak to Mr Symons as I did. The pursuer did not tell me a week before he went away that he was going to America. I don't remember of the pursuer telling me he was going to America until about the time the cows went away. . . . Mr Symons told me that I was not to let the corn go to waste. He was on horseback at the meeting I have been referring to, and he never got off his horse. I told Miss Gibson what had taken place. On the Monday after the meeting I have referred to Peter Thomson spoke to me about the rumour he had heard. He said that he had heard that the pursuer was going to America and was not going to return, and he wanted to know who would pay him. He also wished me to send my wife down to Mr Symons to see if his wages would be right, and in consequence of that I sent my wife down to Dumfries. Mr Symons did not agree to pay the wages; he sent back word to say that he was not responsible for paying wages, but that there would be a manager appointed over the farm, and most likely it would be Mr Smith, the gardener of Speddoch. I received a letter about the same time—I think that same night—from Mr Symons, saying that Mr Smith had been appointed manager of the farm of Birkbush. In consequence of that Thomson stopped working. He had been working at the harvest up till that time. I think we cut for half a day, but I am not sure if there was any more done. I lifted, as the girl could not get out, and the rest of us were working at the hay in the afternoon. . . . After the roup I cut one lot that had been bought by a tailor near Dumfries, and I also cut some for another party. The corn was quite ready for cutting at that time, and there was none of it wasted. The roup was on Saturday, 8th September, and it was on the Friday following that I cut the corn for the tailor. I could not give the date when I cut the other lot that I have mentioned, but it was after that again. The whole of the corn was in quite good condition while I was cutting it. . . . These proceedings alarmed me as to my claim on the pursuer, and I consulted an agent and instructed a petition to be served. I claimed £30 for breach of contract. That matter was remitted to arbitration, after the pursuer came home, and the result of the arbiter's award was that I had to pay £28 instead of getting £30. The pursuer came home on a Saturday night, and I saw him on Sunday morning. (Q.) Would you ever have instructed your agent at all if the pursuer had been at home? (A.) No, I would not have required. When he did come home I agreed to withdraw my action, and to leave the question between us to arbiters. . . . Cross.— . . . The pursuer did not tell me at that time that he was compelled to dispose of the cows because of money difficulties, but he said he was bound to dispose of them because one was bothering him and another was bothering him, or something to that effect. He did not say that the people who were bothering him were wanting money, but I took it up in that way. . . . (Q.) After he had gone, did you begin to think that he did not mean to come back at all? (A.) I did, after the rumour got up in the country, and they began to hypothecate. . . . Re-examined.—I was engaged by the pursuer to attend to the harvest and put up the hay-ricks, and there was nothing else to do on the farm at that time. (Q.) I suppose that as a matter of course you would look after the horses and the stock on the farm? (A.) Yes; there were only three horses, and they were out at the grass. Miss Gibson looked after her own cow. . . . At the time pursuer left I was due him the whole rent for the year. If it had not been for the proceedings of the manager, the corn could all have been cut by the time I started to cut for the tailor, if the machine had gone on all right. There were about thirteen acres of corn, and it would not take more than three days to cut that with the machine. Of course after it was cut there would be a good deal of other work in connection with it, and the getting of it in would depend on the weather."

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

"John Gibson. Examined.—I am a flesher in Maxwelltown, and a son of the pursuer. . . . I remember of my father going off to America in August 1894. He told me before he went that he was going, and he said that he might be away for two or three weeks, but he did not know exactly. He told me the gentleman he was going with. I think that would be a week or so before he actually left. I did not understand from what he said that he was leaving for good. I understood that he was away on a visit to see what the place was like, and to see if it was a place suitable for farming purposes, as his lease was near at an end, and that he was coming back after a few weeks. I remember of Mr Symons, the writer, calling upon me on Monday or Tuesday, 27th or 28th August. That interview did not last above a couple of minutes, and the conversation consisted merely of a word or two. Mr Symons looked in at the door, and said,—'I suppose your father has gone; do you know where he has gone'; and

No. 64.
Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

I said,—'No, not exactly.' Mr Symons then said,—'I suppose he will only be away for a week or two, but the strange thing is he has disposed of most of the stock,' and I said, 'Yes,' that I expected that he would not be away for more than a week or so. . . . I received a letter from my father after he had arrived in America. . . . A short time afterwards I received another letter, and he told me in that letter that he was returning shortly. I could not give the date when I got the first letter, but I think it would be a week or so before I got the second, or it might be more. I got the second letter about three days before my father returned. . . . Cross.—He did not give me any instructions as to what I was to do when he was away. He did not say anything to me about telling people where he was. I daresay I told one or two people who asked where my father was. I did not tell Mr Symons, because he just merely asked in passing, and I did not exactly know the route my father was to take, although I knew he was going to America. Mr Symons asked me where my father was, and I said I did not know exactly. That was true. I used the word 'exactly.' . . . (Q.) Did you want Mr Symons to know where your father was? (A.) Well, it was of no importance to me; I was not taking an interest in my father's affairs at all, and I had enough to do with my own business. I saw that Mr Symons was seemingly taking an interest in my father's affairs, and I knew that he was the agent for the proprietor of the farm. (Q.) Did you not know that he was coming to inquire about the farm, because your father had gone away and the stock was off it? (A.) Well, the stock was not all off it, I believe. (Q.) Do you not know quite well that the reason for Mr Symons' call on you was because he was anxious about the farm as your father was away, and nearly all the stock off? (A.) Well, it seemed as if he was anxious about it. His anxiety was seemingly because my father was away, the stock nearly all gone, and nobody in charge. . . . (Q.) Why did you not say,—'Don't trouble yourself, my father will be back in two or three weeks'? (A.) I don't know. (Q.) Was it not because you did not want Mr Symons to know your father would be back or where he was? (A.) No, I was not particular whether he knew or not. (Q.) He was particular about asking you, and you could have told him if you had liked? (A.) I did not see that he had any reason to be anxious, because there was no rent due at the time. I believe that people were left to cultivate the farm. . . . I could not give the date when my father wrote to me first, but I would receive the letter about a fortnight or so before he came home. I got the second letter within about three days of his return. I let my sister see the letters I got from my father, and she read them both. I kept the letters for a time, and I destroyed them about the time my father came home, or shortly before. Re-examined.—Birkbush is about eight miles from Maxwelltown. . . . By the Court.—I did not at any time suspect that my father had absconded. . . ."

Joseph Edgar (53), deponed,—"I am a farmer at Killyleoch, Dunscore, and I have been farming all my life. I know the pursuer well. I remember when he went away to America. I saw him that morning, and he said to me that he was going away for a holiday. He was in my dining-room, and he said to my wife, in my presence, that he was going to America. I think pursuer said that Peter Thomson and the dairyman were to put in his harvest, but I did not pay much attention."

The defender led no evidence.

On 27th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) assoilzied the defender.*

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

* "OPINION.—In this case, evidence has been led by the pursuer under the proof allowed by the interlocutor of 21st February, and the defender having stated that he had no evidence to lead, the case falls to be decided on the evidence so led by the pursuer. I think it presents very considerable difficulty, which is much enhanced by the want of evidence by the defender, in consequence of which various points are left insufficiently and unsatisfactorily explained.

"I certainly cannot commend the proceedings adopted by the defender, which seem to have been hasty and ill advised. But the question is whether the pursuer is entitled to the remedy which he demands on the grounds which he has pleaded.

"The pursuer and defender are tenant and landlord, and the proceedings from which the pursuer, the tenant, seeks redress, were commenced by a petition by the defender, as landlord, presented on 31st August 1894, to the Sheriff at Kirkcudbright, which prayed for the appointment of a person to take charge of the pursuer's farm and stock, to cultivate the farm and reap the crop, and to 'deal with the stock and crop and effects thereon, including the selling and disposing thereof in such a way as he may consider meet' and to report.

"The prayer was founded on the averments that the tenant was insolvent, that diligence had been used against him, that he had almost displenished his farm, and had left it without instructing any proper party to take charge of it, and had, it was believed, gone to America without intending to return, and that the corn crop and meadow hay were ripe and in danger of being lost.

"The Sheriff-substitute, on 30th August, ordered citation of the defender on 48 hours' warning. On 3d September, he, in respect the respondent, the tenant, had not entered appearance, appointed one Mr Smith (the landlord's gardener) to manage the farm with the powers craved. On 9th October he remitted the landlord's account of expenses to the auditor, and on 10th October, he approved of the auditor's report and of the manager's report, and found that there was no balance in the hands of the manager.

"The conclusions of the action are for reduction of the warrant of citation, the service of the petition, and of these interlocutors. There is no conclusion for damages, and there is no averment that the proceedings complained of have occasioned any pecuniary loss to the pursuer. All that is said about damages is that the pursuer reserves his claim of damages in respect of said illegal and oppressive proceedings.

"The defender has not pleaded that the action is incompetent. The pursuer's objection to the warrant of citation was repelled by the interlocutor of 21st February, and therefore the first conclusion for reduction must be rejected. The action otherwise remains now to be disposed of.

"The document sought to be reduced secondly is said to be the service of the petition, stated to be 'dated 1st September 1894.' The only document which has that date is the service copy of the petition; and defender contends that the document so described must needs be the service copy, and that there is no conclusion for reduction of the sheriff-officer's execution which bears date 31st August 1894. If this contention be sound, this conclusion for reduction must also be rejected, because it would be an absurd, meaningless, and wholly ineffectual proceeding to reduce a mere service copy leaving the execution unimpeached. But if this conclusion be directed against the sheriff-officer's execution which bears date 31st August, as I suppose was intended, then I am of opinion that no sufficient ground has been shewn for reducing it. I now understand that the defender stands by it, and maintains that unless it is reduced it must bear faith, and establish the service of the petition on 31st August.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The present action was relevant and competent.[1] It was not necessary to conclude for damages as well as reduction. The first step was to get the proceedings complained of set aside and when that had been done an action for damages would be raised. (2) The pursuer was entitled to have the proceedings in the Sheriff Court set aside. The petition was not competent in the Sheriff Court. It practically amounted to a prayer for sequestration of the farm, and for the appointment of a judicial factor. Such a proceeding was competent only in the Supreme Court. In Brock's[2] case the order of the Sheriff was of a much less sweeping description. At the most a landlord was entitled to have someone appointed to preserve the status quo,[3] but here the order went far beyond that. (3) In any view it was ultra vires of the Sheriff to make such an appointment without inquiry of some sort. (4) The warrant of citation was bad, and fell to be reduced, for it contained no warrant to cite edictally, as it ought to have done in terms of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 9. (5) The interlocutor of 3d September was incompetent. It was pronounced before the inducia had expired,

---

It is a suspicious looking document certainly, and I should not have been surprised had evidence been led that its date was erroneous. But there is, properly speaking, no such evidence. The pursuer did not examine the sheriff-officer, and the pursuer's daughter was unable to say on what day of the week the service was made. The improbation of the sheriff-officer's execution is left to depend on the service copy alone. The pursuer referred to the case of Dunlop v. Nicholson, 10th July 1827, 5 S. 915, in which, in special circumstances, it was held competent to refer to a service copy in contradiction to an execution; but the report bears that the case was to be regarded as of a special nature, and not to affect the general rule that a formal execution could not be contradicted by the service copy. And there is no doubt that that is the settled general rule, Stair, iv. 42, 12; Erskine, iv. 2, 5; M'Donald v. M'Leod, 11th January 1726, M. 3765; A. S., 10th July 1839, sec. 91. In this case there is no reason whatever for preferring the service copy to the execution. They bear different dates, and one of them must bear a wrong date. But there is no reason for saying that it is the execution which is misdated. Therefore, I think that on the evidence which has been led, the execution cannot be reduced. The point raised, it will be observed, is entirely technical. It is not suggested that the pursuer suffered any prejudice from any defect in the citation.

"Now, when the petition was brought before the Sheriff on the 3d September, the sheriff-officer's execution appended to the petition proved to him, and must now be held to prove, that the time for entering appearance had expired, and that the petition might be competently proceeded with as in absence. I say competently proceeded with, for I do not mean to say that some preliminary inquiry might not have been desirable and prudent in the circumstances. The pursuer founded on the case of Mackenzie v. Munro, 10th November 1894, 32 S. L. R. 43. But that case was different because the decree reduced was not a decree in absence but a decree by default for failure to lodge defences; and it was held that there had been no default, because the defender had right to lodge defences during the whole of that day. Here the Sheriff proceeded in absence, and not on default.

"There remain for consideration the conclusions for reduction of the three interlocutors. Now, the reasons of reduction of these three inter-

---

[1] M'Lachlan v. Rutherford, June 10, 1854, 16 D. 937, 26 Scot. Jur. 48[illegible]
[2] Brock v. Buchanan, June 7, 1851, 13 D. 1069, 23 Scot. Jur. 496.
[3] Drysdale v. Lawson, March 11, 1842, 4 D. 1061.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

for the citation which the pursuer had received was a document dated 1st September, summoning him to enter appearance within forty-eight hours.[1] It did not affect the pursuer that the execution bore a different date. He knew nothing about that, and was bound to assume that the citation on the service copy was correct. There might have been a mistake, but the service copy had remained in the pursuer's hands uncorrected, and its faith had not been impugned. The pursuer was entitled to found on it to shew that the citation was erroneous.[2] (6) On the merits, the evidence shewed that there was no justification whatever for the course followed by the landlord. The pursuer had merely left his farm temporarily. He was in no way bound to reside on his farm, or even to keep it plenished. He would have been within his legal right if he had sold every animal on the place, or left his crops unreaped. The landlord had no title to interfere so long as the rent was duly paid. The rent had been duly paid, and besides the pursuer had a responsible cautioner. The person asking so extraordinary a remedy as the defender had asked here was responsible for the truth of the statements made in order to obtain it, and these hav-locutors are specifically set forth in the pursuer's second plea. Seven reasons of reduction are there stated, and I am not prepared to sustain any of these specific reasons.

"They are as follows:—(1) That the petition was incompetent in the Sheriff Court. No authority was quoted in support of this reason, and I think it is sufficiently met by the case of Brock v. Buchanan, 7th June 1851, 13 D. 1069. (2) That the landlord had no title or interest. This was maintained on the ground that the Whitsunday rent had been paid. But I have no doubt that the landlord had a title and interest to see that his land was properly cultivated, and the rent falling due at Martinmas properly secured. (3) That the warrant was irregular and incompetent. That reason has already been repelled for reasons which have been stated. (4) That the service was irregular and incompetent. I think the regularity of the service is proved by the undisproved execution of the sheriff-officer. (5) That the procedure was incompetent and contrary to the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876. If this reason refers to the contention that the Sheriff's interlocutor was pronounced before the term of citation was expired, I think that reason fails on the grounds explained, and if that be not what is referred to I do not know what the reference is. (6) That it was incompetent and ultra vires to grant the prayer of the petition without inquiry. I think it was not so, the petition being competently before the Sheriff, and no one appearing to oppose it, although it might have been not unreasonable to have made some preliminary inquiry. (7) That the interlocutor making the appointment was void from uncertainty and ambiguity. I think this reason was not maintained, and I see no ground for it.

"I think, therefore, that the first and second pleas for the pursuer fall to be repelled, and I understand the defenders to maintain that, because no other grounds of reduction are specified, it follows immediately that they are entitled to absolvitor.

"There remains, however, the third plea, which, although quite general, might be sufficient, if it appeared from the proof that the Court had been imposed on by the averments in the petition, or that substantial injustice had been done.

"Struck with the apparent haste of the defender's proceedings and with [1] Mackenzie v. Munro, Nov. 10, 1894, 22 R. 45.

[2] Dunlop v. Nicolson, July 10, 1827, 5 S. 915; Hamilton v. Monkland Iron and Steel Co., March 19, 1863, 1 Macph. 672, 35 Scot. Jur. 387.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

ing in this case been proved to be unfounded, the pursuer was entitled to have the whole proceedings set aside.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The action was irrelevant. The pursuer's case was that he had left a manager in his absence. If that was so, and assuming that the citation was good, then appearance might have been entered and the petition opposed. Then again on the pursuer's return he took no steps, but allowed the interlocutors of 9th and 10th October to be pronounced. It was only after the management had come to an end that the pursuer asked the Court to reduce the appointment of the manager. Restitutio in integrum was not possible, and there was no conclusion for damages. (2) The petition in the Sheriff Court was competent.[1] The averment being that the farm was derelict, the landlord was entitled to take steps to protect his interests in the subjects. (3) It was within the discretion of the Sheriff to order an inquiry or not. (4) There was no necessity in the circumstances for a warrant to cite edictally; no prejudice had been suffered by the pursuer because of the want of it. (5) The forty-eight hours' inducice of the citation had expired before the interlocutor the wide character of the prayer of his petition, I thought it possible that the proof might disclose some such case, in which case I am not prepared to say that these interlocutors might not have been open to reduction. But considering that it is not said that any loss has been caused to the pursuer by the proceedings complained of, and that the circumstances warranted the statements in the petition, I do not think that a case of this sort is made out; although I have the impression that the defender and his agent ought to have acted with more consideration and caution, and made more inquiry before adopting such very summary and trenchant proceedings, an impression which might possibly have been removed had the defender, or his agent, or the manager, given evidence.

---

"The main facts proved may be stated very shortly:—

"The pursuer had been working his farm as a dairy farm and had a number of cows on it which he had let out to the witness Kirk under a bowing contract. Pending that contract he, on or about 22d August, sold all his sheep and all his cows but three. He drove the cattle to Lockerbie at night. He left the farm on 24th August. Although he seems to have told his family and one or two friends where he was going he made a secret of his destination, and told his daughter that he did not wish people to know it, and he left them uncertain as to the period of his return. He does not appear to have had any money then until he sold his cattle and sheep, and there were apparently several creditors who were becoming urgent, although the proof on that point is not wholly satisfactory. Even without the evidence of the defender or Mr Symons, his agent, or the manager, one can conclude that the farm must have appeared displenished. It was just on the eve of harvest, almost all his stock had been sold, and he himself had disappeared. No circumstances could have tended more to excite suspicion, and it appears from the pursuer's proof that the defender's agent inquired several times before taking action about the pursuer's absence; and it is clear that the only answer which he got from the members of the pursuer's family was that they did not know where he had gone, or when he would return. In the meantime the rumour arose that the pursuer had absconded, and it appears from the proof, in particular from the evidence of Kirk, that this rumour existed before the defender had taken any action. Now, unfortunately, the evidence of Symons is withheld; but it seems

---

[1] Brock v. Buchanan, June 7, 1851, 13 D. 1069; Affleck v. Affleck Jan. 14, 1862, 24 D. 291, 34 Scot. Jur. 144; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant ii. 450.

of 3d September was pronounced. The execution was dated 31st August. There was no conclusion for reduction of the execution, and there was no evidence to shew that its date was erroneous. It was not competent to contradict the formal execution by the service copy. Dunlop's case was very special.[1] If the citation was good then none of the interlocutors was open to objection. (6) On the merits, it was clear that the landlord was justified in proceeding as he had done. The farm had to all appearance been displenished and deserted. If the defender had fallen into an error, that had been induced by the conduct of the pursuer. The defender had acted in good faith, and there was no analogy between cases of the wrongous use of interdict and such a proceeding as the petition in question.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer in this case is tenant of the farm of Birkbush, in the parish of Irongray and stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and the defender, Mr Clark, is proprietor of that farm. On 31st August 1894 the landlord proved that he was not told of any arrangements made by the pursuer for the cultivation of his farm, or of any money left by him for payment of labour. Now these were the circumstances under which the defender, in the fear, I suppose, that the crops would go to waste, and that his November rent might be endangered, and that the farm would get into disorder, presented the petition. I think it cannot be said, in the circumstances, that the averments in it were unwarrantable, or overstated the case. The pursuer no doubt puts a different colour on the facts. I do not feel certain that his disclosures have been complete, but he is entitled to say that his actual return on 22d September refutes the idea that he had absconded. He accounts for the sale of his stock by stating that he had found his farm unsuitable as a dairy farm and intended to recur to the use of it as a sheep farm, and that for that reason he sold his cows, with the consent of Kirk, the bower; and he says that his visit to America was merely to see whether land was to be got there on favourable terms with the view to going there at the close of his lease. All this may be true, although the reason given for going to America seems a lame one, and may remove some of the suspicion which his conduct was so much calculated to excite, although I hesitate to say that the pursuer's explanations are wholly satisfactory. But whether it was so or not I think the combination of circumstances was extremely questionable, and that there is no wonder that they aroused the suspicion that he had absconded, a suspicion which the members of his family, apparently, came also to entertain.

---

"After the petition was served no objection of any kind was stated to it; and if the pursuer left his farm under the conditions mentioned without leaving anyone who was in a position to meet such averments as are made in the petition, it seems his own fault if proceedings thereafter passed in absence.

"It seems to be true that the interference of the defender was regrettable, for it certainly did no good. Neither, however, is it said to have done any material harm; at least the interlocutors are not challenged on any ground of that kind. It is not averred or proved that the pursuer's property was sold at a sacrifice, or that the expenses of process were excessive. I do not express any opinion whether relief might not have been given had either of these things been averred and proved; but as they are not in the case, and as, in my opinion, the technical objections are untenable, I have come, not without difficulty, to the conclusion that the pursuer's action fails, and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor."

[1] Macqueen v. Clyne's Trustees, May 20, 1834, 12 S. 610; M'Donald v. M'Leod, 1726, M. 3765; Ersk. Inst. iv. 2, 5; Campbell on Citation, 62.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

applied for the appointment of a person to take charge of that farm, and the first question is whether that application was competent. The grounds upon which the application was made are set forth in the second article of the condescendence, and the averments are that he (i.e., the tenant) "has recently removed the most of his stock from the farm to the extent of almost entirely displenishing the same, and he has left the farm without instructing any proper person to take charge thereof. It is believed that he has gone to America without any intention of returning. The corn crop and the meadow hay crop of the current year are ripe for cutting, and require to be immediately cut and stacked," and so on. There are other preliminary statements, but these are the principal.

Now, that just means that the application was made upon the ground that the pursuer was proceeding to displenish the farm, and that he had deserted it, and the question is—assuming these facts to be true for the purposes of this question, is the application competent? In my opinion it is quite a competent application. The farm belonged to the landlord, the defender, who was entitled to have it properly managed and looked after, and if he was right in assuming that it had been deserted by his tenant, who had left no one to look after it, then I think he had a right and title to have somebody appointed to look after it. I do not think it is necessary to go further into that matter, because I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the case of Brock v. Buchanan[1] is conclusive of this case. It is also said that the prayer of the petition is much too wide, but I think it is just an enumeration of the acts which anyone in charge of the farm would be bound to carry out, and in my opinion there is no incompetency in that. Well, then, if the application was competent, the next question which arises is with regard to the procedure which took place therein. The first document which is sought to be reduced is a warrant of citation pronounced upon the 31st of August 1894, by which the Court had granted warrant to cite the defender upon forty-eight hours' warning, and ordained him, if he intended to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge a notice of appearance within the inducie of citation. The ground of reduction of that warrant is that it did not contain a warrant to cite edictally. I cannot see how that warrant can be objected to on that ground. If, in point of fact, the tenant was resident furth of Scotland, the warrant could not possibly do him any harm. If the tenant was, as he says he was, not resident furth of Scotland, but was only temporarily absent, then it was a perfectly good warrant. Therefore I can see no ground whatever why the warrant should be set aside.

The next document that is sought to be reduced is an execution of service of the petition, dated 1st September 1894, following upon the warrant. The Lord Ordinary has pointed out that the only document which bears that date is not the execution of service but the service copy, and as he says, and says truly, that cannot be the document meant to be set aside, because to set it aside would be just to leave the execution of service unchallenged in every respect. Therefore the Lord Ordinary treats it as if the document meant to be reduced and set aside was the execution of ser-

[1] 13 D. 1069.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

vice which is dated the 31st of August 1894. Now, the question which arises upon that is this. It will be observed that the warrant for service was dated 31st August 1894, that it granted warrant to cite the defender on forty-eight hours' notice, and that the Sheriff-substitute appointed a manager on the 3d September 1894. If the true date of the service was that set forth in the service copy of the execution, then the forty-eight hours had not expired when this appointment was made upon 3d September. If, on the other hand, the true date of service was the 31st August 1894, as set out in the execution of service itself, then the forty-eight hours had expired on the 3d September when the appointment was made. The date of service is a question of fact. There is no evidence whatever in this case as to what was the true date of the service of this warrant—whether it was the 31s August, as set forth in the execution of service, or whether it was the 1st September, as set forth in the service copy. In that state of matters the only proof on record of any sort to challenge the 31st August, the date set forth in the execution of service, is production of the service copy; and I hold with the Lord Ordinary that that is not sufficient to set aside the execution of service. That being so, until the execution of service is set aside, that date must be held by the Court to be the true date of service. Therefore I think there is nothing whatever in this second challenge.

Then, if that be so, the question arises as to the next document sought to be reduced, namely, the appointment of the manager upon 3d September to take charge of the farm. If, as I think, this petition was duly served, and if it was duly and properly brought before the Sheriff on the 3d September, the position of matters was this. Here was a petition duly served, and no appearance made to answer the statements contained in it; and the question is, what was the Sheriff to do with it? What he did do is set forth in the interlocutor of 3d September:—"In respect the defender has not entered appearance, appoints Mr Alexander Smith, before designed, to take charge of the lands and farm," &c. It is said that the Sheriff was bound to make inquiry. I do not say that it might or might not have been judicious for the Sheriff to have made some further inquiry into the matter; but I am bound to say that the Sheriff was entitled to act as he did here, for there was no appearance made by the respondent to dispute the statements in the petition, or to dispute the appointment, or any other matter. I think he was entitled to treat this as an undefended cause, which it was, and to appoint a manager in these circumstances. Therefore, I think there is no ground for setting aside the interlocutor or judgment of the 3d September 1894.

The other documents challenged are the subsequent interlocutors of the 9th and 10th October. With reference to these, I have only to say that their competency depends upon the prior proceedings. If the petition was competent, there is nothing whatever said against the proceedings of the manager in the way he carried out his commission. Therefore, I see no ground whatever why these two judgments should be set aside unless the petition was bad.

Now, if that be so, the question remains on the merits, that is to say, whether the facts and circumstances of the case entitled the landlord to make the application which he did. Now, I think, that question depends upon this, whether, on the facts and circumstances existing at the time, the landlord had reasonable ground, induced by the acts of the respondent, the farmer, himself, to think that he had abandoned the farm, and that it was necessary that some person should be put in charge of it. If the landlord had reasonable ground for believing that this farm was abandoned, then I cannot say that there was anything wrong in applying for this appointment. That depends upon facts as proved in the evidence, and I again agree with the Lord Ordinary on these facts. I shall not read what he says, but the facts are just these: That this tenant on the 22d August sold the cattle on his farm with the exception of three. The farm had been occupied as a bowing farm, but notwithstanding that, he, on the 22d August, drove all the cattle away, breaking his contract with the bower, under which he had let the grazing. So to that extent he displenished the farm of all the cattle which had been left on it but three, two of which did not belong to the tenant, and were shortly afterwards removed, after his going away. Those two were taken away by their owner, so that the farm was left with only one cow. Very shortly before he sold off the cattle he drove away and sold all the sheep on the farm. The result was that the landlord had reason to believe that the farm was displenished with the exception of one cow and two old horses. Now, the tenant not only so displenished the farm, but when he went away he left instructions with his daughter that she should not say where he had gone. He says himself that he did not wish anyone to know where he was, and that he left instructions to that effect with his daughter. Accordingly, when the landlord's representative, with a view to ascertain his whereabouts, made inquiry as to where the tenant was, he was told by the daughter that they did not know. I think that was a most suspicious circumstance, very well entitling the landlord to have the impression that the farm was abandoned. Before he went away the tenant made no arrangement for the working of the farm. He did not leave any money in the hands of anybody to pay the harvesting wages or anything. Now, I say again that the landlord had very reasonable grounds for believing that this almost displenished farm had been deserted by the tenant, who left instructions that nobody was to be told where he had gone. It is in these circumstances that the application was made. I do not see any reasonable ground on the part of the tenant for objecting to the competency of the application. I therefore concur with the Lord Ordinary that this defender ought to be assoilzied.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with Lord Adam. The action is rested upon the objections to the regularity and competency of the proceedings alone. It is not averred that the pursuer suffered any loss or injury from these proceedings. His action is based upon objections to competency, and nothing more. Now, in so far as regards the technical objections to the warrant for service and the execution of service, I agree entirely with Lord Adam and the Lord Ordinary that these objections are untenable upon the grounds which his Lordship has stated. I do not think it necessary to add a single word upon these minor questions at all. But the substantial complaint of incompetency was not based upon the executory proceedings, but upon a plea that the petition was in substance incompetent. I agree with Lord Adam that that plea is not well founded. I think that the landlord had reasonable grounds for believing that the pursuer had deserted his farm without making any proper provision for its management. I do not repeat the grounds in fact upon which I come to that conclusion, because they have been fully stated by Lord Adam; but I add that it appears to me to be a very material fact, in considering the reasonableness of the pursuer's conduct, that the pursuer's family not only withheld from the landlord all the information that might have satisfied him that his tenant had not deserted the farm, or that he had left it in competent hands; but that the persons who are now said to have been entrusted with the management, the daughter and the witness Kirk, abstained, when the petition was presented to the Sheriff, from making any opposition whatever to its being granted. There was nothing to suggest to the landlord, and certainly there was nothing before the Sheriff to suggest, that the tenant, in leaving his farm had left the management in competent hands. These considerations, however, are hardly relevant to the real question which we have to consider, because the question, as I look upon it, is not whether the application was reasonable, but only whether it was competent, assuming that the pursuer had sufficient grounds for presenting it. Now, as to the competency, I think there can be no doubt. The case to which the Lord Ordinary refers is an authority; and in Mr Hunter's book, and in a subsequent case, the practice seems to be taken for granted that where a tenant has not provided for the management, an application for judicial management may be made to the Judge Ordinary. That does not in any sense involve any forfeiture of the farm. In the case of Affleck v. Affleck,[1] Lord Colonsay pointed out that it had no resemblance to a sequestration of land. The only effect of it is to provide for the interim management for the benefit of all concerned, including the tenant; and that it is exceedingly reasonable and convenient that such interim management should be provided, I think there can be hardly any question. If it be the case, as the defender alleges to have been the case here, that the tenant has left the country, leaving his crops going to waste and exposing the farm to fall into disorder, then it is to the interest of everybody—and not only of the landlord to whom the farm belongs, subject to his tenant's right—that some interim management should be provided. Therefore, it appears to me there can be no question that this proceeding was perfectly competent.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary that it might have been well had the Sheriff made some further inquiry into the circumstances before giving effect to the prayer of the petition, but I agree with Lord Adam that he was not bound to do so if he thought it unnecessary. The circumstances which should induce the Judge Ordinary to make further inquiry in such cases may vary; and that he is entitled to proceed upon the assumption that, if there were any answer to the complaint which is made to him, it would have been brought before him by the tenant, or on his behalf, I do not think can be open to doubt. Whether proceedings of this kind might found an action of damages at the instance of the tenant,

[1] 24 D. 291.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

if he had suffered wrong, is another question. It was argued that, if it turned out that the application upon which the landlord had obtained the appointment of an interim manager was altogether unfounded in fact, then the tenant would have a right to damages for the wrongful use of a summary proceeding upon the same principle upon which it has been held that an applicant who obtains interim interdict upon a wrong ground must be answerable for the consequences. Whether that is so or not I express no opinion. There is no authority—at least we were referred to none—for holding that the analogy of actions for wrongous interdict is applicable to such a proceeding as this. It may be so, but I prefer to reserve my opinion until the case arises in which that question is really argued. It is enough in the present instance to say that this is not an action of damages. The pursuer does not allege that he has suffered any prejudice whatever. It is said that he reserves his claim for damages, and it was indicated in the course of the discussion that the proceeding now before us was a preliminary action, which, if it were successful, was to be followed up by a second action of damages. Now, if that was the object of the pursuer in putting the action in its present shape, it appears to me to involve an unnecessary and oppressive multiplication of actions. I do not think it reasonable that the defender should be subjected to the expense of a long proof first in an action of reduction and then separately in an action of damages. In the second action the proof, I presume, or at all events it is very probable, would be much the same, and therefore the same facts would have to be proved twice over. That appears to me to be a kind of procedure which ought not to be encouraged. But at all events the pursuer cannot complain if the action which he has brought is disposed of solely upon the grounds which alone he has brought forward in support of it, and not upon other and different grounds which he tells us he holds in reserve to support another and different action. I therefore do not take into account any suggestion which may have been made at the bar as to possible injury which the pursuer in this case has sustained, because he has alleged none, and makes no claim for damages. That appears to me to be the single ground for assoilzieing the defender in so far as the action concludes for reduction of all the proceedings and interlocutors, except, perhaps, the interlocuters of the 9th and 10th October 1894. These stand in a different position so far as the form, and also in so far as the practical operation of them is concerned, from the interlocutor making the appointment, because there stands a judgment, the practical result of which is that the interim manager's accounts of intromissions have been formally approved of, so that the pursuer might have no claim of accounting against him. It appears to me that these interlocutors might, upon different grounds from any which I have hitherto considered, be held as decrees in absence which the pursuer was entitled to reduce on the ground that they were pronounced in his absence, so that the questions which they have decided might be retried upon their merits by a judgment resulting in a decree de foro. But then in the first place, it is to be observed that the right to reduce decrees in absence is not absolute, but is subject to qualification, and I think it is a material ground of objection to a reduction of those two interlocutors on that ground that at the time when they were pronounced the pursuer had returned to this country. He knew all about the proceedings, but abstained from taking the step which was quite competent, and would have been the proper step for bringing the interim management to an end, and having the manager's accounts duly audited, by appearing in the process and asking that the appointment should be recalled. It was quite open to him to appear at this stage, and if he had done so all the questions which could have been raised as between him and the manager would have been raised at the right time, and might have been disposed of by a judgment in foro. That is merely one consideration that occurs to my mind, but there is a more conclusive ground, and it is this, that a decree in absence cannot be set aside upon that ground merely, unless the pursuer in the reduction is prepared to shew that it is wrong, and to point out the decree which ought to be substituted for it. If this action had been an action to set aside these two interlocutors as in absence, and thereafter to proceed to determine as between the pursuer and the interim manager the true state of accounts between them, I do not say that there might not have been ground for sustaining that objection. But then the pursuer does not say that there was anything wrong in substance in the interlocutors in question. The result is that a report of the interim manager's management and the pursuer's account of expenses have been approved of, with the result of leaving nothing for the tenant from the sale of his crops. But the tenant does not say that more could have been made of the sale; he does not say that he has suffered from the sale of his crops, and he does not enable us to say that the findings in question are in any respect wrong, or that if they were reduced as in absence, they ought not to be repeated in foro.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

Upon the whole matter, I think that this is an action rested upon an allegation of incompetency of procedure alone, and I think this allegation is unfounded, and therefore I agree with Lord Adam and the Lord Ordinary as to the result.

LORD M'LAREN.—I regret that in this case my opinion can be of no benefit to the pursuer, but it is proper that I should state the grounds of my difference from your Lordship's opinion. The pursuer is tenant under a lease for fifteen years, whereof at the time when he was dispossessed there were three years unexpired. He was not in arrear of rent, and it has not been shewn to my satisfaction that he had committed any breach of obligation towards his landlord. In the month of August 1894, having made all the necessary arrangements for carrying on his farm during his absence, the pursuer went with a friend on a voyage to North America, in order, as he says, to see whether he would be likely to better himself by settling there at some future time. He returned to Scotland within a month, as he had intended, to find that his farm had been put under judicial management, his crop sold uncut, and the entire proceeds absorbed in expenses. The petition to the Sheriff for the appointment of a judicial manager set forth that the tenant (the present pursuer) was in insolvent circumstances, that he had recently removed the greater part of his stock from the farm to the extent of almost entirely displenishing the same; that he had left the farm without instructing any proper person to take charge thereof, and that it was believed that he had gone to America without any intention of returning. As I read the evidence in this case those statements are completely disproved. The pursuer was not insolvent; he had sold a part of his stock of cattle, but only with the intention of stocking the farm with sheep, as he was entitled to do; there was not a shadow of foundation for the statement that he had abandoned his farm, and so far from his having left it without care, he had left the house and farm in charge of his daughter, who was sufficiently supplied with money, and he had engaged the services of labourers for harvesting the crop.

No. 64.

Dec. 13, 1895.
Gibson v. Clark.

To this it may be added that the landlord had as cautioner for his rent a lady who is the owner of a small landed property, and the sufficiency of whose security is not impugned. The petition was presented within a few days after the pursuer had left his farm—as I think, without any adequate inquiry into the facts—and in the pursuer's absence an appointment of a judicial manager was obtained from a gentleman holding the position of Honorary Sheriff-substitute. As the appointment of the judicial manager has fallen, reduction is perhaps not a very appropriate remedy for the original wrong. But the Sheriff-substitute thereafter approved of the manager's actings and discharged him, and I think that as regards this interlocutor at all events, there is no objection to the competency of the reduction.

If I rightly follow the Lord Ordinary's judgment in favour of the defender, it proceeds on the view that the circumstances attending the pursuer's voyage to America were suspicious, and that the application to the Sheriff was made in good faith. But neither the defender nor the agent who presented the petition tendered themselves for examination before the Lord Ordinary; in fact the defender offered no evidence, and if the case depends on his good faith, this circumstance alone is, in my opinion, sufficient to put him out of Court. But I demur altogether to this ground of judgment. I conceive it to be a perfectly settled general rule of law that where an inhibitory order is obtained from a Judge on an ex parte statement of the facts, the applicant is responsible for the truth of the statements on which he obtains the order. He cannot defend himself by alleging that he acted in good faith, or that the circumstances made his story reasonable or probable. I think that the cases relating to wrongous interdict establish this doctrine; and if this be the criterion of responsibility where a party is merely interdicted from making a particular use of his property, it must in principle apply to proceedings for taking the possession out of his hands altogether. To say that a tenant is liable to be deprived of his farm because he takes a month's holiday in the autumn, is a proposition that carries absurdity on the face of it; and I do not think the proposition is much improved by the averment that the landlord or his agent thought that the tenant was going to abscond. The tenant's right of possession cannot, as I think, be determined or interfered with upon a mere opinion of the landlord, and, as a matter of fact, the pursuer had done nothing of which the defender was entitled to complain.

I cannot help thinking that the pursuer has been unfortunate in his choice of a remedy for the wrong which was done to him; for, if he had gone to a jury on an issue of damages, he might have avoided the legal difficulties which have caused the failure of his case. No. 64. Dec. 13, 1895. Gibson v. Clark.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

GEORGE RUSSELL AND OTHERS (Lord and Lady Charles Innes Ker's Marriage-contract Trustees), First Parties.—Rankine—Don Wauchope. No. 65. Dec. 13, 1895. Ker's Trustees v. Ker.

LADY CHARLES INNES KER AND SPOUSE, Second Parties.—D.-F. Asher—Fleming.

CHARLES JAMES INNES KER AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—D.-F. Asher—Fleming.

Marriage-contract—Trust—Denuding—Annuity to wife—Power to discharge stante matrimonio—Purchase of annuity in lieu of that provided in marriage-contract.—By antenuptial contract dated in 1866, the father of the intended husband bound himself to pay £40,000 to the marriage-contract trustees for the purpose, inter alia, of payment to the wife, in the event of her surviving her husband, of a free yearly annuity of £800 during her lifetime. This annuity was not declared to be alimentary.

In 1895 the spouses and the children of the marriage (who were sui juris) called on the trustees to denude of the £40,000, alleging that the whole fund had vested in the children absolutely, subject to the annuity contingently provided to the wife, and that she had agreed to discharge that annuity.

Held (following Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 R. 507) that the trustees were not entitled to denude of the £40,000, in respect that the annuity was a marriage-contract provision which the wife was not entitled stante matrimonio either to alienate or to discharge.

Held, further, that the trustees were not entitled to purchase with the trust funds an annuity in their names, payable to the wife contingently on her surviving her husband, and, quoad ultra, to denude of the trust funds, in respect (1) that the security of the trust funds was greater than that of a purchased annuity, and (2) that a purchased annuity, not being protected by the marriage-contract trust, could be alienated by the wife.

2D DIVISION.

LORD CHARLES JOHN INNES KER, son of James, sixth Duke of Roxburghe, was married to Miss Blanche Mary Williams, daughter of Thomas Peers Williams, of Temple House, Berkshire, on 15th January 1866. In contemplation of the marriage two deeds of settlement—one in the English and the other in the Scots form—were executed, dealing with the funds settled by, or on behalf of, Miss Williams and Lord Charles respectively. By the Scots marriage-contract the Duke of Roxburghe, the father of Lord Charles, bound himself to pay a sum of £40,000 to the trustees named in the deed for behoof of the spouses and the issue of the marriage, according to the trusts set forth, including the following:—"(Secundo) In the event of the dissolution of the said intended marriage by the predecease of the said Lord Charles John Innes Ker . . . and of there being a child or children, or the issue of a child or children, of the marriage . . . the said trustees or trustee shall pay to the said Miss Blanche Mary Williams during all the remaining days of her life a free yearly annuity of £800 sterling, and that at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday by equal portions, beginning the first payment thereof at the first term of Martinmas or Whitsunday which shall happen after the death of the said Lord Charles John Innes Ker, for the period from the date of his death to the said term . . . and so forth half-yearly, termly, and continually thereafter during the lifetime of the said Miss Blanche Mary Williams, and so long as she shall remain unmarried . . . Declaring always, that in the event of her entering into a second marriage the said annuity shall be and is hereby restricted to the sum of £400 sterling per annum, and the balance of £400 shall thereafter be applied to the other purposes of this trust." This annuity was not declared to be alimentary.

No. 65.
Dec. 13, 1895.
Ker's Trustees v. Ker.

In November 1895 a special case was presented for determination of the question whether the trustees were in safety to denude of the £40,000 settled by the Duke of Roxburghe.

The second parties, Lady Charles Ker with consent of her husband and Lord Charles for any interest he might have, and the third parties, Charles J. Innes Ker and Bertram H. Innes Ker, the only children of the marriage, who were both sui juris, maintained that the trustees, the first parties, were bound to denude, on the ground that under the marriage-contract, and in virtue of certain deeds and other procedure, Lord Charles was divested of all interest in the trust-estate, and his sons were absolutely vested in the whole interest therein, subject to the contingent annuity provided to Lady Charles, and that Lady Charles had agreed to discharge the trustees and the trust-estate under their charge of her annuity.

The case further stated;—"Lady Charles and her sons, the third parties, are willing that the sum required to purchase from a well-established assurance company, or from Government, the annuity of £800 yearly (restrictable as aforesaid), to which Lady Charles will be entitled in the event of her surviving Lord Charles, should be retained by the first parties, and applied in purchasing said annuity in the names of the first parties, for the benefit of Lady Charles."

The trustees, the first parties, stated that they did not feel in safety to comply with the demand of the second and third parties without the sanction of the Court.

The questions of law were—omitting a reference to certain other funds not derived from the Duke of Roxburghe, and held by the trustees upon other trusts than those upon which the £40,000 from his Grace was settled, as to which other funds there was no dispute,—"(1) Are the first parties bound or entitled, upon receiving discharges from Lady Charles and the third parties, to make over to Lady Charles and the third parties the whole trust-estate . . .? (2) Are the first parties bound or entitled, after purchasing an annuity of £800 yearly (restrictable as aforesaid), payable to Lady Charles contingently upon her surviving Lord Charles, and upon receiving discharges from Lady Charles and the third parties, to make over to the third parties the whole trust-estate, with the exception of the said annuity purchased as aforesaid . . .?"

At the hearing, argument was directed to the question whether the fund had vested in the third parties subject to the annuity provided to Lady Charles; but the questions mainly debated were whether Lady Charles was entitled stante matrimonio to discharge her annuity,[1] and alternatively whether the trustees were entitled to purchase an annuity in the manner explained in the case.

---

[1] Authorities cited.—Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073, 9 Scot. Jur. 509; Pringle v. Anderson, July 3, 1868, 6 Macph. 982, 40

At advising,— No. 65.

Dec. 13, 1895. Ker's Trustees v. Ker.

LORD TRAYNER.—The condition on which the first question in this case could alone be answered in the affirmative is that Lady Charles Ker and her two sons should discharge their respective rights under the marriage-contract. It is perhaps open to argument whether the sons could do so, on the ground that no right under the marriage-contract has yet vested in them. But, assuming that such rights have vested, and could now be validly discharged, I am of opinion that no such discharge can validly be granted by Lady Charles. Her right of liferent is a marriage-contract provision, which, stante matrimonio, she can neither alienate nor discharge. I think that was conclusively settled in the case of Menzies v. Murray,[1] a decision which, in my opinion, rules the determination of the first question now put to us.

The second question presents a distinction between the present case and the case I have just referred to. There is practically here an offer to purchase for Lady Charles an annuity equal in amount to that provided to her under the marriage-contract; in Menzies' case[1] there was no such offer. This, however, does not affect my opinion that the second question also should be negatived. Such an annuity as is offered to be purchased for Lady Charles would not secure her provision to her as the marriage-contract does. In the first place, the value or security of a purchased annuity depends on the stability of the office or insurance company which grants it; its insolvency would render the annuity valueless. This, I admit, is a very remote contingency to provide against, but so long as the trustees hold the marriage-contract fund no such contingency could arise. The security of the trust funds held by the trustees is therefore greater than that afforded by a purchased annuity. But granting them to be equal as regards the security for the full and regular payment of the annuity, they are very unequal in security in another and more important respect. A purchased annuity could be disposed of by Lady Charles,—which would just be another way of alienating her marriage-contract provision. I think she has by the marriage-contract placed herself in a position which protects her, as Lord Deas said in Menzies' case,[1] "against marital influence on the one hand, and self-sacrifice on the other," and that that protection cannot now be surrendered or impaired by her.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the questions in the negative.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S., Agents.

Scot. Jur. 563; Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 R. 507; Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees, Nov. 24, 1871, 10 Macph. 120, 44 Scot. Jur. 77; Laidlaw v. Newlands, Feb. 1, 1884, 11 R. 481.

[1] 2 R. 507.

No. 66. GEORGE WHYTE, Petitioner (Respondent).—Watt—A. S. D. Thomson.
FANNY WHYTE, Respondent (Appellant).—Cooper.

Dec. 17, 1895.
Whyte v. Whyte.

Process—Denial that interlocutor bearing to proceed upon consent of party had been consented to—Power of Court to order inquiry.—A decree by a Sheriff-substitute appointing a petitioner executor-dative proceeded on the statement that the respondent had withdrawn her opposition.

In an appeal by the respondent, the appellant stated that the Sheriff-substitute was mistaken in supposing that she had withdrawn her opposition, and asked for a proof on that point.

The Court proposed in the first instance to remit to the Sheriff-substitute for a report, and the appellant having objected to this course, refused the appeal.

1ST DIVISION. GEORGE WHYTE presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton craving to be decerned executor-dative qua one of the next of kin to his deceased sister, Mary Logan Whyte.

Answers were lodged by Fanny Whyte, a sister of the petitioner, who claimed to be an executor-nominate under a mutual settlement.

The Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie) found that the settlement had been revoked, and an appeal against this judgment having been dismissed, the petitioner lodged a minute craving to be appointed executor-dative.

On 15th October the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"The agent of the respondent having stated at the bar that he now withdraws his opposition to the minute for the petitioner, the Sheriff-substitute decerns the petitioner executor-dative," &c.

The respondent appealed to the First Division, and argued;—The Sheriff was in error in supposing that the respondent had withdrawn her opposition to the petitioner's application. All that her agent had stated was that she did not intend to lodge a competing petition for appointment as executor-dative. No concession was made as to her claim to be the executrix-nominate of her sister, but the Sheriff had already decided against her on that claim, and the question could not be reopened before him. All that she wished, therefore, was a final interlocutor against which she might appeal. The Sheriff having been in error in supposing that the respondent had withdrawn her opposition, his judgment was open to review on the merits, and the respondent desired to be heard on the merits of the case. If the Court thought that the question whether or not the appellant had withdrawn her opposition in the Sheriff Court should first be cleared up, the inquiry should be by proof, and not by remit to the Sheriff.

Argued for the appellant;—The statement upon which the Sheriff's interlocutor bore to proceed had in fact been made, and the interlocutor had therefore not been pronounced under any error. The interlocutor bearing to be of consent, it was not open to review.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against is as follows:—"The agent of the respondent having stated at the bar that he now withdraws his opposition to the minute for the petitioner, the Sheriff-substitute decerns the petitioner executor-dative in terms of his petition." The minute referred to, after alluding to the appellant's previous unsuccessful appeal, goes on,—"The petitioner respectfully craves the Court to appoint him executor-dative in terms of his petition." It is clear, therefore, upon the face of this interlocutor, that the opposition to the minute having been withdrawn, the Sheriff appointed the respondent in

No. 66.

Dec. 17, 1895.
Whyte v. Whyte.

this appeal executor-dative in terms of his prayer. It will be observed that this interlocutor does not proceed upon any minute signed by the party withdrawing opposition, but it proceeds upon a statement of what is alleged to have taken place at the bar, namely, that the agent for the respondent in the original petition withdrew his opposition to the minute for the petitioner. Now, we were informed by the counsel for the appellant that that was not true in point of fact, that in reality the agent for the respondent in the Court below had not withdrawn the opposition to the appointment of Mr Whyte as executor-dative. On the other hand, it was distinctly denied by the respondent in this appeal that that was so, and he told us that the interlocutor truly represented what had taken place in the Court below, and that, in point of fact, the agent for Miss Fanny Whyte had intimated the withdrawal of opposition to the petition. I should not regard the statement of fact as to what is alleged to have passed at the bar, even though embodied in an interlocutor, as conclusive of the fact. We all know that misapprehension and mistake sometimes take place in such matters, and I think it would not be right that a party should be barred from all redress simply because such a statement was set forth in an interlocutor. But it appears to me that, if the question should be settled what, in point of fact, took place before the Sheriff, the first thing to do would be to remit the case to the Sheriff to report to us whether or not the interlocutor truly set forth what took place before him, and whether there might not have been the possibility of a mistake. On receiving a report from the Sheriff, we should have an opportunity of considering its terms, and having so considered it, we should be in a position to say what other steps should be taken in the matter.

Now, I should have been quite ready in this case to follow that course and to remit to the Sheriff to report, but we were very distinctly informed at the bar that the appellant did not desire any such course, and that being so, it appears to me that we are left in this position, that the appellant not wishing that inquiry be made, we must assume that what took place before the Sheriff is properly recorded in this interlocutor, and that being so, it is impossible for us to review this judgment on the merits, because it proceeds on consent. Consequently, I think we should dismiss the appeal.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with all that Lord Adam has said, and I am anxious that it should be understood that, in my opinion, where a judgment or interlocutor bears to proceed upon a consent or concession of the other party, and it is represented to us that the concession was not in fact given, the Court has full power to deal with the representation upon equitable principles, not being tied down to any particular mode of procedure. When a judgment is to be passed upon a consent, the proper mode of recording that consent would be by a minute signed by the procurator of the party granting it, but when the matter at stake is of no great value or importance, and especially when it only relates to procedure, we know that it is common both in the inferior Courts and in this Court to state in the interlocutor that it is granted of consent. I should not think it consistent with sound principle to hold that the statement of the

No. 66. Dec. 17, 1895. Whyte v. Whyte.

Sheriff or inferior Judge, to the effect that the defender had consented to a decree, was conclusive, or that we were in any way limited in our mode of correcting what is made to appear to us a mistake. In the present case no pecuniary interests are involved, but only a question of the right to administer a small estate, and the history of the case makes it not at all unlikely that the consent which the Sheriff says was given would be given. There has been no proposal to refer the matter to the Sheriff, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 67. Dec. 17, 1895. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

R. S. FORBES (Surveyor of Taxes), Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Sir Charles Pearson—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Young.

THE SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, Respondents.—Balfour—Maconochie.

Revenue—Income-tax—Interest on colonial investments—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35)—Schedule D, Case 4, sec. 102—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 7), sec. 5.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893, imposed income-tax for the year 1893-94 upon income chargeable under Schedules A, B, C, D, and E of the Income-Tax Act, 1853, and enacted that provisions in any Income-Tax Act in force in the previous year should have full force and effect "with respect to the duties of income-tax hereby granted."

An insurance society was assessed for income-tax for the year 1893-94 on the interest of colonial investments not received in Great Britain, but received and re-invested in the colonies, on the ground that it was subject to assessment under sec. 102 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.

Held (1) that if and in so far as sec. 102 of the Act of 1842 subjected to assessment income not covered by the lettered schedules, it was not in force for the year 1893-94; and (2) that sec. 102 did not impose duties, but merely contained provisions as to the duties granted in the schedules.

Revenue—Income-tax—Interest on colonial investments—Constructive remittance—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), Schedule D, Case 4.—Where interest derived from the colonial investments of a society for mutual insurance was not remitted home, but was re-invested abroad, held that, by being entered in the society's accounts, it was not constructively remitted to this country so as to be chargeable with duty under Case 4 of Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.

1ST DIVISION. Exchequer Cause.

THE SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION appealed to the Commissioners of Income-Tax for the county of Midlothian against an assessment for the year 1893-94 on the sum of £90,359, being the amount of interests accrued upon investments abroad for the year ending 31st December 1892, which, according to the contention of the institution, were not received in this country.

The Commissioners sustained the appeal on the grounds (1) that the interests in question had not been remitted to this country in forma specifica; and (2) that the facts were not sufficient to establish constructive remittance.

The Surveyor of Taxes obtained a case.

No. 67. Dec. 17, 1895. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

The following facts were set forth in the case:—The Scottish Provident Institution was established in 1837, and was incorporated by private Act in 1848. Its head office was in Edinburgh, and its ordinary management and administration were wholly vested in a board of directors established there.

The institution had no shareholders to whom dividends were payable, and there was no discrimination between its capital and income. According to the laws of the institution an investigation was appointed to be made at the end of every seventh year into its affairs, and the surplus (being the excess of receipts on account of premiums, interests, &c., over the amount of claims paid and other expenses) fell to be disposed of according to the following laws:—Law 27 provided that the surplus, "under deduction of such proportion as the directors shall consider necessary and proper in the circumstances to be retained as a guarantee, shall be made available to the members entitled thereto as after provided, and that by additions to the capital sums that will certainly—unless the policies be forfeited or surrendered—become payable on the death of the members or others on whose lives the assurances were effected . . . Members may have their shares of surplus applied in diminution of their annual contributions, or in periodical or annual additions to their policies; or they may at any time surrender their vested additions for cash."

Law 28 provided that "the surplus shall eventually belong to those policies only on which there has been paid into the common fund, either by single payment or annual contributions, a sum which, when accumulated with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, shall be equal in amount to the sum originally assured."

At the beginning of the year 1892 the institution's common fund amounted to £7,801,431, 8s. 2d., and at the end of that year it had increased to £8,126,375, 8s. 9d., shewing an excess of receipts over claims and expenses amounting to £324,944, 0s. 7d.

The directors had lent out considerable sums in Australia and elsewhere out of the United Kingdom. The interest derived from these loans in the year 1892 amounted to £90,359, 8s. 9d. That interest was wholly deposited with the company's bankers in the country where it was collected, and, not being required to meet charges against the common fund in the United Kingdom, it was not remitted to this country in forma specifica, but in terms of the institution's powers it was lent out as opportunity offered in the name of the corporation. It formed part of the "interests" entered in the revenue account of the institution for the year ending 31st December 1892, as given up to the Board of Trade in terms of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 61), sec. 5.

No distribution of surplus took place in the year 1892, the last septennial investigation into the affairs of the institution having taken place in 1887, when out of a surplus amounting to £1,051,035, 8s. £350,345 had been retained, and £700,690 apportioned among the participating members.

"In support of the assessment, the Surveyor maintained that the interest in question did not fall to be dealt with under the 4th case of Schedule D, but was chargeable under Case 1, in section 100 of the Act, as profits, or as 'yearly interest,' under section 102, seeing that the institution was resident in the United Kingdom, having its registered office here, and the whole of its business being directed

No. 67.

Dec. 17, 1895. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

from this country; further, that the whole amount of the institution's interests necessarily entered into its published accounts, and was liable to meet all claims, wheresoever arising; and that the mere fact of any portion not having been remitted in forma specifica did not entitle the institution to claim to be brought under Case 4, and even under that case there was constructive remittance."

The questions of law for the decision of the Court were:—"1. Whether the institution is liable to pay income-tax upon the full amount of the interest from investments, either under Case 1 of Schedule D in section 100 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, or under section 102 of the same Act? 2. Whether if, on the other hand, the institution is assessable under the 4th Case of Schedule D, the facts amount to constructive remittance?"

The clauses of the Income-Tax Acts referred to in the discussion are quoted below.*

---

* Section 5 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 7), enacted—(1) that there shall be charged for the year 1893-94, "in respect of all property, profits, and gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Income-tax Act, 1853, the following duties of income-tax (that is to say):—For every twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of property, profits, and gains chargeable under Schedules A, C, D, or E of the said Act, the duty of sevenpence: And for every twenty shillings of the annual value of the occupation of lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages chargeable under Schedule B of the said Act—In England the duty of threepence-halfpenny: In Scotland and Ireland respectively the duty of twopence-halfpenny." "(2) All such provisions contained in any Act relating to income-tax as were in force on the fifth day of April 1893 (except section 4 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1892), shall have full force and effect with respect to the duties of income-tax hereby granted so far as the same are consistent with this Act."

Section 2 of the Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), enacted that the duties granted by that Act "shall be deemed to be granted and made payable yearly for and in respect of the several properties, profits, and gains respectively described or comprised in the several schedules contained in this Act, and marked respectively A, B, C, D, and E, and to be charged under such respective schedules."

Section 5 enacted that the said duties shall be assessed and raised under the regulations and provisions of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, and the Acts therein mentioned, and also of any Acts subsequently passed explaining, altering, amending, or continuing that Act, and that for this purpose all these Acts shall be revived.

The Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 1, enacted that, from and after 5th April 1842, there should be charged, during the time thereinafter limited, "the several rates and duties mentioned in the several schedules contained in this Act, and marked respectively A, B, C, D, and E."

Section 100 enacted,—"And be it enacted that the duties hereby granted contained in the schedule marked D, shall be assessed under the following rules . . . :—Rules for ascertaining the said last mentioned duties in the particular cases herein mentioned. . . .

"Third Case.—The duty to be charged in respect of profits of an uncertain annual value not charged in Schedule A.

"First.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed at a sum not less than the full amount of the profits or gains arising therefrom within the preceding year, ending as in the first case, to b

No. 67.

Dec. 17, 1895.

Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

Argued for the Surveyor of Taxes;—The Crown had an option to tax either profits or interests accruing on investments.[1] The statements of facts in the cases were insufficient to enable the Court to determine the amount of profits earned by the institutions, and the Crown accordingly, for that reason, did not press their claims under Case 1 of Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act of 1842, but maintained that the interests in question were taxable under section 102 of that Act. Under that section all "yearly interest" was chargeable without any limitation, and it made special reference to interest on foreign investments. The section had never been repealed. The meaning of the reference to Case 3 of Schedule D was that the duty levied under section 102 was to be levied in accordance with the rules of Case 3, and the rule applicable to the present case was Rule 1. The fact that Case 3 contained rules not applicable to interest on investments could not prevent that section from applying to interest which its terms paid on the actual amount of such profits or gains, without any deduction. . . .

---

"Fourth Case.—The duty to be charged in respect of interest arising from securities . . . in the British Plantations in America, or in any other of Her Majesty's dominions out of Great Britain, and foreign securities, except such annuities, dividends, and shares as are directed to be charged under Schedule C of this Act.

"The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year, without any deduction or abatement."

Section 102 enacts,—"And be it enacted that upon all annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payments, whether such payments shall be payable within or out of Great Britain, either as a charge on any property of the person paying the same by virtue of any deed or will or otherwise, or as a reservation thereout, or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, or whether the same shall be received and payable half-yearly, or at any shorter or more distant periods, there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof the sum of sevenpence, without deduction, according to and under and subject to the provisions by which the duty in the third case of Schedule D may be charged; provided that in every case where the same shall be payable out of profits and gains brought into charge by virtue of this Act, no assessment shall be made upon the person entitled to such annuity, interest, or other annual payment, but the whole of such profits or gains shall be charged with duty on the person liable to such annual payment, and the person so liable to make such annual payment . . . shall be authorised to deduct out of such annual payment at the rate of sevenpence for every twenty shillings of the amount thereof . . . but in every case where any annual payment as aforesaid shall, by reason of the same being charged on any property or security in the British Plantations, or in any other of Her Majesty's dominions, or on any foreign property or security, or otherwise, be received or receivable without any such deduction as aforesaid, and in every case where any such payment shall be made from profits or gains not charged by this Act . . . then and in every such case there shall be charged upon such interest, annuity, or other annual payment as aforesaid, the duty before mentioned, according to and under and subject to the several and respective privileges by which the duty in the third case of Schedule D may be charged. . . ."

[1] Clerical, Medical, and General Life Assurance Society v. Carter, 1889, L. R., 22 Q. B. D. 444; Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. Inland Revenue, Nov. 19, 1886, 14 R. 98.

No. 67.

Dec. 17, 1895. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

clearly covered. If it were held that the interests in question were to be charged under Case 4, they were still chargeable, on the ground that they had been constructively remitted to this country. The interests being taken into account in making up the accounts of the institutions, and therefore in estimating the divisible surplus, must be held to be constructively remitted.[1]

Argued for the Scottish Provident Institution;—The Crown claimed an option to charge either under section 102 or Schedule D, Case 4. It might be that a sum fell into two categories, with an option to the Crown to select under which it would charge, but that was not the nature of the right claimed here, which was a right to charge under section 102 what was excepted from the charge under Case 4. That was clearly an untenable position, for if section 102 applied the Crown would be bound to charge under it, and could have no right to let the interest escape taxation by charging under Case 4. Further, if the power to charge contended for was given by section 102, that was contrary to the scheme of the Income-Tax Acts from the beginning. The schedules had always contained the subjects upon which duty was leviable, and the Act[2] under which income-tax was now leviable imposed the duty only upon the subjects mentioned in the schedules of the Act of 1853. The contention now put forward by the Crown was seriously asserted for the first time. It had been suggested in the case of the Clerical, &c. Insurance Company, and had been emphatically rejected.[3] Section 102 was really a rule applicable to the duties chargeable under Schedule D. Its real function was to be found in its provisos. It was supposed to have been framed to meet the case of such bodies as parochial boards, which had debts to pay but no assessable profits.[4] Cases 4 and 5 of the Act of 1842 dealt exhaustively with income derived from money or property abroad, and in both cases the tax was only laid on money received in this country. The words "received or receivable," in section 102, must be read in consistency with Case 4, and meant received or receivable in this country. It was only by asserting section 102 to be a charging section, that the Crown's contention could be maintained, and the reference to Case 3 made it unworkable in practice. If such interests as were here in question had been intended to be taxed there would have been a direction in Schedule G of the Act of 1842 with regard to the return to be made. In the absence of such a direction the penalty for making a false return by the omission of such interest could not be enforced. The alternative claim of the Crown under Case 4 failed, for there had been no constructive remittance. It was not sufficient to constitute constructive remittance that the interest was included in the statement of accounts. It must be used for the purposes of the concern, and that was the ground of decision in the case of the Scottish Mortgage Company.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The learned counsel for the Crown stated that they

[1] Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. Inland Revenue, Nov. 19, 1886, 14 R. 98.

[2] Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893.

[3] Clerical, Medical, and General Life Assurance Co. v. Carter, 1889, L. R., 21 Q. B. D. 339, per Charles, J., p. 347.

[4] Bell v. Bunny, 1 Kay and Johnston, 216, per V. C. Sir W. Page Wood, p. 219.

No. 67.
Dec. 17, 1895.
Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

considered that the facts stated in the case were not sufficient to raise their claim under Case 1 of Schedule D. They were anxious, however, to explain that it was solely on the ground of deficient statement of the facts relating to the institution which is respondent in this appeal that they did not on the present occasion advance this claim against this mutual society.

The claim of the Crown was accordingly rested alternatively on section 102 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, and the 4th Case of Schedule D.

The argument under section 102 is admittedly novel, and it involves surprising consequences.

Case 4 of Schedule D purports to state the duty to be charged on interest arising on colonial and foreign securities, and it limits, by the terms of the rule, the taxable amount to the sums received in the United Kingdom. This reads as if it were, and has hitherto been supposed to be, an exhaustive statement of the liability to duty of this class of securities. The present argument is that section 102 subjects to duty the whole of such interests, disregarding the distinction drawn in Case 4 between what is yielded in the country of the security and what is received in the United Kingdom. If this view be sound section 102 subjects to duty a class of property, profits, and gains not included in Schedules A, B, C, D, or E, to wit, interest arising from colonial or foreign securities, but not received in the United Kingdom.

The answer to this argument is twofold. First, the statute under which, primarily, the Crown claims duty from the respondent company is the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893, and the operative section is the fifth. Now, the things on which duty is charged by that section are the property, profits, and gains chargeable under Schedules A, C, D, and E of the Income-Tax Act, 1853, and the occupation of lands (and so on) under Schedule B of that Act. These schedules, therefore, state the limits of the income-tax granted by the Act of 1893. The same section (5) goes on to provide that all such provisions contained in any Income-Tax Act as were in force during the preceding year, should have full force and effect, "with respect to the duties of income-tax hereby granted."

If, then, and in so far as section 102 of the Act of 1842 subjected to tax things not covered by the lettered schedules, it was not in force during the year 1893-94. This seems to me to be a sound answer to the argument for the Crown, and, if sound, it is conclusive.

It would appear, however, that section 102 never had the effect now sought to be ascribed to it. An examination of the Act of 1842 shews that the first section sets forth the schedules as defining the subjects of the tax, and that the group of sections, of which section 102 is one, are merely executive or administrative directions for carrying out the schedules and rules. Section 102 certainly is so expressed as in terms to charge with duty; but the general words used are in truth introductory to the provisos, and they are general, because they are introductory, and therefore do not rehearse the limitations which have been already expressed.

Accordingly I am against the Crown on section 102.

On the alternative argument on Case 4 of Schedule D I think the facts fail the Crown. There is nothing, as far as appears, done with the

No. 67.

Dec. 17, 1895. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution.

colonial interests in question, except to leave them where they are. The phrase "constructive remittance" in the second query in these cases is one which, if used at all, requires to be carefully guarded. As employed in the present argument, it would practically obliterate the limitation in the rule of Case 4. Every man, and every company, having foreign or colonial investments of course knows of the interest arising from them, takes note of it, and enters it in any statement of affairs which may require to be made up. But this will never make the interest "received in the United Kingdom." The New Mexican case[1] was totally different. The money there could only be said not to have been received if money sent home by bill is not received in this country, or if no colonial interests are received in the United Kingdom which do not reach it in specific form.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—G. M. PAUL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 68.

Dec. 18, 1895. Bartsch v. Poole & Co.

GUSTAV HERMAN BARTSCH AND ANOTHER, Complainers (Reclaimers).—Sym—T. B. Morison.

POOLE & COMPANY, Respondents.—Cook.

Bill of Exchange—Protest for non-payment—Bill payable at drawer's office—Form of protest where acceptor fails to appear or provide funds—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 51, subsec. (7).—Subsection 7 of section 51 of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 provides that a protest must specify, inter alia, "the demand made, and the answer given, if any, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found."

A bill payable on demand at the drawer's office was protested for non-payment. The protest bore that the notary "presented the said bill at the place where payable to a clerk there, who made answer that no funds had been provided to meet said bill, and payment was refused accordingly."

Held that the drawer could not be regarded as agent of the acceptor for payment to himself, and therefore that the protest was invalid, as it failed to state that the acceptor could not be found.

Bill of Exchange—Protest for non-payment—Demand for payment.—Held by Lord Kincairney that an extract registered protest was not invalid because it did not state expressly that a demand for payment had been made, but merely stated that the bill had been presented and that payment had been refused.

Bill of Exchange—Protest for non-payment—Demand for payment when sum already paid to account.—Held by Lord Kincairney that an extract registered protest which set forth that a bill had been presented, and that payment had been refused, and that the notary protested the bill against the acceptor, but always under deduction of a sum paid to account, was not invalid because it did not state that the demand on presentation was limited to the balance due on the bill.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ON 14th May 1895 Gustav Herman Bartsch, hotel-keeper, Edinburgh, and R. M. Douglas, S.S.C., accepted a bill for £350, bearing to be for value received, drawn by Poole & Company, corporate accountants, Edinburgh, and payable on demand within Poole & Company's office in Edinburgh.

[1] 14 R. 98.

No. 68.

Dec. 18, 1895.
Bartsch v. Poole & Co.

On the same date, by a separate writing, the acceptors obliged themselves to pay the amount of the bill by weekly instalments of £10, and stated,—"In the event of our failing to call upon you and pay said instalments, you are to be entitled to recover from us, at any time thereafter, the whole sum or balance due on the said bill."

Upon 14th June the weekly instalments having fallen into arrear, the bill was protested by Poole & Company for non-payment. The protest, after reciting the bill, bore, inter alia, that the notary "presented the said bill at the place where payable to a clerk there, who made answer that no funds had been provided to meet said bill, and payment was refused accordingly. Wherefore, I, at request foresaid, do hereby protest the said bill against Gustav Herman Bartsch, 25 Hanover Street, and R. M. Douglas, 5 Annandale Street, all Edinburgh, conjunctly and severally, the acceptors thereof, for non-payment of the contents, and for all interest, damages, and expenses, as accords, but always under deduction of the sum of £19, 19s. sterling paid to account."

On 20th June the protest was recorded by Poole & Company, and the acceptors were charged thereon.

A suspension of the charge was brought by Bartsch and Douglas, who stated that the bill "was not presented to either of the complainers, or at their dwelling-places, or places of business, and payment was never asked by the notary-public who purports to have protested said bill from either of said complainers before protesting it for non-payment. The said Poole & Company knew the addresses of both of the complainers, and that they would have paid the bill if it had been presented to them, as the said Poole & Company were bound to do. Said protest is null and void in respect it does not comply with the provisions of section 51, subsection 7, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882."*

On 30th November the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) refused the prayer of the note.†

---

* Subsection 7 of section 51 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, enacts,—"A protest must contain a copy of the bill, and must be signed by the notary making it, and must specify (a) the person at whose request the bill is protested; (b) the place and date of protest, the cause or reason for protesting the bill, the demand made, and the answer given, if any, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found."

† "OPINION.— . . . It was argued that the protest on which the charge proceeded was irregular in two particulars,—first, because it did not state the demand made on presentation; and secondly, because if it did it stated that the demand was made for more than was due.

"The first of these objections is founded on section 51, subsection 7, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), which provides, inter alia, that a protest must specify 'the demand made.' The protest in this case bears that the bill was 'presented,' and it does not say expressly what demand was made, if any. The bill is copied at the beginning of the protest in the usual way, and appears ex facie of the copy to be an accepted bill, and I think it is a legitimate inference that, when it was presented, it was presented for payment. Section 45 of the Act provides that 'a bill is duly presented for payment which is presented in accordance with the following rules': None of these rules requires the making of any demand other than what is implied by the presentment. I am of opinion that a presentment for payment is a demand for payment, and that the protest in

No. 68.

Dec. 18, 1895. Bartsch v. Poole & Co.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—A protest being a step in summary diligence must be construed strictly.[1] In this case the protest was invalid. In the first place, because it did not set forth that a demand for payment had been made. A demand for payment could not be implied from presentation to a clerk of the drawers.[2] In the second place, if the protest was to be read as implying that the bill was presented for payment, the demand was for more than was due, being for the whole amount of the bill, without deduction of the sums paid to account.

Argued for the respondents;—Trifling errors would not be held to vitiate a protest.[3] Here the protest complied with the requisites of the statute. It clearly implied that a demand for payment had been made. Further, the protest must be read as a whole, and so read it clearly bore that the demand was for the amount of the bill, less the sums paid to account. On the analogy of procedure in adjudications it would not vitiate the proceedings if too much was claimed, provided that the protest was only for non-payment of the amount due.[4] It was, perhaps, unwise for the acceptors to agree that the bill should be payable on demand at the drawer's office, but such a stipulation was perfectly valid, and was analogous to the common case where a bank was named as the place for payment in a bill drawn by the bank upon one of its customers.

Lord President.—The objections to this protest which are discussed by the Lord Ordinary in detail are of a critical character, and, should they arise again, I do not know that anything we have occasion to decide in this case will prejudice these questions. But it appears to me that this protest, against which it is pleaded that it is irregular and inept, discloses a more radical objection than those discussed by the Lord Ordinary. The bill provides that payment is to be made to Poole & Company, on demand within their own office. Now, that is an undertaking on the part of the debtors to be there at the office with the money and pay it to Poole. If they had paid it to Poole, the protest would plainly have been incom-stating that the bill was presented sufficiently complies with the requirement of the statute that the protest shall state the demand made.

---

"But, in the second place, it is objected that, if this was so, then the demand must have been for more than was due, namely, for the whole sum in the bill, whereas at the time £20 or £19, 19s. had been paid to account, and I think that this is so. But then I have not been able to find any authority for the position that a protest is invalid, and not a ground for diligence, which states that the demand made was in excess, if the protest itself is (as in this case) only for the sum in the bill, crediting payments to account. There is no provision in the Bills of Exchange Act to that effect. No decision on the point was quoted, and I was not informed that there was any settled practice in the matter. I confess to some doubt and difficulty on this point, but I have come to think that the bill was dishonoured when payment of what was due on it was not provided or made, and that being dishonoured, it might be protested. . . ."

[1] M'Pherson v. Wright, May 19, 1885, 12 R. 942.

[2] Bon v. Rollo, July 20, 1850, 12 D. 1310, per Lord Wood, p. 1311, 18 Scot. Jur. 265.

[3] Crichton v. Watt, November 25, 1830, 9 S. 68, 3 Scot. Jur. 38; Gordon v. Sloss, June 3, 1848, 10 D. 1129, 20 Scot. Jur. 415.

[4] Maxwell v. Riddell, 1743, M. 110; MacKinnell, 1797, M. 312.

No. 68.

Dec. 18, 1895.
Bartsch v. Poole & Co.

petent, and what is set out on the face of this protest is that Poole & Company make a demand upon themselves, because they say that the notary presented the bill to a clerk there, who made answer that no funds had been provided to meet said bill, &c. Payment, therefore, was refused by the creditor to the creditor. Now, according to the fair reading of the bill, the debtor was bound to come to Poole's office and be there with the money, and the Act of Parliament provides that if the debtor fails to come that is to be noted in the protest; the statute contemplates as alternatives either that the debtor or some one authorised by him is there, or that the debtor may not be found at all. In the present case no one was there but the creditor, the debtor was absent, and accordingly the proper form of protest was to record the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found. It is quite familiar practice that bills are sometimes made payable at a bank, and there of course the banker and his clerks are the agents of the debtor. There is no occasion to look round for the personal presence of the debtor when he has accredited the bank to represent him and pay; and in that case I have no doubt that the common form of protest would rightly record the fact. But, in this case, it is preposterous to say that the creditor is accredited by the debtor to pay himself, and what is recorded on the face of this protest is, that the wholly inept proceeding of demanding payment from the creditor was all that was done. Upon that ground, and that ground only, I think the diligence must be suspended.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is a familiar provision in bills of exchange that they should be payable at a bank, or, in the case of a foreign debtor, that they should be payable at the office of an agent in the country where payment is to be made. In all such cases the reasonable presumption is that the person, whose place of business is prescribed as the place of payment, is the debtor's agent for payment. In this case, as has been pointed out, the proper form of protest is that the notary should state that the bill was presented at the proper place to some party authorised to act as the debtor's representatives, and that payment was refused. But where the bill is made payable at the debtor's residence or at a public place, such as the Stock Exchange or the like, and there is no agent indicated, it is equally clear that the debtor must attend at the place prescribed in the bill with his money, and be ready to make payment. That is the duty of the debtor, and accordingly if he does not come the creditor can protest the bill under the words of the code to which your Lordship has referred, the protest in that case containing the statement that the debtor could not be found. A stipulation for payment at the creditor's office is not very usual, but according to my opinion it falls under the second of the categories to which I have referred, because I am unable to understand how the creditor in a bill can be the agent of the debtor for payment to himself. The duty of the debtor is to attend with the money. It is not a matter of technicality, but the fair meaning of the words of the bill is that the debtor undertakes to come and make payment. On this view of the case I agree that the diligence must fall, because the protest does not state that the debtor was not found at the place of payment.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

No. 68. LORD ADAM was absent.

Dec. 18, 1895. Bartsch v. Poole & Co.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and suspended the charge.

GEORGE F. WELSH—JOHN A. ROBERTSON—Agents.

No. 69. DAVID LOGAN AND OTHERS (Byres' Trustees), Pursuers, Real Raisers, and Claimants (Respondents).—M'Lennan—Wilton.
MRS GEMMELL AND ANOTHER, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Lord-Adv. Sir Charles Pearson—Guy.
MRS M'CHLERY AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents).—Kennedy.

Dec. 20, 1895. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

Trust—Universal trust-disposition—Power to revoke.—A trust-disposition was executed in the following terms:—"I . . . appoint" A and B, "my trustees and managers of my affairs, and that absolutely, and for that purpose I assign, dispone, and make over to them . . . my whole heritable and moveable property . . . And I direct my trustees as follows:—(First) My said trustees shall take possession of my estates foresaid, as I hereby authorise them to do, for the purposes after mentioned; (Second) My said trustees will give me the free income of my estate during my lifetime, and I undertake not to interfere with them in any manner of way; (Third) At my death I direct my said trustees to dispose of my estates after making payment of the legacies after mentioned." Directions then followed as to the disposal of the truster's estate at her death, and the payment of legacies, and the deed concluded with a clause recalling and cancelling all prior settlements executed by the truster.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the deed was to be construed as creating a trust for administration only, that it did not divest the granter of her right to the estate conveyed, and that it was revocable.

Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, 22 R. 927, distinguished.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ON 14th February 1894 Mrs Byres executed a trust-disposition in the following terms:—"I . . . do hereby appoint . . . my trustees and managers of my affairs, and that absolutely: And for that purpose I assign, dispone, and make over to them, and the acceptors and survivors of them, my whole heritable and moveable property, of whatever nature and description the same may be, wheresoever situated, together with all the title-deeds, vouchers, evidences, and instructions thereof, and all as more particularly described in the title-deeds and documents in regard thereto: And I direct my said trustees as follows:—(First) My said trustees shall take possession of my estates foresaid, as I hereby authorise them to do, for the purposes after mentioned; (Second) My said trustees will give me the free income of my said estates during my lifetime, and I undertake not to interfere with them in any manner of way; (Third) At my death I direct my said trustees to dispose of my estates after making payment of the legacies after mentioned; (Fourth) In the event of Mrs Catherine Byres or Gemmell, wife of John Dick Gemmell, veterinary surgeon, Ayr, surviving me and having lawful issue, two-thirds of my estates, and of the free income of said estates, will be given to her and to her children equally, share and share alike, thereafter; but in the event of no issue of the marriage, she, the said Catherine Byres or Gemmell, will have her liferent use allenarly of the said two-thirds of the free income of my estates . . . (Sixth) The remaining one-third of my estates I direct to be divided, in the discretion of my said trustees, among my relatives, viz., the family of the late William Henry, crofter, Broadstone, Stranraer; (Seventh)

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

Failing any issue of the marriage of the said Catherine Byres or Gemmell . . . the whole of my estates will be equally divided among the family of the said William Henry." After directing the trustees to pay certain legacies the deed proceeded,—"(Tenth) My said trustees are hereby authorised to recover all documents pertaining to my said estates, with full powers; (Eleventh) An inventory and valuation will then be made up, including all accounts, to enable my said trustees to see the state of my affairs; (Twelfth) My trustees shall employ James Stewart Carnochan, writer, Stranraer, to be their law-agent and factor in my estates: I recall and cancel all prior settlements made and executed by me."

On 23d April Mrs Byres executed a deed of revocation of the above trust-disposition.

Mrs Byres died on 27th May 1894, leaving a disposition and settlement, dated 23d April 1894, by which she bequeathed to her daughter, Mrs Gemmell, the whole estate and effects, real and personal, then belonging to her, or which should belong to her at her death, and appointed Mrs Gemmell her sole executrix.

A question having arisen, inter alia, as to whether Mrs Byres had validly revoked her trust-disposition and settlement of 14th February 1894, the trustees appointed by that deed brought an action of multiplepoinding against Mrs Gemmell and the other beneficiaries named in the trust-disposition.

Claims were lodged by (1) Mrs Gemmell, with consent of her husband; (2) Mrs M'Chlery and others, the children of the deceased William Henry; and (3) the trustees nominated by the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Byres.

Mrs Gemmell denied that the trust-disposition had been delivered, et separatim, maintained that it had been validly revoked by Mrs Byres, and claimed the whole fund in medio under the disposition and settlement in her favour.

Mrs M'Chlery and the other children of William Henry (Mrs Gemmell having issue), claimed under the sixth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Byres. They and the trustees appointed by that deed averred that it had been delivered, and maintained that it was irrevocable.

On 3d December the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced an interlocutor, in which, inter alia, he found that the trust-disposition executed by Mrs Byres on 14th February 1894 was irrevocable, if duly delivered, and that it had not, if delivered, been effectually revoked; allowed a proof on the question of delivery; and granted leave to reclaim.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . . . It is maintained, on the one hand, that Mrs Byres revoked her earlier deed; and, on the other hand, that that deed was irrevocable.

"That, however, is not the sole question raised, for Mrs Gemmell now avers distinctly that the first trust-disposition was never delivered, while the other claimants aver that it was. Further, Mrs Gemmell avers that the first trust-deed was fraudulently impetrated from Mrs Byres while she was physically weak and unable to understand what she was doing. Conversely, the claimants Mrs M'Chlery and others aver that she was of sound mind when she executed the first deed, but that the revocation and second trust-deed were fraudulently impetrated from her when she was weak and facile.

"It appears to me that there is nothing which I have hitherto decided

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

Mrs Gemmell and her husband reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the trust-disposition was irrevocable. Its declared object was to transfer the management of the granter's estates to the trustees; the undertaking in the second purpose not to interfere with the trustees was inconsistent with an intention to operate an irrevocable divestiture, and the revocation of prior settlements indicated that in the view of the granter she was making a settlement. Further, the deed dealt with the universitas of the estate of the granter. The Lord Ordinary was wrong in thinking that it would not carry acquirenda, and the probabilities were all against an intention on the part of the granter to divest herself irrevocably of her whole estate. This quality of the deed distinguished it from those under consideration in the cases of Mackie, Robertson, and Murray,[1] which all dealt with partial conveyances. A further distinction existed in the case of Murray,[1] where the deeds were expressly declared to be irrevocable. The purposes of the deed were also purely testamentary. Apart from the liferent reserved to the granter there were no provisions intended to take effect during her which can prevent me from entertaining and deciding all these pleas, but I think that it is not in accordance with our ordinary practice to try the questions raised as to the validity of the deeds except in actions of reduction. At the same time I reserve my opinion as to the competency of trying these issues in this multiplepoinding, and, at all events, the consent of parties might obviate the necessity of raising reductions.

---

"In these circumstances all the parties pressed me to decide in limine the question as to the revocability of the first trust-disposition on the footing that it was competently executed, and on the footing that it was delivered. No one disputed that it might be revoked if it had never been delivered. The pleading might take this form, that the averment that the deed was delivered was irrelevant, seeing that it was revocable and revoked. All parties were of opinion that it would be convenient to take this course, and though I am by no means clear as to the convenience of that course, yet, as the question was carefully argued, and as the authorities were fully discussed, I have come to think that I may comply with the wishes of the parties, in the hope that elsewhere the same course may be followed.

"The trust-deed is short and simple enough, but a good deal depends on the precise phraseology. It proceeds as follows:—(His Lordship recited the provisions of the deed.)

"Now, the question put is, whether this deed was entirely revoked. There is no question about its partial revocation. Nobody but the Henrys and the trustees have pleaded that it is irrevocable. In particular, neither Archibald Drummond nor any of the other legatees have appeared to state that plea. The trustees represent that they consider it their duty to take that plea, in order to protect the interest of Mrs Gemmell's child, a pupil born after Mrs Byres' death, seeing that the interests of the pupil and of Mrs Gemmell are antagonistic. I understand that no child of Mrs Gemmell was alive when Mrs Byres executed the trust-deeds now in question.

"I have found the question whether Mrs Byres' deed was revocable or no, supposing it was delivered, a very difficult one; for I am much impressed with certain features in the deed of a character apparently testamentary. It bestows 'legacies'; it revokes all 'previous settlements'; and, but for previous decisions, I might have leaned to the view that the deed

---

[1] Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, March 6, 1884, 11 R. (H. L.) 10; Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, 19 R. 849; Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, July 17, 1895, 22 R. 927.

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

lifetime, and there was no immediate vesting of the fee. The deed was therefore revocable.[1] The case was distinguished from Smitton and Robertson,[2] for in both these cases there were provisions which took immediate effect, and from Turnbulls,[3] Mackie,[3] and the recent case of Shedden,[3] because in each of these cases there was immediate vesting of the fee. In Spalding's[4] case the decision did not turn upon the question of the revocability of the deed under consideration, and upon that question Lord Deas and Lord Mure expressed the view that the deed was revocable. The balance of opinion was therefore against the view of the Lord President in that case, as Lord Ardmillan expressed no certain opinion on the point.

Argued for the claimants Mrs M'Chlery and others and Mrs Byres' trustees;—The deed divested the granter absolutely. It was no answer to say that no immediate beneficial interest was given, for the deed contained a de præsenti conveyance, and the object of that conveyance was that the trustees should hold for the fiars, though the date of payment was necessarily after the death of the liferentrix.

---

was testamentary; but I think that the previous cases point too decidedly in the opposite direction, and that on the decisions I am obliged to hold that the deed was irrevocable if delivered.

"The description of the estates conveyed is very wide, yet it does not include acquirenda. It is not a conveyance of the estate as it might exist at the date of the granter's death. It is a conveyance de presenti; prima facie it divests the granter, and it may be doubtful whether she could have been reinvested except by a conveyance from the trustees. The trustees are directed and empowered to take possession of the estates. It was to have immediate operation. The trustees were to pay the liferent of it to the granter, but that seems the only effect which it was to have during her life, and, if there had been no provision in the deed but that, I think she might have revoked it, notwithstanding her somewhat singular undertaking not to interfere. I would have had difficulty in holding that the fourth purpose, by which two-thirds of her estate is directed to be given to Mrs Gemmell and her children, would prevent revocation, seeing that Mrs Gemmell is not maintaining that it does, and seeing, as I understand to be the fact, that she had no children alive at its date. If the deed had conferred no other right, I think that the principle of the cases of Murison v. Dick, 10th February 1854, 16 D. 529, and Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, 10th July 1878, 5 R. 1027, in which it was held that where a deed conveyed no interest to any living person it was not beyond the granter's power to recall, would apply, but by the sixth clause a clear right is conferred on the family of the truster's brother, William Henry. It is not to be payable until after the truster's death, but it is a right conferred by a deed assumed to be delivered during life, and in such a case I consider that the decision compels the conclusion that the trustees, when they received the estate, held it for these beneficiaries.

"In that view I must hold that the present case is of the same nature as the cases in which a delivered deed conferring a right, whether accruing

---

[1] Murison v. Dick, Feb. 10, 1854, 16 D. 529, 26 Scot. Jur. 239; Fernie v. Colquhoun's Trustees, Dec. 20, 1854, 17 D. 232, 27 Scot. Jur. 86; Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027.

[2] Smitton v. Tod, Dec. 12, 1839, 2 D. 225, 12 Scot. Jur. 241; Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, 19 R. 849.

[3] Turnbulls v. Tawse, April 15, 1828, 1 W. and S. 80; Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, 11 R. (H. L.) 10; Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees, Nov. 29, 1895, supra, p. 228.

[4] Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1874, 2 R. 237.

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

Such a deed could not be recalled by the granter.[1] It was not correct to say that there was immediate vesting of the fee in the case of Turnbulls.[1] In Spalding's[1] case the conveyance was granted in consideration of the "full trust and confidence" which the granter had in the trustees appointed, and there was revocation of prior settlements. The opinion expressed by the Lord President in that case was referred to by Lord Rutherfurd Clark in Mackie[2] as correctly summing up the result of the previous cases. Fernie[3] was a case of donatio inter virum et uxorem, and was quite distinct from the present, and in Mackenzie's[4] case there was no person having an interest in the fee of the estate conveyed in existence at the date of revocation.

---

immediately or in the future, whether vested or contingent, has been held to be irrevocable. The more important and most closely applicable of these cases seem to be these: Turnbull v. Tawse, 15th April 1828, 1 W. and S. 80; Smitton v. Tod, 12th December 1839, 2 D. 225; Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, 18th December 1874, 2 R. 237; Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, 9th March 1883, 10 R. 746; Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, 7th June 1892, 19 R. 849; and Downie's Curator Bonis v. Macfarlane's Trustees, 20th July 1895, 32 S. L. R. 715. The case of Spalding's Trustees is especially valuable for the exposition of the law by the late Lord President. His Lordship was, indeed, in the minority, but it is to be remarked the case was not decided on the ground that the deed was revocable, but on the ground that the posthumous child, to which the case related, was a prior creditor. As to the irrevocability of the deed, the Court seem to have been equally divided. I would refer, in particular, to the opinion of Lord Rutherfurd Clark in the case of Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees. Many other cases were quoted, but I think that they, or some of them, relate to different categories of law, and I regard as inapplicable cases in which deeds were held irrevocable because granted by a married woman for her own protection, or because they partook of the character of marriage-contracts; and, on the other hand, cases where deeds were held to be revocable as donations inter virum et uxorem. Counsel for Mrs Gemmell relied somewhat specially on Costine's Trustees v. Costine, 19th March 1878, 5 R. 782, aff. Wightman v. Costine, 20th March 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 13, but I am not able to see that that case applies.

"It may not be impossible to regard a deed as in part revocable and in part irrevocable, as was done in the case of Leckie v. Leckie's Trustees, 22d November 1776, M. Presumption, No. 1. But there the decision turned on delivery, and it was held that the deed was delivered as a disposition of heritage, and not delivered as regards moveables,—apparently rather a difficult position. I think, however, that in this case I cannot distinguish between the various parts of the deed; nor really does the question arise whether a partial revocation would have been effectual. My judgment, in any view, can only affect the parties who have appeared. I cannot, however, do more than find that the deed, if delivered, was irrevocable and has not been revoked, and it will be necessary to ascertain whether there was delivery or not."

[1] Smitton v. Tod, Dec. 12, 1839, 2 D. 225, 12 Scot. Jur. 241; Turnbulls v. Tawse, April 15, 1828, 1 W. and S. 80; Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, July 17, 1895, 22 R. 927; Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1874, 2 R. 237, opinion of the Lord President; Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, 19 R. 849.

[2] Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, March 9, 1883, 10 R. 746, per Lord Rutherfurd Clark, at p. 759.

[3] Fernie v. Colquhoun's Trustees, Dec. 20, 1854, 17 D. 232, 27 Scot. Jur. 86.

[4] Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027.

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is a very well-settled rule of law that a trust for the administration of the granter's affairs in his lifetime, including the payment of his debts, does not divest the granter. Notwithstanding the execution of such a deed, he retains the radical beneficial interest in his estate. He may revoke the deed at pleasure, or may even without noticing the trust make an effectual destination of his property to heirs or legatees. When the trust as originally constituted contains words of disposal of the fee or reversion, then it is a question of construction whether an irrevocable right is intended to be given to the beneficiaries, or whether the beneficial provisions are properly and in substance testamentary.

In general, if the beneficial provisions are expressed in the form of a direction to trustees to divide the surplus estate at the granter's death, and if there is nothing in the deed establishing an intention on the part of the granter to renounce the power to revoke which, as I have said, always remains to him when the trust is for administration, then I should say the trust is one for administration first and for testamentary purposes afterwards, but that no right is given to anyone in the truster's lifetime. But of course an owner of property may divest himself in his lifetime of all his rights, including the right to revoke the deed by which he divests himself. There is no difficulty in framing such a deed as when delivered will give an indefeasible interest to the beneficiaries named in it. If the primary purpose of the trust is administration for the granter's benefit, then I think the presumption with reference to any further declaration of purposes is, that the granter does not part with the power of future disposal. But this presumption may be displaced by a clear expression of the intention to constitute an immediate beneficial interest in the persons favoured.

There are two modes of doing this which have been very much considered in the decisions. That is to say, if the deed either directs the trustees to hold or stand possessed of the estate for certain persons in fee, subject to the granter's life interest, or if the right given to the beneficiaries is declared to be irrevocable, in either case it is perfectly clear that the granter has divested himself of all future interest in or control over his estate excepting as to the liferent, or whatever right he reserves to himself. The case of a trust to hold receives illustration in Turnbulls v. Tawse,[1] where the trust-deed narrates that it was intended that the residue should be "effectually secured" to the spouses in liferent and their children in fee; also in the cases of Spalding[2] and Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees,[3] and, I think, in nearly all the cases that were cited. In the most recent decision bearing on this point, Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees,[4] decided in this Division, I do not find in the report that the truster had used words expressing the wish that the trustees should immediately hold for the beneficiaries, but there does occur that very important provision in a question of this kind,—that the deed was declared to be irrevocable. That of course means that the deed was to be irrevocable in all its provisions, that the interest given to the fiars was irrevocable, and therefore that the estate was put beyond the granter's control.

Now, in the present case, I find neither a direction to the trustees to hold

[1] 1 W. and S. 80.
[2] 2 R. 237.
[3] 10 R. 746.
[4] 22 R. 927.

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

for the persons who are to take at this lady's death, nor a renunciation of her power to revoke. Indeed I do not think that any clause indicative of intention to pass an immediate interest to the beneficiaries can be pointed out in this deed. It is purely a trust for the management of the truster's affairs in her lifetime, with certain testamentary purposes superadded, beginning with the expression "I direct my trustees to divide." In these circumstances it appears to me that Mrs Byres did not intend to part with her control over her estate, and that she was entitled to revoke the trust. It follows, in my opinion, that the deed under consideration if not effectually revoked (for we are told that there is some extrinsic objection to the revoking instrument) was at least subject to revocation, and reserving the effect of extrinsic objections, that it was well revoked by the deed granted a month before the truster's death.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think the question is one of intention which depends upon the construction of the particular instrument before the Court, and also upon the effect of delivery being made during the lifetime of the granter, for we are to assume that the deed was delivered. There can be no question that delivery of a deed, which operates a divestiture of the granter, is in general a very conclusive proof of the granter's intention that the deed should have immediate effect against him, because delivery of a deed to take immediate effect can in general have no other meaning than that it is intended to put the instrument beyond the power of the granter. But the question of the effect of delivery must always be one of intention, and in order to ascertain the intention with which it has been made we must go in the first place to the deed itself. If it appears that the only or the main purpose of delivery is that trustees to whom it is delivered should hold for donees named in the deed against the donor, the granter of the deed, there can be no doubt that the deed is irrevocable. But that is not a necessary inference in the present case, because delivery was indispensable for the primary purpose of the deed, which is not donation but the management of the truster's estate during her lifetime. It is, I think, clear, both from the terms of the inductive clause and of the directions given to the trustees, that that is the primary purpose of the deed, for what this lady says is, "I do hereby appoint" certain parties named, "my trustees and managers of my affairs"—that is of her own affairs, not those of her donees —"and for that purpose I assign and make over to them my whole estate," and then she goes on to say that the trustees are to take possession of the estate, and to give the free income to her during her lifetime, and she undertakes not to interfere with them in any way,—that is to say, with their management of the estate on her behalf,—a clear indication to my mind that she had put her estate into the hands of the trustees for purposes of management. The granter then goes on further to make certain provisions which are purely testamentary in their nature. I agree with Lord M'Laren that there is no difficulty in engrafting testamentary provisions upon a conveyance in trust for purposes of management, and it appears to me that that is all this lady has done.

I do not think it is necessary to consider the series of cases which were

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

quoted to us, because I think the question is one of construction, and in construing one deed very little assistance is to be derived from the construction put upon other deeds conceived in different language. There is, however, one point which was discussed, and which I think it not immaterial to notice. It appears to me that besides the other distinctions which Lord M'Laren has pointed out between this case and Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees,[1] it is a material difference that there was in that case a direct expression in terms of the granter's intention that the deed should not be revocable. When a deed remains in the custody and control of the granter it matters very little whether it is declared to be revocable or irrevocable, because that question must depend upon the substance of the deed; but where a deed is delivered to third parties, or to trustees for third parties, and the only question is whether or not it is the intention of the truster to make an absolute gift of the subjects conveyed, such a declaration may be a material element for consideration on the construction of the deed, and tends to shew, if it does not shew conclusively, that delivery was made for the purpose of divesting the granter and enabling the trustees to hold against him. The reservation of a liferent, or the provision that the trustees shall pay a liferent to the granter, does not appear to me to create any difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that delivery was intended to operate absolute divestiture of the granter, because the effect of the conveyance to trustees in such terms is to limit the right of the granter, and, if he does nothing more than to give the fee to other parties, and direct the trustees to pay him the liferent, the deed discloses no reason for immediate delivery except an intention to give an immediate interest in fee to the persons whom he desires to favour. But when the granter makes it clear that his main purpose is to provide for the management of the estate during his lifetime for his own behoof, that is a sufficient reason to account for delivery of the deed, and displaces the inference that it was made for the purpose of enabling the trustees to hold the estate for the donees and against the granter.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the question is one of construction, namely, what was the intention of the granter? Now, I think that this is a deed of a compound nature. It is granted in the first place for the purpose of giving trustees the management of the truster's estate, and the remaining purposes are purely testamentary. I see no inconsistency in these two objects being combined. It has been assumed throughout the discussion that the deed was a delivered deed, and in the view I take it necessarily was so, because delivery was necessary to put the trustees in possession and enable them to enter upon the management of the granter's estate. The object and intention of the deed was not to protect any right contingent or vested on the part of beneficiaries, but purely to vest the trustees with the management of the estate. If so it follows that the trustees held during the granter's life for her and no one else, and I agree that a party who appoints trustees to manage his estate for him can put an end to the arrangement when he likes. No doubt the granter undertakes in this case not to interfere with the trustees, but that is a mere promise which she might keep or not, just as she liked. Accordingly, the possession which the trustees had was, in my view, entirely for her and not for the benefit of any of the parties named in the testamentary parts of the deed. I need not go over these, but I may point out that the granter winds up by recalling "all prior settlements made or executed by me," which appears to me to suggest in so many words that this is a settlement. I think it is. I think it gave no right, vested or contingent, to beneficiaries, and that the deed was delivered only for the purpose of the temporary management of the estate by trustees.

[1] 22 R. 927.

No. 69.

Dec. 20, 1895. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in so far as it found that the trust-disposition was irrevocable if duly delivered, and had not, if delivered, been revoked; found that the said trust-disposition was revocable, and also recalled said interlocutor in so far as it allowed a proof in regard to the delivery of the trust-deed.

PETER PEARSON, S.S.C.—HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—MARTIN & M'GLASHAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 70.

Dec. 20, 1895. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

JAMES OGSTON, Complainer (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Asher—Dickson—Abel.

THE ABERDEEN DISTRICT TRAMWAYS COMPANY, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Murray—Ure—Dove Wilson.

Burgh—Street—Obstruction of street—Nuisance—Interdict.—A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. The town-council, which was the Local Authority, approved of these operations.

In a suspension and interdict brought by an inhabitant to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that as the Local Authority were entrusted with the duty of seeing that the streets were cleared in such emergencies as a heavy snowstorm, and as they approved of the methods employed by the tramway company, the note of suspension and interdict fell to be refused.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

JAMES OGSTON of Norwood, manufacturer in Aberdeen, presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Aberdeen District Tramways Company, incorporated by Act of Parliament. The prayer of the note was in these terms:—"To interdict the respondents (1) from removing the snow, hail, slush, or other matter of a like kind, from the lines of tramway running through the public streets or thoroughfares of Aberdeen, on to or upon the sides of the said streets or thoroughfares between the said lines of tramway and the foot-pavements, and in particular from doing so in" certain streets, "or otherwise from so removing said snow, hail, slush, or other like matter, as in any way to interfere with, interrupt, or impede the traffic along the said streets and thoroughfares, and in particular along" the streets mentioned; and "(2) from putting or scattering upon the said streets and thoroughfares and lines of tramways, or any part thereof, and in particular upon any part of the" streets mentioned, "or the lines of tramways therein, salt, or any other similar substance, or otherwise from doing so in time of frost, or when there is snow or slush on the ground, or to do otherwise," &c.

The complainer averred;—(Stat. 3) "For some years the respon

No. 70.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

dents have been in the habit during the winter months, when snow falls, of shifting the snow from off the tramway lines on to the part of the street unoccupied by them, between the tramway lines and the foot-pavement, piling it up in heaps on the streets along the sides of the lines, and thus causing accumulations of considerable depth. They are also invariably in the habit, whenever there is frost or snow or slush on the streets of throwing down salt, all along the tramway lines and on the whole streets between the said lines and for some distance outside the same, for the purpose of thawing the frost and melting the snow and slush. . . ." (Stat. 4) "These operations for clearing their line of rails and rendering them passable for the tramway cars are a source of great inconvenience and danger to the public and horses using the streets. . . . About Christmas 1894 a severe snowstorm commenced in Aberdeen, and thereafter there was snow in Aberdeen on the ground almost constantly for several weeks . . . and the respondents carried on their operations as described . . . In consequence, there was frequently a freezing mixture of salt and snow, made by the respondents as aforesaid, lying on the streets as deep as the horses' knees. As a result of this, serious injury was repeatedly caused to horses passing along the streets belonging to the complainer and others. . . ."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The respondents having no right to carry on the operations complained of, and the same being illegal, the prayer of the note should be granted. (2) The complainer having suffered, and being likely to suffer, serious loss, injury, and damage, by the actings of the respondents, he is entitled to interdict as craved, with expenses.

The respondents stated;—"It is the duty of the Town-council, and not of the respondents, to remove the snow from the streets. The respondents have a statutory right to run their cars. . . ."

The respondents pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (2) The statements of the complainer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the prayer of the note. (4) The operations of the respondents in clearing and keeping clear their lines being within their statutory rights, interdict ought to be refused.

A proof was allowed. The import of the evidence is given in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

On 28th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the prayer of the note.*

* "OPINION.— . . . There is no dispute as to what the respondents actually do. When there is a considerable fall of snow (and it is only in the case of a considerable fall of snow that the alleged nuisance arises), they send a snow-plough along the tramway lines, which, to a great extent, clears the snow off the lines, and also off a space from a foot to 18 inches on either side of the lines. The snow so cleared from the lines is, of course, heaped up by the action of the snow-plough upon either side of the street. Although the snow-plough removes the bulk of the snow from the part of the street operated upon, it does not entirely remove it, and in particular it does not remove it from the grooves in the rails. In order, therefore, to remove the snow from the grooves so that the tramway traffic may be carried on, and to remove the remainder of the snow upon the part of the street occupied by the tramway lines so that fresh snow may not be thrown by the traffic into the grooves, and also that the horses dragging the tramway cars may not slip, the snow-plough is followed by a cart of salt, which is sprinkled upon the lines, and the remaining snow thereby melted.

"It is proved that if the snow was not removed from the grooves tram-

No. 70.

Dec. 20, 1895. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—If the acts of the respondents were injurious to the complainer they constituted a nuisance, and it was no matter if the result of interdict was to stop the cars, for the company had no higher rights in the streets than the complainer. They were in the same position as any commercial company in Aberdeen, except in so far as favoured by the General Tramways Act of 1870, section 62. In point of fact the complainer had suffered injury. The Lord Ordinary thought that the heaps of snow were dangerous, and that the brine was injurious to horses. But the Lord Ordinary thought that the practice which produced these results was demanded by the public interest, and was common in other towns. But the system pursued in other towns was different. As little salt was used as possible, and the tramway companies removed it at once. The sanction of the Town-council was no justification.[1] It was no answer to a private wrong that a public authority approved of the injurious system. The respondents had no right to obstruct the street, relying on the Town-council to remove the obstruction. They must either remove the snow or way traffic could not be carried on, because the cars would leave the rails. It is further proved that the only known method of effectually removing snow and ice from the grooves is by the use of salt.

---

"As soon as possible after the respondents have treated the part of the streets occupied by the tramway lines in the way which I have described. the town authorities send rotary brushes over the parts of the streets so treated, which sweep the melted snow and slush off the lines towards the sides of the streets. The town authorities then collect the snow and slush which has been piled on either side of the tramway lines into heaps, which they afterwards remove in carts.

"After the operations of the respondents are completed, and before the town authorities have carted away the heaps of snow, there is no doubt that a very inconvenient state of matters exists. The centre of the street, where the tramway lines are, is absolutely cleared, but upon either side of the lines are banks of snow (varying in depth according to the amount of the snowfall) and a quantity of slush, at a low temperature, caused by the mixture of snow and salt. The Town-council say that they remove the snow from the streets as quickly as they possibly can, but in the heavy and protracted snowstorm which occurred during the winter of 1894-5, it is proved that the heaps of snow and slush sometimes remained for many days—so long as a week in some cases—before they were removed.

"During the continuance of that state of matters a carriage using the street meets with no obstruction so long as it can keep upon the tramway track. But if it meets a tramway car, or requires to draw into the pavement, it has to be dragged through or over a bank of snow or slush, it may be several feet in depth, and the horses have to pass through or stand in a slush of low temperature composed of brine and half-melted snow.

"A large body of evidence was led as to the effect of such slush upon horses, and, of course, there was a good deal of difference of opinion among the skilled witnesses. I am satisfied, however, that slush caused by a mixture of snow and salt does frequently injure horses which stand in, or are frequently driven through, the slush, even if there is no previous abrasion of the skin of the leg, and if a horse has a cut or abrasion of the skin of the leg, contact with briny slush is apt to convert what might otherwise be a trivial matter into a serious sore.

"The complainer's case is that the state of matters which I have

---

[1] Barber v. Penley, 1893, L. R., 2 Ch. Div. 447; Downie v. Wells, 39 W. R. 58.

No. 70.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

know that the Council were going to do so. It was said that if there was a nuisance the respondents only contributed to it, but if the complainer could prove negligence he was entitled to an interdict even against a contributory.[1] The balance of public convenience and possible loss to the respondents were irrelevant considerations.[2]

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In considering this action it must be kept in view that what was found fault with as being done contrary to law was all in the nature of emergency proceedings. The streets in towns sometimes unavoidably become more or less obstructed by falls of snow, and there cannot be the slightest doubt that it is one of the first duties of the public authority to take some measures as rapidly as possible to clear the way for traffic. If the obstruction is slight it can be cleared away quickly, but if the fall of snow be heavy, and the emergency is thus great, they must deal with the emergency as soon and as rapidly as they can.

---

described is a nuisance; that he is entitled to proceed directly against the author of the nuisance, especially as the Town-council, upon the matter being brought before them by the complainer, repudiated all responsibility for the respondents' actings; and that it is no answer on the part of the respondents to say that there would be no nuisance if the town authorities were more expeditious in removing the heaps of snow. . . .

"In the beginning of 1895 the complainer brought the matter before the Town-council, and requested that they would take proceedings against the respondents. . . . In reply the town-clerk wrote to the complainer's agents on the 8th February 1895 as follows:—'The operation complained of is, as you are aware, not carried out by the Town-council but by the tramway company, and, under these circumstances, I am instructed to inform you that the Town-council repudiate all responsibility with the matter.'

"After receipt of that letter the complainer brought the present note of suspension and interdict against the tramway company. After the note was presented the Town-council made a remit to the streets and roads committee to consider the matter, and the committee sent in a report, which was approved by the council, in which they expressed the opinion that, if the complainer was successful, serious inconvenience would be caused to the public, and recommended that 'such members of the Council as may be selected by the company should be authorised to give evidence on behalf of the council in favour of the respondents.'

"Accordingly the provost and other members of the Council appeared as witnesses, and gave evidence to the effect that they were now satisfied that it was in the public interest that the respondents should be allowed to clear their lines as they have been in the habit of doing, and that the council approved of the method adopted by the respondents.

"These being the circumstances under which the question arises, the first point to be considered is the respondents' plea of all parties not called. That plea, of course, is founded upon the fact that the Town-council are not made parties to the action.

"Now, the management of the streets is vested in the Town-council, and it is their duty to see that there is no obstruction placed in the streets, and

---

[1] Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, Dec. 21, 1866, 5 Macph. 214, 39 Scot. Jur. 152, 591.

[2] Montgomerie v. Buchanan's Trustees, July 7, 1853, 15 D. 853, 25 Scot. Jur. 499; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co., June 14, 1876, 3 R. 839; Inglis v. Shotts Iron Co., July 26, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 78.

No. 70.

Dec. 20, 1895. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

When the tramway company was established under Act of Parliament they got a right to use the streets in which their lines were laid without obstruction from any other traffic. This right was given to them on account of the necessity which they were under of keeping to a particular line. All other traffic must give way to the tramcar traffic so as not to obstruct it. The moment that a fall of snow of any depth took place the tramway system was brought to a standstill, and it was necessary that the line of rails should be cleared. It must be kept in mind that that place must be cleared at anyrate if no rails were there. It is the ordinary practice in cities to clear the centre of the roads by means of snowploughs, the necessary action of which is to pile the snow at the sides, and thus they keep the road open for traffic. If the tramway company, having the use of the road for their rails, proceed to open up the road in that way, they will be just doing for themselves and for the public what the public authority would be bound to do in ordinary course if there was no tramway there.

---

that substances dangerous or offensive to the public are not put upon the streets. Therefore, if the result of the action of the respondents was to cause obstruction to the traffic, or a nuisance to the lieges, it was the Town-council who had the title to interfere, and (as guardians of the public interests in the streets) the duty of interfering. If, then, in a case of obstruction or nuisance in a street, the Town-council, or other local authority in whom the streets are vested, do not take action, or refuse to take action, is any citizen entitled to apply for interdict against the alleged wrongdoer without calling the Town-council or other local authority? In the general case I do not think that an application for interdict at the instance of the individual against the wrongdoer would be sustained, unless the Local Authority was also called, because the footing upon which such a proceeding would be brought, and the justification for bringing it, would be that the Local Authority had neglected, or refused, to do their duty.

"These considerations are, I think, very applicable to the present case, because what the respondents have done is to clear a part of the streets of snow, with the acquiescence and approval of the Town-council, and witness after witness for the complainer admitted that there would be nothing to complain of in the operations of the respondents if the Town-council had with due expedition removed the snow and slush from the sides of the streets.

"The respondents, however, did not ask that the case should be thrown out on the ground that the Town-council were not called, and perhaps the fact that members of the Council appeared, with the authority of the Council, as witnesses, to explain the position which the Council take up, to some extent obviates the plea. I shall therefore express the opinion which I have formed upon the merits of the case.

"In considering the case upon the merits, however, it seems to me that the fact that the Town-council approve of the operations of the Tramway Company is an important element to be taken into consideration. As I have already pointed out, the duty lies upon the Town-council to see that the streets are not obstructed or improperly used, and as, by their approval, they have identified themselves with the practice of the respondents, I think that the question is whether that practice is one which the Town-council was justified in approving; in other words, whether the practice is one which would fall to be interdicted if the actual work of clearing the snow from the tramway lines and laying down salt had been done by the Town-Council and not by the respondents.

"Further, there are two preliminary considerations which must be kept in view. In the first place, it is to be remembered that the occasion of the

No 70.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

In this case the tramway company clear the snow to the side and keep the road open, which is the thing the public authority ought to do, and I do not see what possible ground there can be for interdict against that. When there was a deep fall of snow it was the duty of the public authority to keep the road clear, and to see that it did not become or remain impassable, and I am at a loss to see why the tramway company should be found fault with when what they have done is exactly the same process which the public authority would have to go through, viz., to open up a passage in the middle of the street. There is therefore no good ground for interdict on the first branch of this case.

As regards the second point a different question arose altogether. It relates to injury by the use of salt upon the streets. I think if we were to express our own opinion, and give judgment accordingly, I, for one, would have very little difficulty in expressing my opinion, and with some emphasis.

---

operations complained of is a partial interruption to the traffic by natural causes. . . .

"In the second place, I do not think that the respondents are to be regarded as in no other case, as regards this matter, than any private citizen. The respondents have been authorised to construct and work tramways in Aberdeen, by an Act of Parliament which proceeds upon the preamble that the constructing and working of tramways 'would be a great local and public advantage.' They are accordingly given power to 'lay down, work, use, and maintain' the tramways described in the Act, and undoubtedly they are thereby authorised to do many things in and to the streets which no private individual would be entitled to do. Among other things, they are empowered to work the tramways, which seems to me to involve the power of keeping the lines in such a condition that the tramways can be worked, and to remove obstructions from the lines which would prevent the working of the tramways. Of course I do not mean to say that the respondents are entitled to employ methods which amount to a nuisance to the public who are equally entitled to use the streets. I only desire to point out that I do not altogether agree with the complainer's contention that, as regards operations in the streets, the respondents are in no other or better position than a private ratepayer.

"Coming now to the actual operations complained of, I shall first deal with the clearing of the tramway lines by the snow-plough, and then with the use of salt. . . .

"It seems to me really to resolve into a question of the balance of public convenience—whether it is more convenient to have a long stretch of street with a clear roadway down the middle, and heaps of snow at the sides, or a short stretch of street entirely cleared, and the remainder not cleared at all. It is for the Town-council to decide in the first instance which of these courses is most in the public interest, and I think that this Court would be very slow to interfere with their discretion. I may say, however, that the view which I understand the Town-council to take appears to me to be not unreasonable, but the reverse. That view is that it is in the interest of the general traffic that a track along the centre of the streets should be cleared without delay, and that it is of importance to a large section of the community that tramway traffic should not be interrupted.

"So far, therefore, as the clearing of the tramway lines by the snow-plough is concerned, I am of opinion that the complainer has not made out a case for the interference of the Court.

"The question in regard to putting salt on the streets is attended with more difficulty. . . .

"I think that the question is one of the balance of convenience. It is

No. 70.

Dec. 20, 1895.
Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co.

My own impression is that nothing more cruel to man and beast can be done than to shower salt on the streets in winter, producing a freezing mixture, and that it causes serious risk to health and even life I have no doubt. But I am not entitled in such a matter to act on private opinion or private knowledge. What was done was under the sanction of the public authority, and if they are really and seriously of opinion that this is the only reasonable way of keeping the streets clear, I do not think this Court are the judges of whether they are right in the matter or not. At the time of a heavy fall of snow or of a heavy frost inconvenience and risk to the public must always necessarily be caused, and the public authority, the Town-council, are the proper judges in the matter, and have the responsibility imposed upon them of seeing that the streets are satisfactorily and properly kept open and clear. If the ratepayers are of opinion that the affairs of the city in that matter are mismanaged, so as to be injurious to their interests or their health, they have the remedy in their own hands.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary's judgment. I have only to add, that if the case had come before me in the first instance, looking to the terms on which the interdict was prayed for, I should have been disposed to deal with the plea that the action is irrelevant in a different way from that which was adopted.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

---

plain that, in the case of a storm of such severity and continuance as that of last year, there must necessarily be great inconvenience and serious impediment to the traffic, and it is for the Town-council to consider what method of clearing the streets will be most for the public advantage. Some of the complainer's witnesses went so far as to say that the method adopted is so bad that they would prefer that the streets should not be cleared at all. I doubt if that answer would have been given if these witnesses had had actual experience of such a storm without any clearing of the streets. I should think it very probable that, in the latter case, the injuries to horses through strains, tramps, and falls, would be much greater than these caused by the use of salt. It is unprofitable, however, to speculate upon such matters. There is a great deal to be said both for and against the method adopted, and I think that it is sufficient for the decision of this case that the Town-council have come to be of opinion—and I see no reason to doubt that the opinion has been formed honestly and after full consideration—that it is, upon the whole, in the public interests, that the respondents should be allowed to do a part of the work of clearing the streets by sending the snow-ploughs along the tramway lines, and melting the snow not removed by the ploughs by means of salt. And that that view is not an unreasonable one is, I think, shewn by the fact that the same practice is adopted in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dundee.

"I am therefore of opinion that the note falls to be refused."

ROBERT WALKER, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—D. Dundas—Craigie.
ARCHIBALD GALBRAITH, Defender (Respondent).—Ure—Cook.

No. 71.
Dec. 21, 1895.
Walker v. Galbraith.

Fee and Liferent—Husband and Wife—Assignation of lease—Destination to spouses in conjunct fee and to the survivor in fee.—A lease for ninety-nine years was assigned to spouses "in conjunct fee and to the survivor of them in fee." Held (rev. judgment of Lord Moncreiff) that the fee vested in the spouses jointly, with the benefit of survivorship.

Succession—Special Destination—General Settlement.—A long lease of heritage was assigned to D. D. and M. D., his wife, "in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee, and at the death of the survivor to the heirs of the said D. D. and M. D., equally between them."

The spouses subsequently executed a mutual settlement, by which they conveyed to the survivor of them in liferent for his or her liferent use only, and at the death of the survivor to two sons of the wife by a former marriage, their whole heritable and moveable estate.

At the date of the mutual settlement the spouses had no other property than the lease carried by the assignation.

Held that the destination in the assignation to the heirs of the spouses was evacuated by the mutual settlement.

Expenses—Process—Sale of heritage—Objection to title tendered.—Circumstances in which a purchaser of heritable subjects who objected to the title offered him was held entitled to expenses incurred in defending an action by the seller, in which the validity of the title tendered was established.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.

BY assignation, dated in 1877, Patrick Burns, in consideration of a sum of £189 paid him by Adam Wilson, assigned a 99 years' lease of certain heritable subjects in the parish of Kilwinning "to David Deans, miller and innkeeper in Stevenston, and Marion Sneddon or Deans, his wife, in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee, and at the death of the survivor, to the heirs of the said David Deans and Marion Sneddon or Deans, equally between them." The assignation was recorded in the Register of Sasines.

On 19th September 1882 David Deans and his wife executed a mutual disposition and settlement in the following terms:—"We, . . . with mutual advice and consent, give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of the survivor of us, in liferent for his or her liferent use only, and at the death of the survivor, to John Paton, miner, Stevenston, and William Paton, residing with us, both sons of me, the said Marion Sneddon or Deans, equally between them, all and sundry our whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wheresoever situated, also all debts, sums of money and effects now owing and belonging, or that shall be owing and belonging to the first deceaser, with the whole writings, vouchers, and securities, and the rents, interest, profits, and produce of the premises; and we nominate and appoint the survivor of us, and the saids John Paton and William Paton, and the survivors and survivor of them, to be our executors and executor; but these presents are granted and shall be accepted by the executors under the burden of payment of all our just and lawful debts; reserving always to us while both survive full power to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part, as we may see proper. . . ."

David Deans died on 12th December 1890, predeceased by his wife.

After the death of David Deans John and William Paton completed a title to the lease by notarial instrument, which was duly

No. 71.

Dec. 21, 1895. Walker v. Galbraith.

recorded, and assigned the lease to Colin Mackenzie, who again assigned it to Robert Walker, both assignations being recorded.

By missives of sale dated in 1894 Robert Walker agreed to assign the lease, with the goodwill, furniture, fitting, and utensils of the premises built upon the subjects leased, to Archibald Galbraith. The latter took possession of the subjects, and consigned the price in the joint names of himself and Walker, but declined to accept an assignation to the lease which was offered him by Walker, unless the respective heirs-at-law of Mr and Mrs Deans validly completed their title, and gave their express consent to such assignation. His objection to the title offered him was founded upon the grounds (1) that the mutual disposition and settlement by Mr and Mrs Deans only conveyed to John and William Paton the estate which belonged to the first deceaser of the spouses, namely, Mrs Deans, and that as her husband was, under the special destination contained in the assignation of the lease by Patrick Burns, sole fiar during their joint lives, the Patons could take no right to the lease under the mutual settlement, in respect it carried none; and (2) that the special destination contained in the assignation was not evacuated by the general conveyance in the mutual settlement.

Walker thereupon brought an action against Galbraith, concluding for declarator that he had a good title to the lease, and an undoubted right to assign it, and for decree ordaining the defender to implement his part of the missives of sale by accepting the assignation offered him, and paying the price.

The pursuer averred that the lease was the only property in which Mr and Mrs Deans had an interest at the date of the mutual settlement or at their deaths.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer is not at present in titulo to grant to the defender a valid assignation of the tack in question.

On 17th July 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) sustained the second plea in law for the defender, and assoilzied him from the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.—The subject in dispute in this case is, whether the pursuer of the action has tendered to the defender a good and valid title to a lease for ninety-nine years, which the defender had agreed to purchase. I am of opinion that the title which the pursuer offers the defender is not one which the latter is bound to accept. Under the assignation granted by Patrick Burns in 1877, he assigned the lease to David Deans and Marion Sneddon or Deans, his wife, in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee, and at the death of the survivor to the heirs of the said David Deans and Marion Sneddon or Deans, equally between them. In 1882 Mr and Mrs Deans executed a mutual trust-disposition and settlement, and they conveyed 'to and in favour of the survivor of us, in liferent for his or her liferent use only, and at the death of the survivor to John Paton, miner, Stevenston, and William Paton, residing with us, both sons of me, the said Marion Sneddon or Deans, equally between them, all and sundry our whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wheresoever situated, also all debts, sums of money and effects now owing and belonging, or that shall be owing and belonging to the first deceaser,' and so forth. The survivor was appointed executor of the predecessor, and then followed,—'reserving always to us while both survive full power to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part, as we may see proper.'

"The first objection taken is that in the event, which happened, of Mrs Deans predeceasing her husband, no interest in the lease was carried to the survivor; because Mrs Deans had no interest in the lease, and David Deans

No. 71.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Walker v. Galbraith.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The destination in the assignation to the spouses "in conjunct fee," was not the same as a destination "in conjunct fee and liferent," and its effect was that the spouses took a joint right of fee, and that on the death of one the fee of the whole passed to the survivor. The destination in favour of the survivor indicated that the husband was not intended to be sole fiar, and the old doctrine founded on by the defender was therefore not applicable. The spouses when they granted the mutual trust-disposition had accordingly a joint right in the lease, and the mutual settlement was clearly intended to carry the whole estate of both at the death of the survivor. (2) The assignation was not to be regarded as the deed of the spouses, but as the deed of a stranger, and therefore the doctrine that a special destination was not evacuated by a general settlement did not apply. Further, the destination in the assignation to the heirs of the spouses, equally between them, was not a special destination in the sense of the doctrine founded on by the defender, the assignees not being definitely pointed out, and was therefore evacuated by the general settlement.[1] According to the pursuer's averment the spouses had no other property at the date of the mutual settlement except the lease, and therefore they must have intended to deal with it in their settlement.[2] The objections to the title offered by the pursuer were therefore unfounded.

himself had the fee in terms of the assignation. Mr Cook maintained that the mutual disposition and settlement only dealt with the interest of the predeceaser. I am inclined to think that looking at the peculiar way in which the deed is framed and worded, that is the construction which must be put upon it. Whatever may have been intended, it practically comes to this, that each of the spouses, in the event of his or her being the predeceaser, conveyed his or her whole estate to the survivor in liferent, and the Patons in fee. If that is the true construction of the deed, then the deed carried nothing, because Mrs Deans predeceased, and in terms of the assignation, David Deans was still fiar; or, at least, if he was not fiar, he, on the death of his wife, became entitled, not under the mutual deed, but under the assignation, to the subjects in fee, being the survivor.

"Now, if that is sound, then the title offered by the pursuer is not sufficient, because the title offered is on the footing that right to this lease vested in the Patons under the settlement on the death of David Deans, who had not revoked it. The pursuer's title is deduced through the Patons from him. In order to make a good title there must be an assignation executed by the heirs at law of David Deans and Mrs Deans.

"There is a further question, and on that also I am inclined to agree with Mr Cook. He maintained that there was a special destination in the assignation, and I am inclined to think that that is so. It is a special destination—half to the heirs of David Deans and half to the heirs of his wife. The general law is that a special destination is not evacuated by a general disposition and settlement executed by the same person who took the deed with the special destination in it. Therefore the special designation in the assignation was not evacuated by the mutual deed of 1882. It is a question of intention, but that is the general rule. It is said in the present case by the pursuer that the only property which these spouses had was this lease. That, of course, is a material fact, and worthy of consideration, but it is not conclusive, and I do not think it is sufficient to overcome the general rule. But undoubtedly there is more difficulty upon this point than upon the former. The result is that I sustain the second plea in law for the defender, and assoilzie him."

[1] Philip v. Philip, Dec. 11, 1885, 13 R. 329.

[2] Gray v. Gray's Trustees, May 24, 1878, 5 R. 820.

No. 71.

Dec. 21, 1895. Walker v. Galbraith.

Argued for the defender;—The title offered was not such as the defender was bound to accept. (1) According to the ordinary rule under a destination to spouses "in conjunct fee" the husband as the dignior persona became sole fiar.[1] Even when there was a further destination in favour of the survivor, the wife took no right of fee unless and until she survived.[2] There was nothing in the present case to suggest that the consideration for the assignation was paid by the wife, or to take the case out of the ordinary rule. When the mutual settlement was granted the wife had accordingly no interest in the lease, and as that deed dealt only with the estate of the predeceaser, who was the wife, no interest in the lease passed under it to the Patons. (2) The assignation contained a special destination to the survivor and the heirs of the spouses, and that destination must be held to have been inserted at the wish of the assignees.[3] The usual rule, therefore, applied that a special destination was not evacuated by a general disposition.[4] There was no indication of an intention to deal with the lease in the mutual settlement unless it were assumed that, as averred by the pursuer, the spouses had no other property at the date of that settlement. But, even if that averment were assumed to be true, it was not conclusive, for the settlement dealt with acquirenda. The case of Gray[5] was very special, and the fact that in that case, apart from the property conveyed under the special destination, the general settlement had nothing to operate upon, was only one of many considerations which led the Court to hold that the general settlement was intended to carry that property.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of opinion that the title offered in this case is sufficient. The foundation of the title is an assignation to the subject (a 99 years' lease) in favour of David Deans and his spouse in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee. The Lord Ordinary construes this destination as if it were equivalent to a destination to the spouses in conjunct fee and liferent, in which case the ordinary rule of construction is that the wife is liferenter, and the husband fiar.

But I know of no authority for giving to the words "conjunct fee," in a destination to spouses, a different construction from the construction which would be put on them in a destination to persons not connected by marriage, and no authority was cited to us in support of the Lord Ordinary's opinion on this point.

In my opinion the assignation gave equal rights to the husband and wife, the subject being vested in them jointly, with benefit of survivorship.

In this view of the meaning of the assignation, the question raised as to the mutual settlement granted by the spouses in 1882 disappears. They

---

[1] Anderson v. Bruce, 1680, M. 4232; Erskine, iii. 8, 36.

[2] Ferguson v. M'George, 1739, M. 4202.

[3] Farquharson v. Farquharson, July 19, 1883, 10 R. 1253, per Lord Justice-Clerk, 1257.

[4] Thoms v. Thoms, March 3, 1868, 6 Macph. 704, 40 Scot. Jur. 364, per Lords Benholme and Neaves, 6 Macph. 724; Glendonwyn v. Gordon, May 19, 1873, 11 Macph. (H. L.) 33, 45 Scot. Jur. 183; Campbell v. Campbell, Feb. 17, 1743, 1 Pat. 343; Walker's Executor v. Walker, June 19, 1878, 5 R. 965.

[5] Gray v. Gray's Trustees, May 24, 1878, 5 R. 820.

No. 71.
Dec. 21, 1895.
Walker v. Galbraith.

were then dealing with a subject of which they were the joint owners, unfettered by any limitations other than a destination over to their heirs, which it was in their power to evacuate by making a new destination. In such circumstances, they by a deed in proper form limited the right of the survivor to a liferent, and vested the fee subject to that life interest (and subject of course to the usual liferent by reservation during their joint lives) in John and William Paton, the sons of Mrs Deans by a previous marriage. It is not disputed that the title offered flows from the Patons.

The Lord Ordinary notices another objection which he is disposed to sustain, but without, as I understand, expressing an unqualified opinion upon it.

The objection is that the mutual settlement is a general conveyance, and that a destination inserted in a conveyance, presumably by desire of the grantee, is not necessarily revoked or evacuated by a subsequent general settlement.

This is substantially the same question as the question of the revocation of a specific bequest by a subsequent general settlement. It is, as the Lord Ordinary has observed, a question of intention, and there are two reasons which, in my opinion, lead to the conclusion that it was the intention of the spouses to evacuate the destination. The first is that it does not appear that the spouses had any other joint estate on which the mutual settlement could take effect. The second is that the destination of the joint estate contained in the previous deed was a destination to the heirs of the spouses equally between them. This is not a special destination in the sense of the rule referred to. No claim to the estate has been made by the heirs of David Deans, and I think that the pursuer has a good title, and is entitled to decree of declarator in terms of his first conclusion.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

The defender moved for expenses on the ground that, although he had been unsuccessful, he had acted within his rights in refusing to take the title until it had been determined by the Court to be valid.

The pursuer argued that each case of the kind fell to be decided upon its merits, and that in the circumstances of this case the defender was not entitled to expenses.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found the defender entitled to expenses both in the Inner and Outer-House.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 72.
Dec. 21, 1895.
Neville v. Shepherd.

MARY BALLINGALL NEVILLE AND OTHERS, First Parties.—Balfour—Cook.
JESSIE SHEPHERD, Second Party.—Johnston—Wilton.
ARTHUR STEWART MUIR AND OTHERS (Gloag's Trustees), Third Parties.—Balfour—Cook.

Succession—Vesting—Declaration as to term of vesting—Destination to survivors—Conditional institution of issue of predeceasers—Conditio si sine liberis.—A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of the residue of his estate to his daughter and her husband, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the survivor, to divide and pay

No. 72.

Dec. 21, 1895. Neville v. Shepherd.

the whole residue, equally, share and share alike, among their children, and the survivors and survivor of them, declaring that payment should not be made to any grandchild till the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after reaching majority. "Further, in the event of its happening that all of my said grandchildren predeceased the terms of payment of their respective provisions, without leaving lawful issue, and all of which provisions it is hereby declared shall vest at the said terms of payment so fixed by me, then and in that case, but in that case only, I direct my trustees . . . to divide, pay, and make over my estate, hereinbefore settled on my said grandchildren, equally, share and share alike," among certain nephews and nieces.

The testator was survived by his daughter and her husband. The latter outlived his wife, and died on 21st March 1895, predeceased by four children who had survived their grandfather, the testator, and survived by two children, of whom one, Mrs N., died on 17th April 1895, leaving issue.

Held (1) that no share of the residue vested in Mrs N., in respect that she predeceased the term of Whitsunday 1895, which was the term of payment; and (2) that her issue were entitled, in virtue of an implied conditional institution in the trust-settlement, to succeed to the half of the residue which would have fallen to their mother, had she survived the term of payment.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that, if the claim of Mrs N.'s children had depended on the conditio si sine liberis, they could only have been entitled to the sixth share originally destined to their mother.

Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862 (H. L.), 4 Macq. 337, commented on.

1ST DIVISION. By trust-disposition and settlement, dated 25th December 1865, Dr James Gloag conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. In the seventh place he directed his trustees, on the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, to hold the residue of his estate and apply the interest and proceeds for the liferent use of his daughter, Mrs Shepherd, and in the event of her death, to pay the said liferent to her husband during his life. "(Eighth) My trustees are hereby directed and appointed, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen after the death of the longest liver of the said Mrs Janet Black Gloag or Shepherd and John Shepherd, and the termination of their said liferent, . . . to divide, pay, and make over the whole residue and remainder of my said whole estates above disponed and conveyed, or the proceeds thereof, including any income accruing thereon between the expiry of the liferent thereof hereinbefore settled on my said daughter and her husband, and the said term of payment, equally, share and share alike, among the whole children already born or to be born of the marriage between the said John Shepherd and Mrs Janet Black Gloag or Shepherd, or last survivor of said children (under the declaration after mentioned): But declaring that in case any of my said grandchildren, being sons, shall not have attained majority, or being daughters, shall not have attained majority or been married, at the period when the said residue of my estates is to be divided as aforesaid, I hereby appoint that the payment of the shares falling to such child or children shall be superseded till the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after,—in the case of grandsons, till they respectively attain majority, or in the case of granddaughters, till they respectively attain majority, or be married, whichever of these events shall first happen, and the annual proceeds of such share or shares, or such parts thereof as may be deemed necessary by my trustees, shall be laid out for their clothing, education, and maintenance, and the balance accumulated for their behoof: And further, in the event of any of my said grandchildren predeceasing me leaving

No. 72.

Dec. 21, 1895. Neville v. Shepherd.

a lawful child or lawful children, I hereby appoint and declare that such child or children shall succeed equally to the share of my said estates which would have fallen to his or her deceased parent under these presents, if he or she had been alive."

Power was then given to the trustees, with consent of Mr and Mrs Shepherd, before the term of payment of any of the provisions to grandchildren, to advance, in whole or part, to or for behoof of any of such grandchildren, "the provisions which such grandchildren, or any of them, may be entitled to under these presents"; and power was also given to the trustees to postpone payment of the grandchildren's provisions till they attained the age of twenty-five. The settlement continued:—"Further, in the event of its happening that all of my said grandchildren predeceased the terms of payment of their respective provisions without leaving lawful issue, and all of which provisions it is hereby declared shall vest at the said terms of payment so fixed by me, then, and in that case, but in that case only, I direct my trustees (after expiry always of the liferents hereinbefore provided) to divide, pay, and make over my estate hereinbefore settled on my said grandchildren equally, share and share alike, among the child or children of my eldest sister Mrs Margaret Gloag or Millburn, now deceased, . . . and the child or children of my late brother John Gloag, . . . and the survivors and survivor of the children of my said sister and brother: Declaring that, in the event of any of my said nephews and nieces predeceasing the period at which they would have become entitled to participate in my said estate (and which shall not become a vested interest till the period of payment arrives), leaving a lawful child or lawful children, then, and in that case, such child or children shall be entitled, equally among them, per stirpes, to the share which would have fallen to their deceasing parent or parents."

Dr Gloag died in 1870, predeceased by his wife. He was survived by his daughter, Mrs Shepherd, and her husband. Mr Shepherd survived his wife, and received the liferent until his death, on 21st March 1895.

There were seven children born of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Shepherd, of whom one was deceased at the date of Dr Gloag's settlement. Only two of the children survived their father Mr Shepherd, viz., Mrs Neville, who died on 17th April 1895, leaving four children, and Jessie Shepherd, who had attained majority prior to her father's death.

Questions having arisen as to the division of the residue of Dr Gloag's estate, a special case, to which the four children of Mrs Neville were first parties, Miss Jessie Shepherd second party, and Dr Gloag's trustees third parties, was presented in order to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the following questions of law:—"(1) Did Mrs Elizabeth Muir Shepherd or Neville acquire a vested right to one-half of the residue of the estate of the said Dr James Gloag? (2) In the event of the preceding question being answered in the negative, are the parties hereto of the first part, the children of the said Mrs Elizabeth Muir Shepherd or Neville, entitled to one-half share of the said residue? or (3) Are they only entitled to one-sixth thereof?"

The first parties, Mrs Neville's children, contended that Mrs Neville having survived her father acquired a vested interest in one-half of the residue of the estate of Dr Gloag, the other half being payable to her sister Jessie Shepherd; or otherwise, if it should be held that Mrs Neville took no vested interest in the residue, that the first

No. 72.
Dec. 21, 1895.
Neville v. Shepherd.

parties, her children, were entitled, in virtue either of an implied substitution to their mother or of the conditio si sine liberis, to one-half of said residue.

The second party maintained that Mrs Neville having predeceased the term of payment did not acquire a vested interest in the residue of the estate, and that her children, the first parties, could only succeed in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis, to her original share, being one-sixth of the residue, and that the second party was entitled, by survivance, to the balance.

Argued for the first parties, Mrs Neville's children;—(1) One-half of the residue vested in Mrs Neville, either at the testator's death or at the death of the longest liver of the liferenters. The words "predeceasing me" in the clause declaring that the issue of predeceasers should take their parent's share favoured the conclusion that vesting was a morte. At all events vesting took place at the death of the last liferenter, for the postponement of payment to the first term thereafter was evidently for purposes of administration only. (2) Assuming that Mrs Neville took no vested right, her children were nevertheless entitled to take half the residue either in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis, which operated as at the death of the parent, so as to give the issue shares which had fallen in prior to the death of the parent, or in virtue of an implied conditional institution in the deed. A conditional institution of issue was clearly implied in the clause which dealt with the event of all the grandchildren predeceasing the terms of payment "without leaving lawful issue," and this conclusion was supported by a reference to the clauses of the deed, which declared that the issue of grandchildren predeceasing the testator, and the issue of his nephews and nieces predeceasing the terms of payment, should take the share which would have fallen to their parent. Under the terms of this conditional institution the issue were entitled not merely to their parent's original share but also to the accrescing shares which he or she would have taken by survivance.[1] In the cases of M'Nish and Young v. Robertson[2] the testator had begun by expressly giving over the share of legatees predeceasing without issue to the survivors, and so accrescing shares were necessarily excluded from the subsequent conditional institution of the issue of legatees who predeceased leaving issue. In M'Nish the destination was also to children nominatim, but here it was to the class, which was an important distinction.[3] In Henderson[4] the declaration was that the shares of children predeceasing the testator without issue should be divided among their "brothers and sisters," an expression which could not be held to include the issue of predeceased brothers and sisters.

Argued for the second party, Miss Shepherd;—(1) There was no vesting, according to the express terms of the will, until the terms of payment, and this declaration was in harmony with the other provisions of the will, except the clause in which the testator declared that the issue of grandchildren "predeceasing me" should take their

[1] M'Culloch's Trustees, May 14, 1892, 19 R. 777, esp. per Lord M'Laren, p. 779; Aitken's Trustees v. Wright, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 275, per Lord Kinloch, 280, 44 Scot. Jur. 164.

[2] M'Nish v. Donald's Trustees, Oct. 25, 1879, 7 R. 96; Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 337, 34 Scot. Jur. 270.

[3] Aitken's Trustees, ut supra.

[4] Henderson v. Henderson, Jan. 9, 1890, 17 R. 294.

No. 72.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Neville v. Shepherd.

parent's share. The slight difficulty raised by that clause, standing as it did by itself, could not render the express declaration of the testator's intention inoperative. (2) The equity of the conditio si sine liberis was never extended so as to give to the issue of a predeceasing child more than the original share destined to their parent. It was also established by a long series of decisions that the conditional institution of issue to their parent's share, when there was a destination to survivors, did not give the issue a right to more than their parent's original share.[1] In M'Culloch's[2] case the words of the codicil clearly gave to the issue the share, original and accrescing, which their parent would have taken, but there was no such conclusion to be drawn from the words of the settlement now under consideration.

LORD ADAM.—The questions in this special case relate to the construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Dr Gloag, and in particular of the 8th purpose of that settlement. It is only necessary to mention that Dr Gloag died upon 23d January 1870. He had only one child, who subsequently became Mrs Shepherd, and who died on the 10th July 1873. She was survived by her husband, who died on the 21st March 1895. They had several children, of whom the only one now alive is Miss Shepherd, the second party in this case. Another daughter, Mrs Neville, survived her father, but did not survive the first term of Whitsunday after her father's death, having died on 17th April 1895. Dr Gloag left the liferent of the residue of his estate to the longest liver of Mr and Mrs Shepherd, and after that he directed the fee of the residue to be divided as specified in the 8th purpose, and that, it seems to me, is the only one which requires immediate attention. The first question put to us is this,—Did Mrs Neville acquire a vested right to one-half of the residue of Dr Gloag's estate? Now the 8th purpose deals with the residue thus:—He directs the trustees at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen after the death of the longest liver of Mrs Shepherd and John Shepherd, on the termination of their said liferent, "to divide, pay, and make over the whole residue and remainder of my said whole estates, or the proceeds thereof, including any income accruing thereon between the expiry of the liferent . . . and the said term of payment, equally, share and share alike, among the whole children already born, or to be born, between Mr and Mrs Shepherd, and to the survivors or last survivor of said children." Then there is a declaration postponing payment if any of the grandchildren should be under twenty-one. Now had the directions of the truster stopped there, very possibly we should have thought it was a case of vesting a morte testatoris with postponed payment; but there is a clause later on which in my opinion settles the matter. "In the event of its happening that all of my said grandchildren predeceased the terms of payment of their respective provisions, without leaving lawful issue, and all of which provisions it is

[1] Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 337, 34 Scot. Jur. 270; M'Nish v. Donald's Trustees, Oct. 25, 1879, 7 R. 96; Henderson v. Henderson, Jan. 9, 1890, 17 R. 294; Aitken's Trustees v. Wright, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 275, 44 Scot. Jur. 164; The Earl of Lauderdale, &c., May 19, 1830, 8 S. 771; Clelland v. Gray, June 20, 1839, 1 D. 1031, 11 Scot. Jur. 533; Thornhill v. Macpherson, Jan. 20, 1841, 3 D. 394.

[2] M'Culloch's Trustees, May 14, 1892, 19 R. 777.

No. 72.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Neville v. Shepherd.

hereby declared shall vest at the said terms of payment so fixed by me, then," &c. That is a declaration that all the provisions to the grandchildren are to vest at the term of payment and not at an earlier date. What then is the term of payment? It is very clearly the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring after the death of the survivor of Mr and Mrs Shepherd. It appears to me that there can be no vesting of the share in any of the grandchildren before the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas of the year in which Mr Shepherd died. Mrs Neville predeceased the term of payment; therefore she predeceased the term of vesting; and I think there is no doubt that we must answer the first question in the negative.

Then comes the second question:—Are the children of Mrs Neville entitled to one-half or to one-sixth share of the residue? That depends upon the construction of the same clause, and perhaps is not so clear. As I have pointed out, the truster directed his trustees to divide, pay, and make over the residue, or the proceeds thereof, among the whole children already born, or to be born, and to the survivor. There is certainly no substitution of the issue of these children there, but there are other clauses dealing with the issue of the grandchildren of the truster, and the first of these is this:—"And further, in the event of any of my said grandchildren predeceasing me leaving a lawful child or lawful children, I hereby appoint and declare that such child or children shall succeed equally to the share of my said estates which would have fallen to his or her deceased parent under these presents if he or she had been alive." Now, I do not think there is any ambiguity about this clause requiring construction. It provides for the case only of grandchildren predeceasing the truster himself. But it is to be observed that it contains no provision for the case of grandchildren who survived the truster but predeceased the term of vesting. They are not provided for in this clause. We may conjecture that perhaps the words "predeceasing me" are a slip or mistake for the words "predeceasing the term of payment," but I think the words are clear. Therefore if it depended upon this clause only it would be difficult to see that there was any substitution of the issue of grandchildren generally to their parents. But before leaving that clause I may say that I think the clause itself would be sufficient to exclude the presumption that children are substituted to their parents by the application of the doctrine of si sine liberis, because Dr Gloag is here dealing with the issue of grandchildren—with those in a particular position—and was therefore applying his mind to the very parties to whom the conditio would otherwise apply. But there is a general clause which deals with the whole matter; that namely, which I have already referred to, "Further, in the event," &c. Now, it appears to me to be quite clear that if any issue of the grandchildren were alive at the date of vesting that destination over to the truster's nephews and nieces could not take effect, because it was only upon the failure of issue of grandchildren that the destination was to take effect. And for what reason? Simply because if there were any issue of grandchildren surviving the term of vesting they were to come in place of their parents. Therefore, it appears to me that we have here an implied substitution, or rather conditional institution, of the issue of grandchildren predeceasing, and predeceasing the term of payment. I think that clause is sufficient for

No. 72.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Neville v. Shepherd.

the determination of this case, and therefore I think we should answer the second question in the affirmative, to the effect that the children of Mrs Neville are entitled to take one-half of the estate.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Adam on both points. I do not say anything on the question of vesting, but on the question of the extent of the shares taken by children as representing their parents in a destination, I desire to state my views, because of its general importance.

The second question as originally put invited us to answer what share might be taken by a child or issue claiming under the conditio si sine liberis; and if the question had remained unaltered I think that only one answer could be given, because it is settled as matter of legal implication, as distinguished from construction, that a child under the conditio never takes more than what is described as the parent's original share, that is, the share which the parent would take supposing everyone in the destination to survive the period of payment. But that principle or implication does not go very far to solve a case like the present. The reason is this, that the right of children under the conditio is an equitable extension of the will, and cannot reasonably be extended beyond this, that what the truster thought a reasonable provision for one to whom he was in loco parentis shall pass to that person's children. The extent of what is considered a reasonable provision is fixed by the provision which the parent has actually made on the assumption that all his children survive.

When, on the contrary, the substitution is contained in a will or deed, the language used in the deed determines the extent of the right of the substituted legatee. In Young v. Robertson [1] the scheme of the destination was that the testator made a division amongst a family of grandchildren, and then he proceeded to deal first with the case of a member of the family who might die without leaving issue, and then with the case of a member who should die leaving issue. In the first case he gave that person's share to the survivors exclusively, therefore excluding the issue of any other member of the family from participation. But in well-drawn destinations of this kind it is provided that on the death of a child leaving issue the issue shall take the same share which the parent would take if he survived, or, as it is sometimes put, the parent's share whether original or by accretion; or, again, the principle is sometimes carried out by dealing with the case of a person who shall die childless, and stating that his share shall go to the remaining members of the family, and the issue of those who have predeceased.

Now, if we are to consider what words are to be inserted in this deed by implication, it seems to me that we ought to give the issue of this family of grandchildren the right which we may assume to have been in the testator's mind. In the passage relating to the event of the death of all the members of this family without leaving issue and bringing in the destination over to collaterals, the testator plainly contemplates that if any members of the family die before distribution of the residue their issue are to come in their place, and I agree that the true implication is that issue are to succeed to whatever the parent would have taken had he survived. That construction receives support from the passage in which the testator ineffectually

[1] 4 Macq. 337, 34 Scot. Jur. 270.

No. 72.

Dec. 21, 1895. Neville v. Shepherd.

attempted to provide for the event of children dying without issue. That clause is not strictly applicable to the event which has happened. Nevertheless we get some insight as to what the intention was when we find the testator saying that "such child or children shall succeed equally to the share of my said estates which would have fallen to his or her deceased parent if he or she had been alive." It appears to me that we cannot be wrong in holding that the testator meant to give the same right in the event for which he only provides by implication as he has expressly given in the event of any of his grandchildren predeceasing himself.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree for the reasons given by Lord Adam. I also agree that the question which we should have to consider as to the share which the grandchildren of Mrs Shepherd are to take would have been entirely different if their interest had depended on the conditio si sine liberis. I do not consider what the share would have been in that case. But in the case as it stands we are relieved of the question which might have arisen had it been presented upon the conditio.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative.

MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—ARTHUR S. MUIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895. Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

JAMES GRAHAME (Real Raiser) AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.
THE LORD PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF GLASGOW AND OTHER ROAD AUTHORITIES, Claimants (Reclaimers).—R. V. Campbell—John Wilson.
THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Murray—W. C. Smith.
JOHN ALSTON DYKES (Mackenzie's Trustee) AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents).—J. E. Graham.
THE DUKE OF ARGYLL AND OTHERS (Rossmore's Trustees), Claimants (Respondents).—Macfarlane.

Road—Road Debt—Sale of Road Debt—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51)—Transfer of Assets and Liabilities to New Road Authorities—Funds held for special purposes.—The Glasgow and Carlisle Road was constructed, under the authority of Parliament, out of funds one half of which was advanced by Exchequer and the other half subscribed by private persons, who became creditors of the Road Trust to the extent of their respective subscriptions, and entitled to interest thereon. In 1846 the Caledonian Railway Company entered into an agreement to purchase the debts due to the private creditors. The agreement provided that, in the event of the Government then or at any future time abandoning its claims to any part of the surplus revenue accumulated in the hands of the Road Trustees, the sums so abandoned should be divided equally between the private creditors and the railway company. The claims of the Government were about the same date settled finally, except with regard to a sum of £600, which was reserved by the Road Trustees to meet a particular debt, but was not required for this purpose. The Government subsequently abandoned its claim to this sum. The agreement with the railway company was carried into effect in 1852, and, inter alia, a fund of surplus revenue was equally divided between the railway company and the private creditors, some of whom, however, did not come forward to claim their shares. In June 1883 the management of the road was transferred by the operation of the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878 to the new road authorities created by the Act, and an action of multiplepoinding was subsequently brought by the treasurer of the former Road Trust to determine the right to the following special funds:—(1) A fund consisting of the shares of surplus revenue allotted to individual private creditors, but unclaimed; (2) a fund, consisting in part of unclaimed dividends or interest allotted to individual creditors prior to 1852, and in part of a sum carried to the general dividend or interest account, but not allotted to individual creditors; and (3) a fund representing one half of the £600 abandoned by Government, the other half having been paid to the railway company.

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

Claims were lodged by (1) the new road authorities, (2) certain of the private creditors, and (3) the Caledonian Railway Company.

Held (1) that the three funds set apart for special purposes, and held by the Road Trustees at the passing of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, formed no part of the assets of the Road Trust, and that the claims of the private creditors thereto did not require to be valued and allocated among the new road authorities under sec. 90 of said Act; (2) (aff. judgment of Lord Moncreiff) that the compearing private creditors were entitled to the shares of the first and second funds which had been allotted to them, but which they had previously failed to claim, and also to shares, of the unallotted part of the second fund and of the third fund, in the proportion which their original subscriptions bore to the total contributions of the private creditors; and (3) (rev. judgment of Lord Moncreiff) that the balance of the three funds fell to be paid to the new road authorities, to be held by them subject to the claims of any other private creditors who might afterwards come forward to claim.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.

THE GLASGOW AND CARLISLE ROAD was made under the provisions of various Acts of Parliament, the funds being provided, one half by advances from Exchequer and the other half by subscriptions from private individuals, who became creditors of the Road Trust to the extent of their subscriptions. The maintenance of the road was vested in a body of trustees known as the Glasgow and Carlisle Turnpike Road Trust, and it was provided by the Act 59 Geo. III. cap. xc., that any surplus arising from the tolls of the road, after payment of the expenses of maintenance and the interest on the debts of the private creditors and the Exchequer, should be deposited in bank as a sinking fund for the extinction of the debt.

In June 1883, under the provisions of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, the management of the road was taken over by the Road Trustees of the counties and the Local Authorities of the burghs in which it was situated.

At that date there were certain bank accounts in the name either of the treasurer, or of the clerk and treasurer, of the Glasgow and Carlisle Turnpike Road Trust, representing funds held for special purposes; and in 1893 James Grahame, late treasurer of the trust, brought an action of multiplepoinding, in name of himself and William H. Hill, late clerk of the trust, for determining the right to the following funds:—(1) A sum of £232 lodged on deposit-receipt with the Union Bank of Scotland on 4th December 1883 in favour of "The Creditors of the Glasgow and Carlisle Roads, per James Grahame, Esq., treasurer"; (2) a sum of £4165, 10s. 3d. lodged on deposit-receipt with the same bank, on the same date, in favour of "The Glasgow and Carlisle Roads Dividend Account, per James Grahame, treasurer"; and (3) a sum of £740, 17s. 8d. lodged on deposit-receipt with the National Bank of Scotland on 15th June 1893 in favour of "William Henry Hill and James Grahame (Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trust)."

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The circumstances giving rise to the action were as follows:—In 1846 an agreement was concluded between the Caledonian Railway Company of the first part, and the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow and others, acting on behalf of the private creditors and trustees of the Glasgow and Carlisle Road on the second part, whereby it was agreed that the railway company should purchase the debts due to the private creditors, amounting to £23,803, at the price of £15,000, and should have right to rank as creditors on the tolls of the road in the same manner as the private creditors were then entitled to do. By the fifth article of the agreement the second parties bound themselves to concur with the railway company in endeavouring to induce Government to abandon their claim to the accumulated surplus revenue funds, it being understood that the private creditors should participate equally with the railway company in any benefit that might be derived from the Government abandoning in any way its claim against the Trust. A settlement was about the same time made with the Government by payment to it of a certain sum.

The agreed-on price was not paid by the railway company until Whitsunday 1852, at which date the company took over the debts due to the private creditors.

There remained in the hands of the treasurer of the Road Trust three funds held by him for special purposes, viz.:—(1) A sum of £131, 6s. 11d., being the amount allotted to but unclaimed by sixty-three of the private creditors of their shares of surplus revenue for the three years ending 30th June 1848, the surplus revenue for that period having been divided between the railway company and the private creditors. In 1883 this sum, with interest, amounted to £232, 16s. 3d., being the sum first mentioned in the summons. (2) A sum of £1651, 13s. 9d., which consisted of (a) £1573, 16s. 3d., the amount allotted to but unclaimed by eighty-seven private creditors of dividends declared upon the road debt between the commencement of the trust and Whitsunday 1852; and (b) £77, 17s. 6d., being the difference between the sums carried to the general dividend account of the trust, and the sums carried in name of dividend to the accounts of the individual creditors between 1842 and Whitsunday 1852; these two sums, with interest, amounted in 1883 to £4165, 10s. 3d., being the sum second mentioned in the summons. (3) A sum of £600, which had been reserved out of a sum payable to Government from the Scottish section of the road in settlement of the advances from Exchequer under an agreement made in 1846. The sum was reserved to meet certain old claims against the road in Dumfriesshire, but was not used for this purpose. In 1887 the Treasury abandoned their claim to it. One-half of the sum was subsequently paid to the Caledonian Railway Company under article 5 of the agreement of 1846, and the remainder, with interest, amounted in 1893 to £740, 17s. 8d., being the sum third described in the summons.

In 1890 Commissioners were appointed in terms of section 90 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,* (as read with the Secre-

* Section 90 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, provides that "Where any trust existing at the commencement of this Act comprises a road . . . which is situated partly in Scotland and partly in England, the following provisions shall have effect":—(1) Any party interested may "apply to the Secretary of State to determine the manner in which such road . . . shall be managed, maintained, repaired, . . . and also the manner in which the debts affecting such trust and the protary for Scotland Acts, 1885 to 1889) to inquire as to the manner in which the debts affecting the Road Trust and the property and assets of the Trust should be valued and allocated among the various counties and burghs in Scotland, and the road authority in England.

In the proceedings before the Commissioners (which are referred to in the opinion of Lord Kinnear) the funds were claimed by the Road Trustees of the counties and burghs within which the road was situated, as payable to themselves under section 108 of the Act,* and by the Caledonian Railway Company.

Upon a consideration of the report of the Commissioners the Home Secretary and the Secretary for Scotland found that the value of the debt due to the Caledonian Railway Company was £5845, and they allocated this debt among the burghs and counties in which the road was situated. They further found that the railway company were entitled to one half of the £600 to which the Treasury had abandoned its claim in 1887, with the accrued interest, and that the other half of that sum, and the two sums first and second above described, "do not form assets of the trust to be taken into account in valuing the debt."

The present action was thereafter raised. Claims were lodged to the funds in medio by (1) the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow and others, the new Road Authorities of the counties and burghs in which the road was situated; (2) the Caledonian Railway Company; (3) William Alston Dykes and others, private creditors, or as representing private creditors, of the old Road Trust; and (4) Lord and Lady Rossmore's Trustees, also private creditors of the old Road Trust.

The Town-Council of Glasgow and other road authorities claimed to be preferred to the whole funds in medio, under liability upon perty and assets belonging thereto shall be valued and allocated upon or among, as the case may be, the county or counties and burgh or burghs in Scotland, and the road authority in England to be named in his determination: (2) Upon such application being presented to the Secretary of State, he may, if he shall think fit, by any writing under his hand, appoint any two persons as Commissioners to institute a local inquiry as to the circumstances of the case, and after hearing all parties interested, to report thereon to the Secretary of State . . . (3) The Commissioners shall prepare and transmit along with their report the draft of the determination which, having regard to the general provisions of this Act, they recommend that the Secretary of State should make in the premises: (4) The Secretary of State, after such further inquiry, if any, as he shall deem necessary, may approve of the draft submitted with or without alterations, and any determination . . . made by him under his hand and seal, shall have the same effect as if it were contained in this Act," unless Parliament resolve otherwise.

---

* The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, section 108, provides,—"All persons acting or who have acted under any of the general or local Acts in force at the commencement of this Act as trustees of any of the turnpike roads, statute-labour roads, highways, or bridges within the county, or as clerks, or officers of such trustees who shall at the commencement of this Act have in their custody, power, or possession any moneys collected by virtue of such Acts, or any books, deeds, papers, writings, property, or effects belonging to the said turnpike or statute-labour trusts respectively, or relating to the execution of such Acts, shall pay and deliver up the same to the county road trustees, or to such person as they shall appoint to receive the same, who shall hold them and be liable to pay them over or make them forthcoming, subject to the provisions of this Act."

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

them to satisfy all (if any) existing legal claims in respect thereof, or alternatively, to the balance of the funds after such (if any) of the private creditors as shall establish subsisting legal claims have been ranked therefor.

The Caledonian Railway Company claimed to be preferred to the whole funds in medio, or at all events, to be found entitled to the custody of the funds unless and until any of the former creditors of the Road Trust instructed a right to the same or any part thereof.

The claimants William Alston Dykes and others claimed in four classes. Class A claimed the shares previously unclaimed by them of the surplus revenue for the period ending 30th June 1848, with interest.

Class B claimed the arrears of dividends declared upon their debts prior to 1852.

Class C claimed shares (1) of the sum of £77, 17s. 6d. (being the amount carried to the general dividend account, but not allotted to particular creditors); and (2) of the sum of £740, 17s. 8d. (third mentioned in the summons), in the proportion which their subscriptions bore to the total debt of the road trust.

Class D claimed, after the creditors claiming in classes A, B, and C had been satisfied to share the whole fund in medio, in so far as it might avail to repay to each of them respectively the unpaid balances of their original contributions, with interest.

Lord and Lady Rossmore's Trustees claimed (1) a share rateably with other compearing private creditors according to the amounts of their respective original contributions of the sum first mentioned in the summons, and of the unclaimed dividends so far as these sums were unclaimed by the creditors primarily entitled thereto until the amount of their original contributions had been repaid with interest; (2) a share of the sums of £77, 17s. 6d. and £740, 17s. 8d., with accrued interest in the proportion their original contributions bore to the total debt; and (3) a share rateably with other compearing private creditors of the two last mentioned sums with interest after the claims of the private creditors primarily entitled thereto and coming forward to claim had been satisfied.

On 20th June the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the claims for the Caledonian Railway Company, No. 28 of process, and the Town-councils of Glasgow and Hamilton and others, being the Road Authorities of their respective districts, No. 27 of process: Sustains the claim for the private creditors or representatives of private creditors, William Alston Dykes and others, No. 30 of process, to the extent of classes A, B, and C of their claim, and quoad ultra repels their said claims: Further, as regards the claim for Lord and Lady Rossmore's trustees, sustains the second branch of their claim, comprising both subdivisions, No. 29 of process, and quoad ultra repels their said claim: Finds that on the said claimants satisfying the Court as to their title to represent the original creditors, they will be entitled to be ranked and preferred accordingly: Further, as regards the balance of the fund in medio, finds that it must remain consigned in bank to await the orders of the Court, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.— . . . To deal first with the claim for the new Road Authorities, who are now substituted for the old Trust on the Glasgow and Carlisle Road, I shall not attempt to examine in detail the ingenious series of pleas stated on their behalf on pages 61 to 63 of the record. Their

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895.

Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The claimants the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow and the other Road Authorities and the Caledonian Railway Company, reclaimed.

Argued for the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow and Others;—By the provisions of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, the whole property and effects of the former road trusts were transferred to the new Road Authorities,[1] and they were expressly entitled to receive moneys collected by the officials of the Trusts which they superseded,[2] the scheme of the Act being that the new trustees being rendered liable in all the obligations should also be entitled to all the assets of the old trustees. The reclaimers were therefore entitled to the funds in medio. The fact that the funds were held by the treasurer of the old Trust for special purposes could not bar the new Road Trustees from recovering them, if unclaimed by those for whom they were held.[3] The claim of the railway company was excluded as regarded all the funds described in the summons by the terms of the determination of the Secretaries of State. It was also excluded as regarded the funds first and third described by the terms of the agreement of 1846, for they claim in substance is, that these funds were assets of the old Trust, which should have been handed over to them under section 108 of the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, and allocated among them, leaving the creditors to sue for their debts. It seems to be a sufficient answer to this claim that the only authority (the Secretary of State) who, under section 90 of the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, is empowered to value and allocate the debts affecting such a trust as this and the property and assets belonging thereto, has refused to deal with the funds in question on the ground that they are not assets of the trust. It is said that the private creditors were not parties to the proceedings before the Commissioners appointed by the Secretary of State and the Secretary for Scotland, who was conjoined with him. But it seems to me that the whole provisions of the Act dealing with the valuation and allocation of debts and assets point to the valuation and allocation being made once for all; and if the private creditors' debts and the funds in question can no longer be valued and allocated upon and among the various counties and burghs, I see no means by which the private creditors could make good their claims if the funds were handed over to the Road Authorities collectively as they now demand. If they sued as creditors, they would probably be met with the objection that they have failed to have their debts valued under the statute and cannot now have that done. Accordingly, the creditors claim the funds as set apart for and belonging to them. And this position is justified by the determination of the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Secretary for Scotland, which proceeds on the footing of excluding these funds from the assets allocated, and has now the force of a statutory enactment (section 90 (4)).

---

"Apart from this objection to the claim of the Road Authorities, I am inclined to be of opinion that, looking to the way in which these funds were dealt with ever since they were first deposited, they were, at least in any question between the Trust and the private creditors, as completely separated from the assets of the Trust as if they had been deposited in bank in an account in name of the private creditors.

"To deal next with the claim for the Caledonian Railway Company: The railway company now admits the claim of the compearing creditors and

---

[1] Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, secs. 11, 32, and 47.

[2] Ibid. sec. 108.

[3] Perthshire County Road Trustees v. Committee for Perth District, March 10, 1880, 7 R. 686.

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895. Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

had already received all they were entitled to under the 5th article of the agreement of the surplus revenue abandoned by Government; and as regarded the fund second described, by the fact that that fund was already appropriated to payment of dividend before the date at which the company took over the rights of the private creditors. The claims of private creditors were not disputed on the merits, except to the extent that they were not entitled to compound interest, or interest upon arrears of dividend,[1] and that they were not entitled to any share beyond the proportion which their original contributions bore to whole road debt.[2] But their claims could not be sustained until they had been valued and allocated.[3]

Argued for the Caledonian Railway Company;—This company purchased the debts due to the private creditors, and by the terms of their agreement had a right to payment out of the tolls of the road after payment of expenses. The company was in the position of assignee of the private creditors, and as such had right to these special funds so far as not claimed by individual creditors. Further, the individual creditors who had come forward were not entitled to a greater proportion of the funds than that which their original contributions bore to the total debt on the road, and they had no right to any part of the sum of £77 which had been carried to the general dividend account prior to Whitsunday 1852, representatives of creditors to their own proportions of unclaimed dividends, and other sums set aside for private creditors; but it claims the balance effeiring to those creditors who have not appeared as an accessory of the debt which it purchased. In the view which I take neither the railway company nor the compearing creditors are entitled to that balance. It seems to me that by conceding the right of the compearing creditors to their proportions of the funds, the railway company has admitted away its claim to the balance. It admits to that extent the claim of the compearing creditors, because the unclaimed dividends and other funds were set apart for the private creditors before the railway company's purchase of the debt was completed, and it seems to me that the same reason applies to the balance still unclaimed.

---

"As to the one-half of the sum given up by Government, that by express agreement (the agreement of 1846) belongs to the private creditors; and if the compearing creditors have no claim to the balance now unclaimed, a fortiori the railway company has none. The railway company has claimed and received its proper half in the proceedings before the Debt Commissioners, and in regard to this fund, as well as the others, its claim is specially barred by its actings.

"Lastly, to deal with the case of the private creditors, I have no doubt that they are entitled to the sums specially allotted to them. I am also of opinion that they are entitled to share in the two sums of £77 and £740 not specially allotted to individual creditors, but set aside for the private creditors as a body in the proportion which their debts bear to the total original debt. But as I have indicated as regards the balance which would have fallen to be paid to the other private creditors, had they appeared, in the same proportions, I do not feel justified in allowing them to share in that.

"Before pronouncing a decree of ranking the private creditors must produce satisfactory evidence of title."

[1] Dinham v. Bradford, 1869, L. R., 5 Ch. 519; Companies Act, 1862, First Schedule, Table A, sec. (77); Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 153.

[2] Mellish v. Brooks, 1840, 3 Beavan, 22.

[3] Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, secs. 65, 69, and 90.

but not allocated to individual creditors. That sum passed to the company as the general assignee of the private creditors.[1] The valuation of the Commissioners was not under section 65 of the Roads Act, but section 90. The claim of the company was therefore not extinguished under the provisions of section 69. The valuation also was only a valuation of the debt as chargeable on the general funds of the Road Trust, and the company's claim to special funds in the possession of the trust was therefore not excluded by the determination of the Secretaries of State.

Argued for John Alston Dykes and others, and Lord and Lady Rossmore's Trustees, the compearing private creditors;—The claim of the Caledonian Railway Company was excluded on the grounds stated by the new Road Authorities. As regarded the claim of the compearing private creditors, the sections of the Roads and Bridges Act which provided for the valuation and allocation of debts did not apply to special funds such as those now in question.[2] Claims A, B, and C for Dykes and others, and the second branch of the claim for Rossmore's Trustees, not being disputed on the merits, were therefore rightly sustained by the Lord Ordinary. But the compearing private creditors were further entitled to have the balance of the funds in medio divided among them, until they had received repayment of the whole amount of their original contributions, in respect that the funds in question belonged to the private creditors, and they were the only creditors who had come forward to claim. The appropriate form of interlocutor was to rank them "for aught yet seen." The effect of an interlocutor in that form would be to bar creditors who had been cited and had failed to appear, unless they presented a note craving to be reponed within twenty days, in which case they might be admitted to claim on conditions.[3] Parties not cited could be reponed simpliciter or on conditions, so long as the fund in medio existed;[4] but, in any event, such parties would not be debarred from vindicating their right against the parties to whom payment had erroneously been made.[5]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The history of the three sums which form the fund in medio in this action is given, as the Lord Ordinary observes, very clearly in the condescendence attached to the summons, and I do not understand that there is any difference between the parties as to the material facts.

It appears that the roads between Glasgow and Carlisle were constructed partly out of public moneys and partly by the subscription of private persons, who thereupon became creditors of the Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trust, and the revenue of the trust, after defraying the expenses of maintenance and management, was accordingly applicable to the payment of interest on the sums subscribed, to the payment of interest on the money

[1] Carron Co. v. Hunter, June 25, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 1868, 40 Scot. Jur. 546.

[2] Lanarkshire and Linlithgowshire Road Trustees v. Lady Torphichen's Trustees, July 9, 1885, 12 R. 1252.

[3] Beveridge on Forms of Process, p. 183; Duncan's Factor v. Duncan, June 3, 1874, 1 R. 964, per Lord Deas, p. 968.

[4] Geikie v. Morris, June 14, 1858, 3 Macq. 347, 30 Scot. Jur. 528; Johnston v. Elder, Jan. 17, 1832, 10 S. 195; Stodart v. Bell, May 23, 1860, 22 D. 1092, 32 Scot. Jur. 501.

[5] Erak. iv. 3, 23; Bell's Comm. (7th edn.) ii. 277.

No. 73.

Dec. 21, 1895.
Grahame v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

